Rather than live in a world half slave and half free, this speaker's choice is war. Rather than live under communism, this speaker's choice is death. Let me hasten to say that I do not believe for one moment that the principles of communism can ever triumph in a world that is ruled by Almighty God, but that is no guaranty that the United States of America will be the instrument of God to eradicate that system which denies God. God's nation has to abide by God's principles. God's people must be dedicated to the accomplishment of building His Kingdom through the church, as He has commanded. To avert world war III is not to achieve the Kingdom of God, nor will it bring even the achievement of a political Utopia.

"Ye gods, it doth amaze me, a man of such feeble temper should so get the start of the majestic world and bear the palm alone. Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed, that he has grown so great?"[5]

The controversy, however, is not between a general and a President, even though this be the immediate issue. This administration has proved itself to be incompetent, impotent, inept, and insensible to the high demands of the offices entrusted to them by the people. One cannot long condone actions which protect the official family at the expense of national righteousness, nor the making of appointments with little thought as to the competence of the appointees to handle the position, but thinking only of the political consequences involved. But, as the administration's actions symbolize the lack of its qualifications, so the administration symbolizes the lack on the part of the people of the United States to claim anything at the hands of a righteous God.

Under our system, the administration is not Caesar—the citizens are. To them belongs the ultimate franchise, and they choose the government they want at the polls.

All our disgust and revulsion in these days can be traced back to ourselves, simply because we have been indifferent, we have been careless, we have cherished tradition at the expense of right, we have been content to ignore a lack of public morality so long as we were not immediately concerned, we have talked one way and voted another, we have failed to insist upon the maintenance of the standards which brought us to our present powerful position in the affairs of men. Could the proven corruption in New York under the administration of William O'Dwyer, now the ambassador of the national administration to Mexico, have existed without the vote of the people putting him in office? Could the present corruption exist in Washington had not the people approved the return of Jackson County, Mo., political hacks to power in 1948? Could the present corruption exist in Tarrant County, Tex., had the people demanded good, clean, honest, efficient, and progressive government from its county and city officials?

We cannot expect to have deals on all sides in local affairs and not have those same tactics which have worked so well on a local basis transferred to higher councils of government, especially when we elect to higher office men who have been trained in that sort of political thinking. We have only ourselves to blame.

Now, back to the questions everyone was asking Wednesday and Thursday. "What can we do about it?" "Isn't there something we can do?" The answer is a ringing and positive affirmative—not to do anything for Douglas MacArthur. That is not necessary. The position of Douglas MacArthur in history is secure. This question will have to be asked in return: "Are you willing to pay the price of good government?" If you are a Christian, your answer must be: "Yes." How, then?

First, this situation demands prayer—prayer of confession, of penitence, asking God to forgive us our selfishness, our shortsightedness, our waywardness, our greed—prayer for guidance in this hour, asking God to lead those of us who exercise the political franchise to use the minds which He has given us to decide between principles and political parties, between statesmen and political timesavers, between right and wrong, and, once the decision is made for political righteousness, to maintain that direction regardless of the wind which may blow from popular opinion.

Second, this situation demands action—positive, constructive thinking; honest and intelligent opposition to the cancer that is eating away at our body politic in the courthouse and in the Nation's Capital; renunciation of the very human tendency to get our share of the largess of public moneys being wasted on every hand; refusal to accept any compromise with the forces of darkness represented in international, atheistic communism no matter where it rears its head, recognizing that global conflict may come as a result, but wisely acknowledging that destruction is the ultimate aim of the Politburo if necessary to achieve its ends; demanding proper use of public offices and insisting upon honest men to occupy them, never acceding for a moment to the pagan belief that "every man has his price."

Third, this situation demands a return of the individual to God and to the things of God—for, after all, the Nation's morality is the sum of the morality of its citizens. When we renounce individual greed, national greed will disappear. When we put personality above personal gain, the Nation will also. When we stop abusing principles for some immediate, practical goal, it will disappear also on the national level. When we really believe in the teachings of our Lord

[5] Ibid., act I, scene 2.

Jesus Christ concerning personal daily living, as the church always has taught them—and act on those teachings—the Nation then can claim the blessing of God.

In this darkest and most desperate hour of her history, America needs you—you, with your prayers, your actions for righteousness, your individual return to God and the things of God. God can save America. God can save America through you.

Program of Economic Preparation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. SMATHERS
OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered on April 27 by Defense Mobilizer Charles E. Wilson. In my humble opinion, this is an address worthy of the close attention of every Member of Congress, for it outlines clearly and concisely this Nation's program of economic preparation. He sets out clearly the necessity for belt tightening on the part of the American people, the necessity for a continuous fight on inflation, and then he shows the answer to efforts which are being made by us and the other free nations of the world, when he states that by 1953 this Nation can be so strong that no other nation in the world would dare to either attack us or continue imperialistic aggressions.

In my opinion, Mr. Charles E. Wilson is rendering magnificent patriotic service to this Nation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of April 27, 1951]

TEXT OF WILSON'S DEFENSE PLEA TO THE PEOPLE THROUGH THE PRESS OF THE NATION

I am particularly glad to address this distinguished audience because the burdens of my job are related to the burdens of yours. This is not just a case of misery loving company.

I have been charged by the President of the United States to mobilize the Nation's economy. But it cannot be done without the support of public opinion, which is largely formed by the free press. Therefore, your job is far more basic than mine.

In the past few years, you have printed millions of words laying down the premise for the mobilization program that now lies before us. That premise is that the free world is in mortal danger, but that it is still possible to save it.

If the people were not convinced of that, it would be impossible for Congress to vote the vast sums now being spent to avert that danger. It would be impossible to reorganize our industrial plants, to conserve scarce metals, to establish wage and price controls, to place restrictions upon credit, and to do all the other things necessary to safeguard our country and the free world in general from the deadly menace that now confronts it.

With the support of public opinion, as marshaled by the press, we are off to a good start. But the mobilization job cannot be completed unless such support is continuous. If the enemy had attacked in New York instead of Korea, there would be no problem. The trouble is that people's imaginations are sharpened only by the immediacy of danger and too often only by brutal disaster. It is our job—yours and mine—to keep our people convinced that the only way to keep disaster away from our shores is to build America's might.

This is not an easy thing to do. When the effects of mobilization are brought home to the average citizen in terms of the price of eggs, or the amount of take-home pay, he is likely to wonder why world affairs should invade the privacy of his own life.

The fact is the relationship is an intimate one and this will become increasingly apparent as time goes on.

NATIONAL FUSION TO AVERT WAR

The problem of public morale is complicated by the activities of some members of the so-called pressure groups. In the long run, such groups—industry, labor, agriculture—tend to balance one another. But in times like the present, when the whole economy is being reshaped, the only pressure that should be exerted is pressure to get the job done, and to make the Nation strong.

I hope the country is beginning to realize that defense mobilization does not mean a choice between big business or big labor, small business or agriculture, but rather a fusing of all the segments of our population in a great national effort to prevent a third world war.

I am hopeful that the new National Advisory Board on Mobilization Policy, created by the President, of which I am chairman, will be a helpful means of advancing the mobilization program. This board is made up of eminent men who, I am convinced, will place the needs of the country ahead of the desires of any group.

One of labor's principal demands has been that it should have a man at top policy-making levels in the Office of Defense Mobilization. That was a reasonable demand and I agreed to it. Many weeks ago I laid out the welcome mat.

That welcome mat is still waiting. The door is wide open. The only qualification is the same one observed by my associates and me, namely, that any man who walks through that door must put on a Government hat, with all that that implies.

I don't ask that the labor representative resign from his post in his union, but I do ask that he serve the people as a whole. Acting in that capacity, such a representative could make a valuable contribution to the mobilization program, and I would be glad to have him working with me.

The charge has been made that the mobilization effort is being dominated by a big business conspiracy.

This charge, of course, was leveled against me and some of my associates who have been summoned to Washington to take defense posts.

As for me, I am from big business and I am proud of it. With the exception of time out in World War II, I spent half a century in one industry. When the President hired me for the job, he knew where I came from. I did not come under false pretenses nor did others of the mobilization staff.

A BIG BUSINESS TO BE COMPLETED

I think I know why the President, who himself has never worn such a label, invited some members of big business to come to Washington to help out in the mobilization effort. It is because preparation for war is, to a large extent, big business.

No one expects tanks, planes, and guns to be produced and assembled in little machine shops scattered throughout the country. No, these things come from the mass production lines of huge industries, although we are willing and eager, and are going far out of our way, to have the full participation of small business in this effort. Even Stalin after the last war paid tribute to our mass production methods.

So it is only natural that the President should draw upon the experience, training, and know-how of big business to play a part—but only a part—in the mobilization program.

This is not, of course, to minimize the part small business is playing in the mobilization program. Everything possible is being done to take advantage of the facilities of small business.

For example, National Production Authority's Office of Small Business makes available a regular listing of contracts to 5,000 cooperating offices in the country, such as chambers of commerce, trade organizations, and the like. We seek to strike a proper balance in contracts between small business and big business, with each contributing what it is best equipped to produce.

When I came to Washington I took off my big business hat and put on a Government hat, and so did my associates. We are working for Uncle Sam wholeheartedly and completely, and if we are not, we should and will be fired.

I should like to set at rest another canard—that I reached out and grabbed hold of a huge fistful of power for myself. The fact is that when the President called for me I went to see him and asked him what he wanted me to do. He told me.

I asked for nothing more, but in the interests of good executive practice, I suggested that an Executive order be prepared by the President to cover the job he had outlined, specifically setting forth its responsibilities and authority. He did so. And that's that.

And while I am slaying canards I might as well kill still another one. I read the other day in a New York financial daily an article quoting some gossip or scuttlebutt to the effect that I am going to quit.

There is nothing to this. I have no intention of quitting, and certainly not at the instance of the gossipers. There is a big job to be done, and I mean to see it through as well as I am able.

ROOSEVELT "MIRACLES" RECALLED

As you gentlemen well know, the plan for defense mobilization is to spend $50,000,000,000 a year for 3 years for defense purposes with the least possible interference with the civilian economy.

And we are already well on our way. Since the first of this year orders have been placed at a rate of $1,000,000,000 a week and more. At the end of 1951 these orders will be translated into volumes of end items needed for the war; 1952 will be a year of continuing accumulation. As of 1953 we will be able to meet the demands of all-out war, if need be, out of our production lines.

Then, if any aggressor wants to tangle with us, he would have to be crazy to do so.

I confess I am an incurable optimist—but I think a realistic one—as to America's might and capacity to produce.

My optimism is based upon the production miracles that were worked under our eyes in the last war. When President Roosevelt, early in the conflict, called for the production of 50,000 airplanes a year it looked as if he were asking for the impossible.

Yet it wasn't long before the goal of 50,000 planes had not only been reached, but greatly surpassed. Then the President raised the sights and by 1944 we were actually producing planes at a rate of more than 100,000 a year—nearly 8,500 a month. We at that time had so many that the program had to be cut back.

A similar story can be told with regard to ships. We produced so many ships that, when the war ended, there were scarcely enough harbors to anchor them in.

And what is true as to planes and ships was also true of many other products needed for war.

Two days ago I had a memorable experience. With a number of others I flew out to Wright Field, near Dayton, Ohio. There I saw some of our newest planes and other weapons and equipment in action. I got an up-to-the-minute account of the development of our airplane production program, both as to quantity and as to quality.

My publisher friends, I can only wish that you had been with me to share with me the warm glow of pride I felt in our American genius of design, development and production.

I can only wish, too, that a certain mustachioed gentleman irom Moscow had been with us. Perhaps he might then begin to cut his ambitions down to size.

A COMPARISON OF ECONOMIES

What we did in World War II, we can now double in spades, if we have to. Production of steel in March exceeded 9,000,000 tons a month for the first time in history. Output of 25,700,000 tons for the first quarter was the largest ever attained during a comparable period.

Only last week Moscow reported jubilantly that it had attained an annual steel production of 27,200,000 tons and it was shooting for a goal of 60,000,000 tons by 1960. By comparison, the United States is now producing at the annual rate of 108,000,000 and is aiming for a production of 117,000,000 tons in the next 2 years.

Russia was delighted to say that its 5-year plan resulted in electric power production of 90,000,000,000 kilowatt hours in 1950. Our production of electricity in the same year approached 400,000,000,000. And this country enjoyed similarly favorable margins in many other fields of production. That's our great strength.

As a sign of what is to come, I am happy to say that the Walker bulldog tank—the first production-built tank of this nature—rolled off the line at the Cadillac plant in Cleveland on March 27. This was three months ahead of schedule. Last December, the factory that produced that tank was filled to the rafters with millions of pounds of surplus beans owned by the Department of Agriculture.

OUR PROMISE OF PROGRESSION

Less than 20 years ago the remark was often heard that our economy had reached the stage of maturity. In the light of what has happened since, that idea has been shown to be preposterous.

I do not refer alone to the huge power of expansion that was witnessed under the impact of war. I refer also to the continued expansion in the postwar period. Instead of the recession that was freely predicted, our economy rose to greater and greater heights.

A few figures tell the story. In 1933, our gross national product amounted to about $56,000,000,000. It was thought then that if we could ever reach $100,000,000,000 we would be in clover. That figure was reached in 1940 and it rose to a wartime peak of $215,000,000,000 in 1945.

By postwar 1949 it was $255,000,000,000 and, at the end of 1950 we were producing at a rate of $300,000,000,000 a year.

In the next 3 years, the gross national product should rise to $345,000,000,000, a figure high enough to provide for all the needs of defense mobilization while, at the same time, preserving a civilian economy at or near pre-Korean levels.

I am often asked what we will do with all our productive capacity say, after 1953, if all-out war does not occur. My answer is that I believe we are still in the pioneering stage, that we are on the threshold of a new phase of the industrial revolution.

Just as no real let-down occurred after the last war, I do not believe a let-down need occur when our mobilization is complete. I believe we can confidently look forward to the use of a very substantial part of these great new facilities that are now being provided.

I think they may be the greatest insurance policy that we could have if the worst happens. If it doesn't, then I believe confidently that we can use them for a better economy, for a better standard of living—indeed, I think for a better America.

So much for the production side of the mobilization picture. I wish I could speak with the same kind of optimism concerning stabilization. Here is where someone should begin passing out the aspirin.

I do not know a finer service to America for the press to perform than in continuing to bring home to the people the dangers of inflation. I do not think it is too strong to say that the country has been attacked by a cancerous growth which will prove fatal unless it is quickly cut out.

I have already referred to the need for putting an end to the price-wage spiral. We all understand why that must be done, but we also understand it cannot be done by one edict in 1 day. The so-called price-wage freeze of January 26 admittedly had many imperfections.

As has been aptly said, it was only the first application of the brakes to a car going 75 miles an hour. It was impossible to bring the car to a dead stop.

It became necessary almost at once to thaw out the order of January 26 to cure many inequities both in prices and wages. But we are attempting to hold the broad general line.

The general manufacturers' order just published establishing new ceiling prices for some 75,000 industrial firms should have a positive, favorable effect. This order requires manufacturers who increased their prices excessively after Korea to roll them back. At the same time, it gives a degree of relief to those who did not apply heavy increases. And it should restore more normal cost-price relationships in industry.

A basic price policy has also been formulated forbidding price increases so long as profits are above the level set in the excess profits tax law, namely 85 percent of profits of the best 3 years in the 4-year period 1946–49. If an industry's profits are higher than this 85 percent, it will have to absorb cost increases and will not be able to raise prices.

We intend to proceed on the basis of the principle that no manufacturer with excess profits will be entitled to an increase in prices.

BASIC LEVERAGE OF TAX RISE

Since last fall, the Federal Reserve Board has taken a series of steps designed to curb inflation. It has restricted housing and consumer credit, increased bank-reserve requirements to the limit of the law, raised margins on stocks to 75 percent of value and it has issued a new type of long-term nonmarketable bond—to yield 2.75 percent—for the purpose of decreasing the amount of money in circulation.

Voluntary committees have been set up to restrict credit. No doubt the board will take further action as time goes on.

It has been correctly said that direct price and wage controls treat the symptoms of inflation rather than its basic cause, which can be simply stated as an excess of demand over supply. A more direct form of attack, therefore, is to drain off excess purchasing power by higher taxes.

As a group of economists points out, in a recently published book entitled "Defense Without Inflation":

"Direct controls are not a substitute for adequate taxation.

"A tax system appropriate for the present emergency must absorb a larger part of the total annual income than did the World War II tax system."

The President has asked Congress to impose additional taxes in the sum of $10,000,000,000, an action which will not only contribute to the pay-as-you-go principle but will help enormously to relieve inflationary pressures.

So, on a variety of fronts, the Government is moving to protect the country from internal inflationary disaster. In recent weeks, there have been some hopeful signs that the rising tide of prices has been checked, but it would be folly if we relaxed for a single instant the battle against this domestic enemy.

I have said that it is planned to spend $50,000,000,000 a year for the next 3 years for defense purposes. But if prices continue to rise, this figure, enormous as it is, will not be enough.

CASUALTY RATE IN WAR POTENTIAL

Inflation is an enemy which wipes out our tanks, our guns, our planes, as ruthlessly as any Chinese or North Korean army wipes them out. Already our casualties inflicted by this dread enemy can be numbered in the thousands of tanks, guns, and planes.

For every $10,000,000,000 appropriated by Congress for rearmament, we have lost $2,000,000,000 worth of weapons of defense through inflation of costs. That is a casualty loss of 20 percent.

Any commander in the field will tell you that a 20 percent loss of his equipment in any engagement is dangerous. It will keep him up many a sleepless night until he can get that loss restored.

I can tell you that, as your defense mobilization commander, I have spent many a sleepless night worrying over the high casualty loss already exacted by that dread enemy, inflation.

In one way this domestic enemy is even more effective than our foreign enemy. You can be sure that our gallant and effective soldiers in Korea don't suffer a loss as high as 20 percent of their equipment in any engagement without putting out of action a much larger amount of enemy equipment and men.

But if we suffer a loss of 20 percent in equipment through inflation, we just suffer that loss ourselves without inflicting any corresponding loss—any loss at all—on the enemy.

Suppose we let that kind of thing go unchecked. Very soon the defense program would become too expensive for us to bear or it would have inflated our whole system and destroyed our economic strength.

The people of the United States might well get discouraged under such circumstances and want to call a halt, far short of the minimum readiness for defense that would deter aggression.

And—don't forget—anything short of strength enough to deter Moscow's aggression is catastrophic waste. Better a little more than necessary instead of that tragic too little too late.

In times like these, when most of us can still eat and sleep in safety in our homes and go to regular jobs, how can we get people to act steadily and in time to create the strength we need?

Is it possible really to educate people in advance of hard experience? We must hope that it is, and act with every conviction of that hope.

A DECISION FOR EVERY CITIZEN

In the final analysis, the battle against inflation must be won by the attitude of the individual citizen. He must decide whether he is to do his part grudgingly or magnificently. He must decide whether the Nation will be greatly patriotic or narrowly selfish.

History shows that the vision of one single individual has often accomplished wonderful things. If a vision of America's destiny and of the sacrifices needed to achieve it can be glimpsed by 150,000,000 Americans, the country faces a glorious future.

I ask Americans to have faith in the program upon which the Government has embarked. I ask them to follow its lead, not blindly, of course, but with a constant awareness of its objectives.

I ask my fellow citizens to do their jobs as well as they know how, to be content with reasonable profits, to be content with reasonable wages and to understand the need for higher taxes and the other measures being taken to stem inflation.

I ask them not to hoard, not to throw money away on things that are not needed, not to patronize black markets.

I ask my fellow citizens to keep in mind always that the sacrifices they are being asked to make to control inflation are small indeed with the suffering—yes, the disaster—that uncontrolled inflation would follow in its wake. It would leave its blight on every doorstep.

But if the Nation can count upon the understanding and cooperation of individual citizens, we can all look to the future confidently and serenely.

The President has just sent a message to Congress asking it to extend the Defense Production Act, which expires June 30, and to strengthen the act in various respects. This law passed following the invasion of Korea provides the basic authority both for the channeling of scarce materials into defense production and for the stabilization of the economy against inflationary pressures brought about by the defense effort.

STEPS FOR EQUALITY IN SACRIFICE

The Presidential message contains a comprehensive analysis of the international situation and what has to be done to prepare America for any eventuality.

In addition to continuance of the provisions of the present act, the President is asking for authority to construct and operate defense plants, to finance essential production at home and abroad, without having to increase price ceilings; to improve administration of price control on food products; to control rents, both residential and commercial, and to restrict credit, curb speculation and increase bank reserve requirements.

It is the central purpose of the President's message to distribute the sacrifices fairly and equitably among all segments of our production.

I hope Congress will give the most careful attention to the President's recommendations, which are designed to give defense mobilization agencies the legal means to carry out their tasks.

I believe the changes suggested in the Defense Production Act will go far toward solidifying popular support of the mobilization program and toward bringing about national unity in the crisis that confronts us.

On the whole, as I look back to what has been accomplished since last June, when the Communists showed their hands in Korea, I am optimistic—realistically so, I trust.

We have already come a long way toward preparing the country against the Moscow menace, and our plans for the immediate future are moving rapidly from the blueprint stage to volume production.

God willing, in 3 years we shall have built America's might and cooperated with our allies to increase the might of the freedom-loving nations, to the point that world peace should be assured.

The job before us is beset with many pitfalls.

It will take restraint and sacrifice, toil and sweat to avert blood and tears.

It will require vision and understanding from every citizen.

But I am confident that the American people have an appreciation of our God-given blessings; that they will do the job demanded by this time of crisis; so that they will live splendidly with liberty and freedom—that they will preserve and extend these blessings for our children.

These things we Americans can do—and will do.

What Are We Building?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I was in Daytona Beach, Fla., not so long ago to make a speech on a Sunday afternoon. On that Sunday morning, I attended the interdenominational church known as the Tourist Church of Daytona Beach, Fla.; and while there I observed and listened to the ceremonies in connection with the laying of a cornerstone of a new church building.

The principal address on that occasion was delivered by an old law-school colleague of mine, now a practicing lawyer in Daytona Beach, Fla., Mr. Paul E. Raymond. It was my privilege to have him serve as a member of my staff at the University of Oregon, some years ago. I had not seen him for a considerable length of time prior to my recent visit to Daytona Beach. At that time he gave an address which I found so moving and so keen in its analysis of some of the problems which confront us as a free people, that I now ask unanimous consent to have his address published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT ARE WE BUILDING?

(By Paul E. Raymond)

As we lay this cornerstone, we might reflect for a moment on what we are building. Is it simply an object of brick, stone, mortar, steel, and wood? Or is it something vaster and more enduring?

We are rather smug about our civilization and our culture, yet in this Nation 1 out of every 20 adults is illiterate. One out of every fifteen is a syphilitic. One out of three belongs to church, but only 1 out of 10 goes to church on Sunday. In 1 year we bought 1,000,000 copies of the Beer Barrel Polka, but we bought only 127 copies of Beethoven's great C-minor symphony. And while we pay 7 of our 10 highest salaries to men in the amusement industry, we have one-half of all of the families in the South needing to be rehoused. People are dying for want of medical attention who ought not to die, and little children are weak and undernourished who ought not to be hungry in this great land of plenty.

To admit of our defects is not weakness. To recognize them and then to remedy them is to become really strong. This is where we need to build. Our basic need for building is well pointed up in a letter written about a year ago by a veteran of World War II. This is what he had to say:

"My name is John Crown. I am a paraplegic at Halloran General Hospital. My physical wounds are very small in comparison with my spiritual wounds. I have come back from death to a world that I no longer care for. I, who have been engaged in the great struggle to save the world from tyranny, and having seen my comrades die for this cause, can now find no peace in the world or in my country.

"Having lived close to death for 2 years, the reasons why there is no peace seem infinitesimally flimsy. Russia wants the Dardanelles, Yugoslavia wants Trieste, the Moslems want India, labor wants more wages, capital wants more profits, Smith wants to pass the car in front of him, Junior wants more spending money. To these I say, Is it necessary to kill and cripple human beings for these petty gains? Anyone who thinks a human body is so cheap that it can be traded for a tract of land, a piece of silver, or a few minutes of time should be forced to listen to the moans of the dying night and day for the rest of his life.

"All the troubles of the world originate in the common man. The selfish and greedy ways of nations are just the ways of each individual man multipled a hundredfold. When the morals of the common man drop, so do the morals of the nations of the world. As long as our individual morals remain at a low ebb, so will be the world. Until each of us stops 'hogging the road' with his car, stops fighting over the seat on the bus, stops arguing over who is going to cut the grass, there will be no peace in the world.

"If man wishes peace again, he must remember the great commandment, 'Love thy neighbor as thyself for the love of God.'"

A peaceful world and a free democracy are dependent, then, upon the building of better men and better women. They cannot be evolved through political sophistry or any magic formula.

During the past half century we have observed two tendencies which indicate that we are not building better people. In the first place, we have witnessed a softening of character. Life has become too easy for too many. Those for whom life is easier have tended to forget their less fortunate brothers. World War II was a joyride for altogether too many people in this country. Pioneer life was hard, but the pioneer was self-dependent; he was charitable; and he had unbounded faith in the values of democracy and religion. He would unhesitatingly sacrifice his life, his fortune, and his sacred honor in their behalf. Where is this spirit today? Where is the spirit of sacrifice? Where is the spirit of giving rather than getting? What has become of our proud spirit of independence and self-dependence? Not long ago Walter Lippmann summed it up in these words:

"Without order and authority in the spirit of man the free way of life leads through weakness, disorganization, self-indulgence and moral indifference to the destruction of freedom itself. The tragic ordeal through which the Western World is passing was prepared in the long period of easy liberty during which men * * * forgot that their freedom was achieved by heroic sacrifice. * * * They forgot that their rights were founded on their duties * * * they thought it clever to be cynical, and enlightened to be unbelieving, and sensible to be soft."

Something has gone out of American character, and we must put it back by building better men and women.

The second tendency we have observed and one which makes our task of building more difficult, is the full sway of materialism. We have much to point to in the way of material accomplishments which have made life easier and more comfortable. We have electricity and television and air conditioning, streamlined trains and automobiles and superhighways, airplanes and air-foam mattresses. But these conveniences and comforts have led us to assign a primary place to pleasure and comfort and have allowed us to forget the great values of democracy such as religious freedom, freedom of the press, freedom of speech. Where do we derive our pleasures from today? From love of home and family, good literature, great music, and public service well rendered? Or from the racetrack and the cocktail bar?

Our need, then, is not the building of material things, but building to assure the survival of the great intangible values of a Christian democracy. The work of building better people must begin with our youth—our children and our young people. We must set them a better example and instill in them a love and enthusiasm for these priceless principles. We are erecting here a building for the better training of the youth of this community. Through them we shall build better men and better women. We shall build a better citizenship. This is what we are really building as we lay this cornerstone.

Hail, South Dakota

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, in response to requests from several persons, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a statement containing the words of the song, Hail, South Dakota, adopted March 5, 1943, by the State legislature as the official song of South Dakota.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hail, South Dakota, was written by Deecort Hammitt, a native of the Sunshine State, who was born at Spencer, S. Dak., January 6, 1893. Mr. Hammitt was a pianist, band director, and composer. He directed an orchestra and the Alcester community band for 25 years.

This band played at the World's Fair in Chicago 2 years, the Belle Fourche round-up 2 years, the South Dakota State Fair 2 years, and at the Mitchell Corn Palace, and many other important engagements.

At the Belle Fourche round-up this song was first introduced to President and Mrs. Calvin Coolidge, who had established their summer White House in South Dakota in 1927. Mr. Hammitt received a personal letter of praise from President Coolidge for the composition.

Here are the words of—

HAIL, SOUTH DAKOTA

Hail, South Dakota, a great State of the land,
Health, wealth, and beauty, that's what makes her grand;
She has her Black Hills, and mines with gold so rare,
And with her scen'ry, no State can compare.

Come where the sun shines, and where life's worth your while,
You won't be here long, 'till you'll wear a smile;
No State's so healthy, and no folk quite so true,
To South Dakota, we all welcome you.

Hail, South Dakota, the State we love the best,
Land of our fathers, builders of the West;
Home of the Badlands, and Rushmore's ageless shrine,
Black Hills and prairies, farm land and sunshine (hills, farms, and prairies, blessed with bright sunshine).

General MacArthur's Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "General MacArthur's Case," which appeared in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch on April 20, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL MACARTHUR'S CASE

General MacArthur, before Congress, evoked in support of his views on Korean policy all the emotions aroused by his homecoming and the admiration due to a distinguished military career. He played upon the Nation's feelings. In effect, he asked the Nation, because it sympathized with him, to agree with him. He used his dramatic talents to seek a verdict from a jury gripped by tempestuous passions.

The jury's duty, however, is to reach its verdict the hard way—by reason, by a measured judgment of the national interest. As the passions ebb, it becomes increasingly clear that General MacArthur gave his own answer to himself.

In describing the consequences of China's intervention in Korea, he said a new situation had been created which "called for new decisions in the diplomatic sphere." In recounting his advocacy of military policies to expand the war, he said "I have constantly called for the new political decisions essential to a solution."

General MacArthur said these decisions have not been forthcoming. It would have been more accurate to say that the decisions have been made, in the political and diplomatic sphere where they must be made, and that they have gone against him.

The basic decision was, as President Truman expressed it last week, that "we do not want to see the conflict in Korea extended. We are trying to prevent a world war, not to start one."

The decision was, as General Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, expressed it this week, that "any recommended course of action which would enlarge the present war is contrary to our best interests, and, by jeopardizing world peace, ultimately would threaten our security."

As he appeared before Congress, General MacArthur was appealing from that verdict of his civilian and military superiors. There had been much speculation that he would disprove the charge of insubordination, but he did not even try. Unlike General Bradley, who said "conduct of foreign affairs is a civilian responsibility," General MacArthur summoned all his prestige to support his own view of how those affairs should be conducted.

Essentially, his view is that the Nation is at war and that "in war there is no substitute for victory." President Truman, General Bradley, and the other responsible architects of policy would agree that in war there is no substitute for victory, but they would deny that the Nation is at war. Rather the Nation is trying to avoid war; it is fighting a defensive battle on behalf of the United Nations, not an offensive war for the total destruction of an enemy. What would be an appropriate military policy for the latter situation is not an appropriate political policy for the former.

General MacArthur sought to give the impression that from a military standpoint the Joint Chiefs of Staff agree with him that Manchuria should be bombed, Chiang Kai-shek landed on the mainland, and China blockaded. Perhaps they would agree if the only considerations were military, but General Bradley has made it more than clear that on a higher plane our foreign policy and our military policy are united on the course of containing rather than expanding the war.

As a soldier, General MacArthur loathes a military stalemate. He wants no less than total victory in Korea. All of us would prefer that, but a Korean victory purchased at the cost of deep military involvement on the Chinese mainland would be no victory. And when it comes to General MacArthur's belief that we could expand the war just enough to suit our own purposes without entangling ourselves in an endless Asiatic conflict, all he really offers in support of that belief is his personal hunch that the Chinese are already fully engaged, and that the Russians would not choose to intervene directly.

It cannot be forgotten that last fall General MacArthur also had a hunch that the Chinese would not intervene. As he was unable then to limit the war just short of the Yalu, why should it be supposed that he could limit it now just on the other side?

General MacArthur has had his day—a colorful, dramatic, emotion-charged day. Now the Nation's task is to get on with the job of building peace. For that we need reason, prudence, thoughtful assessment of the total world problem, and loyalty to a firm purpose that if war comes it shall not be our doing.

Public Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHRISTOPHER C. McGRATH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep regret that the hundreds of thousands of people throughout the country who are in need of homes view the action of this body on May 4. The vote of 181 to 113, which cut the number of public housing units from 50,000 to 5,000, was a blow to each and every one of these families. I am proud, Mr. Speaker, of the fact that I cast my vote against that reduction.

The position of the distinguished mayor of the city of New York, and my former classmate, the Honorable Vincent R. Impellitteri, is best expressed in the telegram which I have received from him today:

The drastic cut in the construction of public housing units to 5,000 for the entire country during the fiscal year 1952 and subsequent years, voted by the House of Representatives in the independent offices appropriation bill on May 4, will virtually halt all public housing construction in New York

City under the Federal program. If the bill is not amended, it will delay indefinitely about 15,000 vitally needed apartments in the first 2-year program and 30,000 additional apartments now in preliminary planning stages. The machinery for relating housing construction to the Nation's materials problem exists in the National Production Authority, and we shall accept willingly all cut-backs determined by them to be necessary to defense. The action of the House of Representatives is unnecessary, and we urge that the bill be amended to eliminate the limitations on public housing.

VINCENT R. IMPELLITTERI,
Mayor of the City of New York.

I sincerely hope that the Senate will not only restore the 50,000 units but greatly increase the number, and that the conferees of the House will agree to an amendment.

General MacArthur's Effect on United States Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting editorial entitled "Effect of MacArthur," which appeared in the Wall Street Journal this morning, written by W. H. Grimes, the editor.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EFFECT OF MACARTHUR

WASHINGTON.—This is an attempt to estimate the effect General MacArthur has had on the policy in Korea and on this country's longer-range foreign policy.

The estimate is based on interviews with men of long experience in official life, who are thoroughly in formed on both foreign and military policy, whose attitude will influence their congressional colleagues and who are neither violently pro-MacArthur nor anti-MacArthur.

For the present the administration will not make any important change in its policy toward Korea; that is, it will continue to try to fight a limited war.

As to the future the prospects are different.

If the stalemate in Korea continues, or if the United Nations forces suffer reverses the administration will be under pressure to adopt General MacArthur's advice.

Regardless of the course in Korea, General MacArthur has influenced foreign policy. There will have to be stronger emphasis on Asia, or at least the appearance of it. And if the nations of Western Europe hold back or seem reluctant to cooperate fully, there may be difficulty in getting Congress to appropriate funds for economic aid to those nations.

Those trends will develop because of the pressure of a public sentiment, which is a surprise to most Members of Congress and which the administration has appeared to underestimate.

The telegrams and letters which followed General MacArthur's recall broke all records for numbers and for candor of expression. So much might have been expected. The unexpected feature is that the communications continue in large volume. And the reaction that usually follows such an emotional surge—and which President Truman predicted—has not appeared.

Two things might change the present prospects.

One would be a favorable military development in Korea or some arrangement for the cessation of fighting.

The other would be the dismissal of Secretary of State Acheson; there would be disposition in Congress and on the part of the public to give a new foreign policy spokesman a chance to prove himself and, for a period, criticism would be withheld or tempered.

Neither development is considered very likely.

It would be distinctly on the side of optimism to look for any early decisive change in Korea.

Mr. Truman apparently intends to keep Mr. Acheson and apparently Mr. Acheson intends to stay. Despite that determination there is an almost unanimous opinion that finally Mr. Acheson must go. But the probabilities are that he will go only after the damage to the administration's policy is well beyond repair.

General MacArthur convinced most of the Senators who heard his testimony that his recall was not necessary. He carried out fully all military orders; no one claims otherwise. He expressed publicly differences with political and diplomatic policy. But there is very good reason to believe that if General MacArthur had been fully informed as to the background and the reasons for decisions, if he had been told of the difficulties under which President Truman was operating, particularly those difficulties raised by the doubts of European nations, General MacArthur would have gone along and probably could have assisted the President. As it was he operated under orders the reasons for which he had only a vague notion.

The other impression that General MacArthur left was that of a man of unusual mental and physical qualifications.

For 3 days he sat continuously from midmorning until evening answering all the questions thrown at him. At no time was he at a loss for an answer and the answer was always clothed in precise language. Never was he led into an inadvertent statement. If all the questions asked of General MacArthur had been given to him 2 weeks in advance of the hearings so that he could have prepared his answers, the answers could have been no more precise than they were.

Only a well-organized mental machine is capable of doing what General MacArthur did and his precision of language stems from ability to think precisely. He asked for no recess of the long hearings and at their end the interrogators were more tired than General MacArthur.

Nevertheless General MacArthur did not entirely convince his senatorial audience that his advice should be followed.

One of the weaknesses of his case was that he conceded that he had the information to pass judgment only on his own theater in Asia. But the advice he offered would, if followed, be likely to have repercussions in places other than Asia. Faced with that, General MacArthur could not offer advice.

The second weakness was the impression of the better informed Senators that the general minimized the capabilities of the Russians in Asia.

General MacArthur's estimate of Russia was based on the judgment that Russian supply lines to the Pacific are not adequate to supply a major military campaign and that the campaign would grow weaker from the day it started. That may be true but it left unanswered to many Senators the situation that would result from a Russian decision to strike a quick sharp blow in anticipation of a quick victory.

Russia has considerable manpower close to Korea. Presumably the supplies and equipment for quick action by that manpower already are there. If Russia should strike in Korea with the aid of air power and submarines and at the same time invade Japan, the Russians and their allies conceivably could trap the entire United Nations army, destroying its base, cutting off its avenue of retreat by sea and leaving it no place to which to retreat.

It was surprising that Senator MCMAHON, who questioned General MacArthur most closely, did not emphasize this possibility, but instead chose to dwell on the possibility of a Russian atomic attack on this continent. In his replies to General MacArthur, President Truman has emphasized that same point of the danger of atomic attack.

No one can say that such a danger does not exist but to many it appears a more remote possibility than the possibility of Russian action in Korea.

Russia, it is argued, might hesitate to start a war with an atomic attack for two reasons. She is inferior in the number and development of atomic weapons. Such an attack would result in the whole non-Communist world immediately uniting against her and cooperating in a retaliatory attack.

But if the Russians judged that they could make a quick and successful grab in Asia without bringing the European nations into the conflict, they might try the gamble. If the Allied Nations were split the United States would not have European bases from which to launch attacks on Russia's vital industries. It could bomb from Pacific bases but the vital industries and installations of Russia would be far distant from those bases.

Whether the Russians really believe they can do this or whether they will attempt it no one outside Russia knows or pretends to know.

But to a great many it seems a more immediate consideration than the danger of an atomic attack.

The testimony of General Marshall has touched this point and very probably the parts of his testimony not made public have developed the point to a greater degree than appears in the parts made public.

A Report on New England

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Walter H. Wheeler, Jr., president of the New England Council and also president of Pitney-Bowes, Inc., of Stamford, Conn., delivered at the annual New England congressional dinner, held on April 30, 1951, in Washington.

Mr. Wheeler calls attention to the continued good health of the New England economy and its remarkable record of production during World War II and in the current crisis. That is good news for New England, and certainly bad news for its critics, who claim our economy is slipping.

May I, at this time, thank Mr. Wheeler for calling attention to the beneficial nature of the Senate small business clinics which I recently conducted in Connecticut, at Stamford and Norwich. I started the first of these clinics at Bridgeport last summer, and also last year held others at Hartford and New Haven. As a result, some 60 other small business clinics, attended by 40,000 small, independent businessmen, have been held throughout the country, all sponsored by the Senate Small Business Committee, of which I am a member.

I would also like to take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate the New England Council on securing Mr. Wheeler as its president, and may I congratulate also its other four top executives for what many of my friends, constituents, and business acquaintances say has been a remarkable job in promoting the development of our industries and over-all economy. These men are, in addition to Mr. Wheeler, Robert P. Tibolt, treasurer; H. Ladd Smith, secretary; and Dudley Harmon, executive vice president.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A REPORT ON NEW ENGLAND

(By W. H. Wheeler, Jr.)

When I realized that I was expected to make a report on New England at this dinner, I had mixed feelings. It's an honor to be addressing the members of New England's distinguished delegation to the Eighty-second Congress. But it takes a lot of courage to speak for New England. There is nothing presumptuous about a Texan speaking for Texas, or a Californian speaking for California, or a southerner speaking for the South. But let a man attempt to speak loudly for New England, and he is likely to be disowned, if not dismembered.

New England is a region consisting of six States, and nine-million-odd inhabitants. I use that word "odd" advisedly. Webster, an old New Englander, defines "odd" as meaning unusual, singular, strange. Since we are all New Englanders here tonight, let us agree that we are unusual, certainly; singular, always, and strange—well, by the standards of that minority which populates the rest of the country, I suppose we are that, too.

I want to report tonight on New England's current health and problems. And if I happen to slip my small frame into the report from time to time, I trust no one will know the difference.

The present health of our New England economy is good. Our industrial employment exceeds the 1948 peak, and it is continuing to rise. Nonmanufacturing employment likewise has increased. Building contracts for the first quarter of this year are 13 percent greater than for the same period last year, and department store sales are also higher.

New England so far has been awarded about 10 percent of all the publicly announced defense contracts placed since Korea. This is a shade better than our record for World War II, but it must be noted that a good portion of these contracts is accounted for by textile orders—which aren't likely to continue at the same rate for the duration of the defense program.

Many of our smaller industries are suffering from materials shortages for civilian production, resulting from the requirements of the defense production program. We realize, of course, that these shortages are inevitable, and that there is not a great deal the Government can do about many of them. However, all of us can and are doing all possible to bring together the large prime contractors and those small manufacturers who must have subcontracts if they are to maintain normal employment.

The council and other New England organizations have been glad to cooperate with your House of Representatives Select Committee on Small Business in its schedule of hearings recently held in New England. And we have also been encouraged by the work done by the Senate Small Business Committee, which held hearings in Connecticut 2 weeks ago. The efforts of these committees are deeply appreciated by your constituents, I can assure you.

New England appreciated the action of the joint committee of the New England delegation in convening last March 2 a 1-day conference with spokesmen for defense and other agencies of the Federal Government, in which the New England Governors and the New England council were invited to participate. This is exactly the sort of initiative and cooperative action badly needed if our region is to make its maximum contribution in the defense emergency and if it is to thrive and grow in peace time. We hope such meetings may be continued.

One of New England's most serious problems is the number of antiquated plants and equipment in the region. New England needs a production face-lifting more than any other section of the country. For more than 25 years, the council has hammered away at this problem, encouraging industries to modernize and expand their facilities and install new equipment. We have made some progress, but it is a long and slow job.

During the last war I can remember how proud we were of the fact that New England, with only 6 percent of the population, turned out almost 9 percent of the Nation's war production, and did this with less than half of what might have been its expected share of new defense plants. We were proud of this record, and with some justification, since every bit of material and labor spent on plant expansion detracted from weapons of war immediately needed. In a typical Yankee way, we did much with little.

The present situation is different, however. We are trying to lift our national productive capacity for a long pull, even at some sacrifice of the immediate availability of armament. If we fail to expand our productive capacity when encouraged by tax relief from accelerated amortization, we will suffer a great disadvantage in years to come.

To date, 55 certificates of necessity granting such accelerated amortization have been given to New England concerns, covering new plant and equipment in the amount of about $96,000,000. The Government has granted, all told, about 1,000 certificates totaling $4,500,000,000. The $96,000,000 we have in New England is only about 2 percent of this total. Considering that we have over 8 percent of the industrial production, it is apparent we aren't going after and getting what we should by a long margin.

Even if we include the steel mill certificate—and the mill is hardly an ordinary project, nor can we be sure it will be built—the proportion is only a little over 7 percent of the total awarded, and is still far short of what we should be getting. We have got to be more aggressive, all of us, in taking advantage of the opportunity to serve ourselves, and at the same time, serve our Nation.

Last year, you will recall, Mr. Joseph Erickson, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, brought to your attention in his able address certain features of Federal legislation which, on the whole, did not help New England. Among these were the farm price-support programs, which has since been modified by the withdrawal of price supports from eggs, poultry, and potatoes. But the price-support policy on other farm products still works to the disadvantage of New England, by keeping food prices artificially high.

I don't have to point out to you the vital interest our region has in the importation of petroleum products. Any tariff or other restriction on their importation places and added burden on our economy. Venezuela is now the only source of foreign oil open to us at the lower tariff rate of one-fourth cent per gallon. Doubtless that rate also will be increased eventually, and New England, distant from domestic oil supply, will pay a good part of the bill.

Similarly, the reimposition of the duty on foreign copper, suspended during the war, was an act of Congress distinctly not helpful to New England and its thousands of metal-working industries. The recent action of the House and Senate in approving a bill which once more would suspend the copper duty for a period of 22½ months was gratifying, in spite of the fact that it compromises what we would have preferred.

We have been greatly heartened by the progress made during the last 12 months in getting natural gas to our area. New England is the last important industrial area of the country to be served by this fuel. There have been disturbing rumors that it may be difficult to get the steel for completing the necessary pipelines. I am sure we can count on your help to obtain our fair share after military requirements are cared for.

New England transportation interests have appealed the decision by the Interstate Commerce Commission refusing to lower the export rail rates on grain from the Great Lakes to North Atlantic ports, and from New York to Portland. If we are successful in this grain case we may also be able to secure reduction of export rail rates on other commodities and hence encourage the use of our port facilities. In 1950 import tonnage at Boston was 20 times the export tonnage. Lack of export tonnage discourages sailings from Boston and other New England ports.

Our woolen-textile industries are currently facing a difficult situation. Confronted with the fantastic rise in the price of wool, plus the lack of a Government price order adjusted to the realities of the situation, some of our woolen mills have found it impossible to continue to operate and have closed their doors. It is to be hoped that the price-control authorities will not delay further in affording relief to this essential industry, on which so many of our people depend for employment.

Our most serious problem is our need for the basic raw materials which our industries use, but which for the most part are available in New England only at high transportation costs. I have mentioned petroleum, copper, and natural gas, but there are two metals which have fundamental significance, I believe. They are steel and aluminum. Our industries are large users of both metals.

There seems to be no real prospect for New England to acquire an aluminum ore reduction mill because we lack large quantities of very low cost power. But that does not mean we could not have an aluminum rolling mill, provided we can import the raw material at competitive prices. I believe investigation should be made to determine what degree of reduction of the tariff on aluminum imported from eastern Canada would be necessary to bring this about.

I think most of you are familiar with the effort to get a steel mill located in New England, started by the New England council in 1946. On April 20 our New England Steel Development Corp. received the long-awaited Coverdale & Colpitts report on the feasibility of a mill located in New London. The report, paid for by the State of Connecticut, fully justifies our efforts by stating that our market would support a mill in the upper 25 percent of the industry in size, and that there is no inherent reason why it should not operate at New London as successfully as a new mill built anywhere.

The one obstacle is the high capital cost of any new mill, as related to possible earnings at prevailing steel prices. For this reason and this reason only, the report points out that the mill is impractical as a venture by a new and independent company. But the report suggests that it may well be practical for a large existing company against whose excess-profits taxes, at the 77 percent rate, the investment in the mill might be written down in 5 years from $220,000,000 to $85,000,000. This would be possible, of course, only by reason of the accelerated amortization allowed by the certificate of necessity we have obtained. Thus, under these conditions the investment would become comparable to that in competing mills.

There is an interesting point to be made here, I think. The Federal Government in recent years believes it has been following a policy of encouraging and helping small business. It certainly has been keeping big business constantly on the defensive. While there is a strong American tradition for helping small business, the attack on big business, merely because it is big, frequently has unanticipated results, hurting small business. Steel is a case in point. The steel industry, which is big, has been subject to Government attack for a long time, with the result that in the opinion of many it hasn't charged as much for steel as the enormous capital investment requires. Steel expansion, therefore, has been slow, because the capital cost couldn't be justified by the profits to be expected.

So when national survival requires that we get more steel production fast, the Government must grant certificates of necessity, which amount to tax rebate subsidies, in order to encourage new investment. And these, of course, favor the big companies because they are only advantageous if a company has large earnings subject to excess-profits taxes. Even with certificates, the building of a new mill involves considerable gambling on the future tax structure.

This whole problem is worth objective study, I think, because it is obviously one that works to the disadvantage of everyone. It works against small companies who depend on steel, as well as new small steel companies which might be starting; and it makes it difficult for the large steel-producing companies to build mills in areas like New England, where they are badly needed.

We have not, by any means, given up hope of interesting an existing company, and we may well be successful. I can assure you we will leave no opportunity unexplored. We have asked for an extension of our certificate, which expires May 12, and I am hopeful it will be granted—probably for 60 days.

In conclusion, I should like to pay a very sincere tribute to all of you who serve New England in Congress. We men in business sometimes fall into a loose habit of talking about politics as though it were a profession to take a dim and cynical view of. Often I think it would do some of us a lot of good to do a stint of a year or two in Government ourselves. I'm sure it would heighten our respect for you who have the courage to step into the klieg-lighted public arena to represent your constituents and to serve the Nation.

It's a tough job. Every pressure to which you are subjected has its parallel in business life. I'm sure our New England business record of objectivity, courage and unselfishness would do well to equal the outstanding record of the New England congressional delegation. We can pay you no greater compliment than to say to you: You ably represent an area which prides itself on character as its greatest natural resource; and character is needed by the Nation in these days when freedom is on trial.

Necessity of Return to Fundamental Principles of Religion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address I delivered before the Presbyterian Historical Society of the Upper Ohio Valley, meeting in the Bethel Presbyterian Church, near Pittsburgh, on its one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary, May 7, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF UNITED STATES SENATOR EDWARD MARTIN, OF PENNSYLVANIA, BEFORE THE PRESBYTERIAN HISTORICAL SOCIETY OF THE UPPER OHIO VALLEY, MEETING IN BETHEL PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, NEAR PITTSBURGH, MAY 7, 1951

I deeply appreciate the honor and privilege of addressing this fine assembly in these beautiful and historic surroundings.

It is a real inspiration to come here on this notable occasion, marking the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of Old Bethel Church.

It would be most inappropriate for me to make a historical address in the presence of such outstanding scholars as Dr. Slosser and Dr. Anderson. They have given a lifetime of study to the history of southwestern Pennsylvania and of our church. They know the subject so much better than I do.

I am happy to be present at the inauguration of such an important project as the publication of a history of Presbyterianism west of the Alleghenies.

There is fascinating reading in the records of the early church organizations of this section. They form part of the glorious story of American growth and progress.

Here history was made by sturdy, courageous God-fearing men and women. They planted and cultivated the seeds of liberty and freedom of the individual. They strengthened the moral and spiritual foundation of our Nation's greatness.

Faith in God sustained them in their lives of toil, hardship, and sacrifice.

The pioneers who came into southwestern Pennsylvania in search of freedom and opportunity encountered high mountains, deep forests, wild beasts, and savage Indians.

Let us look back at those early days. There were no roads or bridges. There were no methods of communication, no utilities, no labor-saving devices, no public schools. There were no housing authorities, no social security, no loans, grants, or subsidies from the Government.

But the deeply religious men and women of all denominations braved the dangers of the savage wilderness with real courage. They were hard working and self reliant. They depended upon their own efforts to build security for themselves and their children.

The large number of churches organized in southwestern Pennsylvania in the late years of the seventeen hundreds was evidence of the vitality of religion in this pioneer area.

To hear the word of God the pioneer worshipers traveled long distances over the narrow frontier trails and forded the streams.

They had faith, vision and confidence. They worked hard and fought bravely, but they worshiped humbly and sincerely.

Their surroundings were simple and rough but the spirit of religion was just as strong as though they worshiped in a great cathedral.

How fortunate we are today that there has come down to us the teachings of the great Presbyterian leaders of those days—Dr. Thaddeus Dodd, Dr. Joseph Smith and Dr. John McMillan. They were men of high sourage, deep religious conviction and fine educational attainments.

They dedicated their lives to the service of God but also they were imbued with the spirit of individual freedom. They believed in the sacred ideals which were given expression in the Declaration of Independence. They recognized that the freedoms set forth in the Bill of Rights are not privileges granted by the Government but are bestowed by God upon all mankind.

They knew that no government can long endure without a strong church. They supported the American principle that the church and state must be separate if individual freedom and religious liberty are to be preserved.

But let me point out now that the church and state are bound together wherever there is freedom. No one can read the pages of history without coming to the inevitable conclusion that free religion is dependent upon free government, and free government is dependent upon religion.

Loss of freedom has always resulted wherever neglect of religion has caused a breakdown of morals and decency. Civic duty and religious duty are interwoven. It must be remembered that the moral standards of government cannot rise above the spiritual and cultural strength of the individual citizens.

We take great pride, here in America, that the sacred principles of tolerant religion are the foundation of our form of government.

In this struggle for independence the founding fathers placed "firm reliance on the protection of divine providence."

The ideals of our Republic are based on the eternal truths of the Holy Bible.

Nevertheless we have reached a time of great peril to American freedom. We are threatened by enemies abroad and by moral deterioration at home.

Evil influences have grown up amongst us that are undermining the moral structure of the United States.

In all walks of life there are men whose lives are ruled by selfishness and greed.

In its report last week the Kefauver Crime Committee revealed a sordid story of Nation-wide law evasion, racketeering, chiseling, and other corrupt products of an unholy desire for an easy way of life.

Organized crime syndicates operate across State lines and are taking from the people an estimated $20,000,000,000 a year.

Sinister alliances between the criminal element and some law-enforcement officers, endanger the lives and safety of our citizens.

Political power wielded by racketeers and gamblers has forced invisible government upon some cities and towns by influencing the election of corrupt officials.

Millions and millions of dollars—taken largely from families who can least afford to lose it, are being used by racketeers and gamblers to purchase political control of many American communities.

Corrupt officials in these towns and cities, bought by tainted millions, have put aside their sacred oaths and submit to the dictates of underworld gangsters.

And the most tragic situation confronting us is that so many of our people accept these dishonest practices as necessary evils—a form of wickedness that we cannot escape.

What is responsible for this attitude?

I think the answer lies in a lack of appreciation of our civic duties and failure to recognize the responsibilities of Christian citizenship.

Too many of our people have forgotten that the true greatness of America is not our material wealth but the spiritual strength and character of our people.

Many of our citizens, who are thoroughly honest in their private lives, are so indifferent to matters affecting the public welfare.

They forget that bad public officials are elected by good citizens who ignore or neglect the basic obligation of citizenship and do not even take the trouble to vote on election day.

Two hundred years ago Edmund Burke, the great English statesman, declared: "All that is necessary for the triumph of evil is that good men do nothing."

Yes; today, as in the time of Edmund Burke, evil will triumph when good men do nothing.

Good men like Dr. Dodd, Dr. Smith, and Dr. McMillan were cast in a different mold. They were not men who could stand idly by and do nothing when government became unclean.

They put all their strength and vigor into the fight for good government. They preached obedience to the laws of God and man. They did not hesitate to become active in politics in order to elect men of upright moral character to public office.

They realized that cleaning up crime and upholding a high moral standard was the job of the local community—not the Federal Government.

They recognized that clean, decent government could not be maintained without adherence to the fundamental principles of religion.

You will recall that during the Whisky Insurrection the farmers of southwestern Pennsylvania banded together to defy the power of the new Federal Government to levy a tax on distilled spirits.

Dr. McMillan took a courageous stand, not only in his pulpit but also in public meetings. He battled on the side of law and order, even though that position was extremely unpopular with the majority of his congregation.

To hold the line for righteousness—in and out of government—we need an army of preachers and active laymen with the courage of Dr. McMillan.

Unless the moral forces of our communities arouse themselves to drive out racketeers and grafters there can be no hope of clean, decent, honest government.

The most effective leadership in that direction should and must come from the pulpit and from the great body of laymen who hold official positions in our church organizations.

The ills from which our Nation suffers today can be overcome if we have a strong, militant church, battling day in and day out, for good, sound, clean, economical government.

I repeat—the church is the foundation upon which our form of government rests. It is the basis of our character as a Nation. It is our hope for a future of national integrity, honor, and justice.

That is why I say that every good citizen, every churchgoer, should take an intelligent, patriotic, and militant part in government.

That means taking part in politics. It means working for the election of men of integrity and high character. It means working to drive out of office every politician whose objective is personal gain and personal power, rather than public service.

It means taking an active interest in community affairs, in State, National, and world problems.

It means arousing public opinion to a higher standard of morality, to inspire deeper respect for the law and to assure confidence in the integrity of our officials and our courts.

An informed and aroused electorate could overnight transform corruption into sound government by turning grafting officials out of office.

Immoral practices which enrich criminals and corrupt officials are cancers on the body politic. They should be removed by criminal prosecutions and ballot-box surgery before the disease spreads further, whether it is found in the Republican or the Democratic Party.

Victory over the racketeers and grafters can be won only if every right-thinking, law-abiding citizen takes an interest in government.

And good government, in our Republic, is the greatest safeguard of individual freedom, including the most precious of all—freedom of religion.

The crying need of the hour is for a great spiritual rearmament, not only in America but all over the world.

If we are to save America and preserve our sacred freedoms we must crusade for a return to the fundamental principles of religion.

With faith, we can strengthen the historic mission of the United States—to lead the world in progress under God for justice, freedom, and peace.

The Voice of America: Echo of "the Voice"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, as a minor but interesting piece of testimony of the value of the Voice of America broadcasts, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD the article entitled "Echo of 'the Voice'" in last Sunday's New York Times magazine section. May I suggest that this points up the need for the stronger radio facilities requested by the President and the State Department? Unhappily the request for needed funds has recently been refused by the Appropriations Committees of the Congress.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ECHO OF "THE VOICE"

(An anonymous word from behind Hungary's iron curtain reaches this country now and then. Such was the letter postmarked Budapest, signed "A Hungarian who is obliged to conceal his name," recently received here in response to a Voice of America message of good will. Mrs. Margaret Szatmar, of New York, a Hungarian-born American, later read it back over the air in a broadcast expressing the solicitude of Americans for their unknown friends in Hungary.)

DEAR MADAM: At the moment when I am writing this letter I do not yet know how shall I be able to smuggle it out from behind the iron curtain. I would not trust the Hungarian postal service, and the letterbox of the American Legation in Budapest is being constantly watched by the "shock workers of freedom of expression and news gathering." Tonight, as every night, we were listening to the Voice of America. I felt that I must write you because your letter sounded to us as the word of real peace that stems from a human heart. We, here, are hearing all day long of peace. We know it, however, better than anybody else that the loud noises they make are only for the purpose of muffling the clatter of the wolf's teeth.

I am working in a Budapest factory. Many people are working in this factory, and we are having a lot of conversation among ourselves. I can therefore truthfully say that this letter could have been written by any one of my overworked fellow workers. We all feel exactly the same way and hate our oppressors. We all have our hopes in your great and free country. Your freedom-loving people is the last hope of the people of our small country, which has been, in the past, many times betrayed and abandoned by its friends.

You, dear madam, write in your letter that your son soon will become a soldier. Your eyes in motherly anxiety see tragedy ahead. You foresee that your son will be forced to fight our sons. We, too, see this coming. God will forgive us the sin of having prayed that war should come. Our present peace, however, is no peace at all. We cannot speak of peace in this world of hate, fear, tyranny, work for starvation wages under inhuman pressure, without the peace of souls.

Your son must change his home for the military training camp and give up his peaceful constructive life in order to save you and your loved ones and your whole people from the fate that overtook us.

Madam, do tell your son, your acquaintances, and everybody that we, here behind the iron curtain, shall not fight your sons. We don't want to fight at all. We want peace, but not such a peace as we are now having. We want a peace that is similar to that you are having, and not the phony peace of godlessness, of slave-driving, of fear and lies. We see with rejoicing that your country is assembling all the forces of the whole free world against those who are trying to menace the world's peace.

We are unable to do much at the present time. We have no voice. Anyone who dares to raise a single dissenting sound against the prevailing tyranny will forever disappear and will be swallowed up in one of the forced-labor camps of the oriental tyranny that doesn't tolerate opposition. Madam, you cannot exactly judge life as it exists here. The distance between us dulls the sad voice of the oppressed millions. You cannot have full conception of the kind of life our life really is. It is proper and good that you mustn't get a real taste of this kind of life.

We are praying for your sons who are fighting also for our liberty in far-away Korea. We hope that the great strength of your country will banish the reign of tyranny from all over the world. I pray God's blessing for your people, and am sending my love from behind the iron curtain.

Israel's Anniversary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FOSTER FURCOLO

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. FURCOLO. Mr. Speaker, the rebirth of the State of Israel is a unique event in world history. We, in this country, take note of this event with a great deal of pride because it was the United States which played such an important part in the rebirth of modern Israel as an independent state and in helping it during these few short years since its creation.

Israel is now celebrating 3 years of independent existence. It has proved to the world that within this brief space of 3 years it has reached political maturity and it is possessed of an indomitable spirit for the good of all mankind. I am particularly proud of the friendly relations existing between the people of our own country and the people of Israel which is an important factor in helping to make their nation strong and free.

Although the world in which Israel has taken its rightful place as a sovereign state is far from peaceful, the citizens of the new state along the shores of the eastern Mediterranean should feel most deeply the great friendship which is directed toward them by the nations and the peoples of the free world who are encouraged by their achievements in the last 3 years. On this occasion it is worth remembering that these achievements were obtained after much suffering and sacrifice on the part of the Jewish people.

It is for this reason that freedom-loving people everywhere join with the Jews in this country and with the people of Israel in celebrating this memorable event—the third anniversary of the reestablishment of the centuries-old dream of a Jewish national homeland.

The MacArthur Investigation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Another 'Pearl Harbor Inquiry'," by David Lawrence, published in the Evening Star of today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANOTHER "PEARL HARBOR INQUIRY"—ADMINISTRATION MUST HAVE THOUGHT MACARTHUR WAS MIND READER 10,000 MILES AWAY

(By David Lawrence)

It's just another Pearl Harbor investigation all over again.

Back in December 1941, General Marshall and Admiral Stark thought that someone had told General Short and Admiral Kimmel what Washington knew about the forthcoming attack through breaking the Japanese code—but nobody did tell them.

Today, it comes out that the President and the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense and Special Assistant Averell Harriman and General Bradley, who advised that General MacArthur be summarily dismissed, never told him that any of the public statements he had made during the preceding 4 weeks were violative of military orders or any other orders relating to policy statements.

The administration may have thought that General MacArthur, at a distance of 10,000 miles, was a mind reader and as well informed about the state of mind of persons in Washington as were the five men who fired him, but there is not a single bit of evidence in the record after 3 days of testimony to support that point.

In fact, the official record gets worse and worse for the administration in revealing the same kind of bad liaison in the last few months with Tokyo as the War and Navy Departments had with Pearl Harbor 10 years ago.

Not a single word of disapproval went to General MacArthur on December 6 last, when a general directive was issued advising all departments and all persons in the field as well as in Washington to clear policy statements with the departments back home. Although General Marshall now testifies that the administration didn't like General MacArthur's answers to the questions of the press prior to December 6—even though they primarily concerned military matters in his theater of action—not a word of such criticism was ever relayed to General MacArthur. He could as easily have inferred that there were no complaints here.

Not a single word of criticism or of any other kind went to General MacArthur specifically referring to his own statements or pointing out any deviation from policy to him between December 6, 1950, when the general directive was issued, and the day he was dismissed—April 11, 1951.

The now famous letter which General MacArthur wrote in routine fashion, answering an inquiry from Representative JOSEPH MARTIN, Republican, of Massachusetts, was dated March 20, at Tokyo. Although he had written letters to Members of Congress and had talked with them in Tokyo during a period of nearly 6 years and they had made public the views which the general gave them, not a single word of criticism of his relations with Members of Congress had ever been conveyed to him by his superiors in Washington.

When, on March 24 last, General MacArthur addressed a plea to the Chinese commander to agree to a "cease fire," not a single word of the statement or declaration being planned by the Government here—and which it says it was circulating among 13 governments—had been sent to General MacArthur for his information. Actually it is reliably reported that he had prepared his communication to the Chinese commander 10 days before and was waiting for an opportune moment to release it. Likewise, Trygve Lie, Secretary General of the U. N., has since stated publicly that a military commander in the field has a right to address the enemy commander on armistice terms at any time.

The message that was sent to General MacArthur saying the State Department was "planning" some kind of a peace offer to the Red Chinese did not give him any details. It was a speculative message and failed to instruct him not to make any communication on this or any other subject related to it. The home-office manager who failed to keep a branch manager better informed than that on company policy would be the one dismissed in American business today.

Even when the MacArthur statement to the Chinese commander was published, the Joint Chiefs merely asked him a day afterward to be sure and report if any request for armistice came from the enemy commander. There was not a word of criticism or of approval or disapproval sent General MacArthur concerning that statement to the Red Chinese commander.

Secretary Marshall has testified, moreover, that it was an "accumulation" of things that caused the dismissal, but what it looks like is an accumulation of hostile thoughts pent up somewhere in the Pentagon and the White House which came to a head when General MacArthur answered a letter that Representative MARTIN, on his own initiative, made public.

Some Foreign Policy Successes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, even at the expense of repeating the facts which should be well-known to all by this time, I would like to call to the attention of the membership of this House an editorial which appeared in the Milwaukee Journal of May 7, 1951, which clearly and concisely recapitulates some of the main points and achievements of our foreign policy in the past.

Mr. Speaker, I would particularly like to call this article—which requires mere 3 minutes' time to read—to the attention of those Members who are repeatedly shouting about the vacuum which is supposed to exist in our foreign policy. It may prove of special interest to them, and the record will show, to those who are interested, just how did these Members vote and support the measures and actions summarized in the following editorial:

SOME FOREIGN POLICY SUCCESSES

It is being charged with increasing irresponsibility that the United States has no foreign policy, that our military and diplomatic leaders are "drifting" that we have failed to take a strong stand against communism.

What is the record?

Was the decision to aid Greece a program that stopped Communist aggression in southeast Europe, a policy of "drift"?

Was there lack of action and determination in the Turkish aid program which made that nation a southern bastion against Russia?

Was there lack of imagination and inaction in the Marshall plan, which saved Europe from economic collapse?

Was the North Atlantic defense pact softness toward communism?

Did the Berlin airlift, which bucked the Russian plan to squeeze us out, show lack of courage and determination?

Is our sending American troops to Europe in peacetime a passive subjection to Russia?

Was our decision to stand against Communist aggression in Korea in company with the United Nations appeasement of communism?

Of course not.

All of these program and the decisions which led to them were courageous, bold, imaginative, and clear warnings to the Communist world. Each was the opposite of appeasement. Each hurt communism and hobbled Russia's program for expansion and aggression. Each saved a part of the free world and strengthened the whole of the free world.

Each has had the support of most Americans and the approval of the majority of Congress.

Who made these decisions and took these actions which have no peacetime parallel in American history? The administration—the political, military, and diplomatic leaders of both parties who are still directing our foreign and military policies.

By what logic does anyone believe that men who were capable of such successful and realistic programs and policies should suddenly become inept drifters, appeasers and not deserving of confidence?

These men—again, men who represent both parties—have been a winning combination. They have made errors, of course. But does a baseball manager break up a winning team every time a shortstop overthrows first base or an infielder misjudges a fly ball? Does he throw mud at his no-hit pitchers because somebody suddenly shouts, for no reason at all, that they are winning only in an attempt to lose the pennant?

Of course not. It doesn't make sense, either in baseball or in what today are the most important problems of our lives—military and foreign affairs.

The Lights of Freedom Are Flickering Out, Even in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, in Canada, a young man at 18 remains free. He can go to school, get a job, farm a piece of land, join the army, and so forth. He has freedom of choice and freedom of opportunity. When World War II ended, conscription was dropped in Canada.

In America a young man at 18 loses freedom. His life is at the disposal of the Government at Washington. Aside from forced military service overseas, our borders become a prison wall. He cannot even leave this country as a permanent emigrant—to seek freedom and his future elsewhere. No passport will be issued to him until he is discharged from conscript army service.

How serious to America is this blackout of freedom? However it may be explained, it is a sobering fact. Millions of our ancestors came to America for one primary reason—to escape from the evils of conscript army service in Europe.

The explanation of conscript military service, known by the sugary title of selective service, is that it is necessary for our national defense. But what is national defense? I have tried to find out what it embraces.

I submitted this question to the Department of Defense: "What area of the earth's surface do the Joint Chiefs of Staff believe United States guns must defend, if our national safety is to be preserved?"

Here is their answer of April 4:

Thank you very much for your letter of March 27 and for the interest you have shown in the problems of our national security.

The question propounded in your letter is one which could not be answered by the Joint Chiefs of Staff since it deals with matters outside the scope of their jurisdiction. As I know you will understand, the task of the Joint Chiefs is a professional one involving all phases of military preparation and strategy. It does not include the making of foreign policy with which your question more or less deals. Once the appropriate governmental authorities have decided that an area of the earth's surface is to be defended by United States forces, it is then that the task of the Joint Chiefs of Staff begins; it would be up to them to decide how that particular area would be defended.

It would appear that your question is one that could be answered only by the Chief Executive in conjunction with officials of the Department of State and the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

H. A. HOUSER,
Rear Admiral, USN, Director, Office of Legislative Liaison.

MacArthur Knows Asiatic Mind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "MacArthur Knows Asiatic Mind," written by Constantine Brown, and published in the Washington Star today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MACARTHUR KNOWS ASIATIC MIND—GENERAL WAS CONVINCED PRESENCE OF RUSSIAN FORCES WOULD NOT UPSET STRATEGY HE WAS ADVOCATING

(By Constantine Brown)

Administration spokesmen have contended that the strategy advocated by General MacArthur, of hitting the Chinese bases in Manchuria, would be disastrous because it might bring us into a shooting war with Russia. They based their arguments on the existence of a mutual assistance pact between Moscow and her far eastern satellites.

The treaty was concluded in January 1950, at Moscow. The alliance was signed not only by representatives of the U. S. S. R. and China, but also by North Korea. It provides, among other things, for reciprocal help in the event of an aggression by Japan or any other nation allied with Japan.

If Russia had intended to make an issue of the present conflict and intervene, she could have taken the mutual assistance pact as the basis for extending the Korean local war into a global conflict.

Although the Korean armies were smashed and the United Nations forces occupied almost all of North Korean territory last fall, the Soviet forces did not enter the fight. Instead, the Chinese Communists were pushed in, without Peiping invoking the January 1950 alliance, however.

Similarly, it is said now by the supporters of the MacArthur win-the-war strategy, there is little likelihood that the mutual assistance agreement would be brought into play by Russia, if our Air Force were to strike at the Manchurian concentrations and air bases, unless she already has decided that the time is ripe to unleash world war III.

In his testimony before the Joint Senate Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committee this week, Defense Secretary Marshall pointed out specifically that the knowledge of the existence of that alliance between Russia and her two Asiatic satellites was considered when the decision was made against using Japanese troops in the Korean war, even as auxiliaries for supply in the rear.

If this mutual assistance pact, it can be argued now, were not used when the allies occupied most of the territory of one of the signatories, why would the bombardment of bases in Manchuria be the cause for direct Soviet intervention in the war?

Russia remained nominally neutral when the North Korean forces were being destroyed. Is there any reason to believe that she would act differently if Allied planes performed a logical strategic operation in Manchuria? Insofar as Moscow is concerned, the territory of its North Korean ally should be as inviolable as that of her Chinese puppet.

General Marshall disclosed the fact that the Russians have a large ground and air force in Siberia and on the Chinese-Korean border. This has been known, unofficially, for the last 3 months. Last April the Speaker of the House, SAM RAYBURN, made some significant allusions to that situation.

But even before Mr. RAYBURN took the floor to announce ominously the concentration of forces "which were not Chinese," this column had reported that some 17 Soviet divisions were massed in that area; that a strong Soviet air force was being assembled for potential support; that among the 17 divisions were at least four paratroop divisions; and that approximately three Japanese divisions, with men carefully picked from the Japanese Kwantung army, had been placed in Southern Sakhalin, a Japanese possession handed over to the U. S. S. R. at Yalta, for a possible attack on Hokkaido, the largest of the northern Japanese Islands.

This intelligence reached Washington early this year from General MacArthur's headquarters in Tokyo.

There is no question that the ousted commander had considered that situation when he urged that this country and the United Nations take off their gloves in the Korean war.

It appears that General MacArthur, who unquestionably knows the Asiatic mentality and the capabilities of those forces better than do high officials in Washington, did not think that the presence of the Russian forces could be fatal to the strategy he was advocating.

The Crime Problem in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, like other members of the Senate Crime Investigating Committee, I have noted with tremendous interest an avalanche of editorial comments throughout the country based on Senate Report 307, the third interim report filed by our group.

As one of the authors of the Wiley-Tobey resolution—Senate Resolution 129—extending the life of this committee until September 1, 1951, I have naturally been particularly delighted to note the heartwarming reactions from all over our country to this matter of additional time for the forces of law and order at the Federal level to help local law enforcement groups throughout our country.

ARTICLES ON CRIME PROBLEM

At this time, I have in my hand a miscellaneous variety of comments from the Nation's press both as regards the work of our crime committee and on the general subject of crime itself.

The initial item is an editorial from the Thursday, May 3, issue of the Washington Evening Star. One of the features of this editorial is a presentation of the reasons for my opposition to the idea of a Federal Crime Commission—an approach which has been shared with me by our leading law enforcement officials, including J. Edgar Hoover.

MARQUIS CHILDS' COLUMN

I have in my hand as a second item an article written by Mr. Marquis Childs, Washington columnist, with regard to this third interim report. Mr. Childs' hard-hitting and controversial comments refer initially to the unfortunate leaks and advance publication of committee statements. He has also commented on other phases of the problem including the internal revenue laws, immigration recommendations, and finally he has taken up the matter of a Federal crime commission which he, too, opposes in the interest of American civil liberties.

The third item I have is an editorial from the Janesville (Wis.) Gazette which kindly points up the comments which I made regarding the role of the individual citizen in combating crime.

The fourth item is a very provocative column by Mr. Ivan H. Peterman as published in the Friday, March 23, 1951, issue of the Philadelphia Inquirer. This article incidentally was reprinted and sent to me by Mr. Moriz Dreyfus, of Philadelphia, as his contribution to greater public understanding of the problem of crime.

ARTICLE FROM FRONT PAGE DETECTIVE

The fifth item that I have is an editorial entitled "How to Get Rid of the Crooks," by the distinguished former chairman of the California Commission on Organized Crime, Admiral William H. Standley. When I was in California with the Crime Committee, in both Los Angeles and San Francisco I heard tremendously fine reactions on the work which had been performed by this California Crime Commission.

We are proud that its former chief investigator, Mr. Harold G. Robinson, was also our chief investigator from the inception of the committee. Today Mr. Robinson is an assistant to Mr. Pat Brown, the attorney general of the State of California. This editorial by Admiral Standley is from the July 1951 issue of the magazine Front Page Detective, issued by the Dell Publishing Co., of New York.

Mr. President, taken together, these articles and editorials furnish an interesting commentary regarding the reactions of the American people to the crime problem. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials and articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star of May 3, 1951]

NO NEED FOR UNITED STATES CRIME COMMISSION

The Kefauver committee placed the blame for the "crisis of law enforcement" in America where the responsibility properly rests—on State, county, and municipal governments. Any breakdown of local law enforcement is an invitation to racketeers, hoodlums, and criminals generally to set up shop and take over. There is little that the Federal Government can do about such conditions. The committee is right in contending that the job of cleaning up crime must be done largely by local prosecuting agencies, police departments, and courts. It is surprising, therefore, to find a majority of the committee advocating, somewhat inconsistently, the establishment of a Federal crime commission to make a "continuing study and surveillance of operations of interstate criminal organizations throughout the country."

That is a large order for a three-man commission of the type suggested. The commission also would be required to maintain "files and records as a national clearing house of information respecting criminal activities in interstate commerce." That is even a larger order. Other duties, including liaison between Federal and State anticrime groups, would be assigned to the commission. The crime-commission plan was the only proposal on which there was disagreement in the committee. Senator WILEY dissented from the commission idea for the following sound reasons: (1) A Federal commission might form "the basis for a national-type police force which is contrary to America's traditions and which has been vigorously opposed by all outstanding Federal law-enforcement agencies"; (2) it would result in "unnecessary harassment and interference with Federal investigative agencies"; (3) it would be an "unnecessary and costly superstructure imposed upon the present operating agencies," and (4) it would result in "dissipation of the function on the part of the legislative branch."

A Federal crime commission would encounter difficulties in pursuing interstate crime investigations not met by a congressional investigating committee. State authorities might understandably regard its inquiries as a presumptuous invasion of local law enforcement by the Federal Government.

The Federal crime commission proposal bears a striking resemblance to an ill-advised plan drawn up some years ago for a Federal crime "institute," which, like the commission, would have been an independent agency. That plan was vigorously opposed by FBI Director Hoover for the same reasons that he and Attorney General McGrath have objected to the crime-commission suggestion, namely, that it would tend to establish the Federal Government as an over-all watchdog on crime and might encourage growth of an undemocratic Federal police agency. There is too much tendency now to pass the buck to the Federal Government for crime problems that ought to be handled at the local level. A Federal crime commission would be a convenient vehicle onto which to unload State and city responsibilities.

EFFECTIVE ENFORCEMENT OF PRESENT LAWS WOULD GO FAR IN CRIME WAVE

(By Marquis Childs)

WASHINGTON.—So much of the Kefauver crime report has leaked out in one way or another in the days preceding its official release that its contents come as something of an anticlimax. The fact of the innumerable leaks is, incidentally, a sad commentary on a committee created to expose the moral delinquency that enables organized crime to exist in community after community throughout the Nation.

The criminal conspiracy revealed by the committee is a cancer that threatens the body politic. To make it the basis for competitive revelations—a means of building up somebody's political Hooper rating—is to put it on a vaudeville level where we can take it or leave it as just another form of entertainment.

The same thing applies, let it be said here, to the Communist conspiracy. Either it is a thing of deadly seriousness menacing our whole way of life, or it is just another sensation for the television cameras with some birdbrain from Hollywood confessing that at some point he or she was a member of the Communist Party.

The moral indignation generated by the crime hearings should now make it possible to bring about adoption of legislation, most of which has long been recommended. This applies particularly in several fields of Federal law.

Tax laws enforced by the Bureau of Internal Revenue can be strengthened so that gangsters and racketeers cannot with the aid of unscrupulous lawyers, find ways to evade taxes on their huge incomes. The report points out that the Treasury has already moved to tighten regulations to stop some of the raw stuff that the hearings revealed.

Long an urgent need, as the report shows, is increased personnel to enforce both tax and narcotic laws. The Bureau of Internal Revenue as of a year ago had a total of 3,416 suspected tax fraud cases either under or scheduled for investigation with a total backlog of 9,110 cases. Many of the pending cases involve gangsters and racketeers.

The Bureau's staff is inadequate, both in size and skills, to meet this problem. False economy beginning in the Eightieth Congress reduced the Bureau's personnel at the very time when it was obvious that in the wake of the scandals war always brings there would be need for far greater investigation and prosecution than ever before. An effective agent more than pays his own way in ferreting out tax chiselers. As the Kefauver report says, there should be a larger staff and the salary scale should be increased so that agents with greater skill and training can be hired to run down the artful dodgers and their lawyers.

Similarly, immigration laws can be tightened to facilitate deportations of criminal aliens who originally got into this country through fraud and deception. Changes have been recommended by the COMMISSIONER of Immigration and are now pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Of the broader proposals involving brand-new legislation, the committee's most important recommendation is to bar the transmission of bets or wagers in interstate communication or transportation. The Federal law now outlawing the transportation of slot machines should be extended, in the committee's view, "to include other gambling devices which are susceptible to gangster or racketeer control, such as punchboards, roulette wheels, etc." But the law on slot machines is of debatable value in view of a provision, insisted on by Senator MALONE, of Nevada, permitting any State to receive slot machines if State law allows them to be legally received and employed in the State.

All such laws are difficult to enforce so long as local communities tolerate gambling on a wide scale. The oversize Federal policeman might have as frustrating a time on the gaming beat as on the liquor beat in the roaring twenties.

The implication in these proposals is that the Federal policeman must grow bigger and bigger. The committee proposes a permanent Federal Crime Commission with a variety of duties. But it seems to me that Senator WILEY, of Wisconsin, has most of the arguments on his side in this dissent from the other members of the committee on that recommendation. WILEY suggests that this would be just another costly and unnecessary superstructure imposed on present operating agencies, with the possibility that it might be the nucleus of a national police force contrary to basic American tradition.

Too often in the recent past administrative defects have been covered up by naming a big-name commission. One may ask here what has been done about all the witnesses who so obviously perjured themselves and showed their open contempt for the committee during the hearings. The Department of Justice reports that of 22 witnesses cited for contempt, 12 have been indicted. Two have been indicted for perjury.

With overcrowded courts and overworked legal staffs perhaps this a fairly good score. But new laws are hardly the answer when so many present laws—local, State, and Federal—are enforced, if they are enforced at all, ineffectively and inefficiently.

WILEY BLAMES CRIME ON CITIZENS' INDIFFERENCE

After listening to big and little racketeers as a member of the Kefauver Crime Investigating Committee, Senator ALEXANDER WILEY says the principal handicap to law enforcement is the "don't care" attitude of the citizens.

WILEY's judgment strikes home wherever we live. In his radio address Saturday, he said, "The whole structure of our home front is being undermined by criminal termites gnawing at the foundations of our economy." He points to the failure of many persons to vote and to a shrugging-off of crimes that do not directly touch them.

"The habit of making a 'fast buck,' regardless of moral scruples, has become a habit throughout the Nation," he warned. "Our whole younger generation has unfortunately been impacted by a widely held cynicism," he added. "It consists largely in a rush for success and for wealth, regardless of consequences to self and to society, a rush for thrills, for pick-ups, for wild jags."

It is to the home as an institution that WILEY points for the answer—the grass roots of America, not in Washington, D. C.

We need only look around us and in our own homes, schools, and churches to see what is happening. It is too late when these cases get into the courts.

RICH-QUICK RACKETEERS DEGRADE NATION'S YOUTH

(By Ivan H. Peterman)

Senator CHARLES TOBEY, "the voice of American conscience" raised indignantly against certain Kefauver committee witnesses, has summarized in a question, the wide public resentment against the lush living, easy pickings, and unseemly influence of our big-shot racketeers.

Glaring at Frank Costello during the latter's closing testimony, TOBEY demanded of this one-time immigrant:

"What did you ever do for your country as a good citizen?"

Costello paused, then wheezed: "I paid my taxes."

The hearing room off New York's Foley Square rattled with laughter. It echoed across Manhattan over to Brooklyn and the Bronx, where many have contributed in a small way to Costello's affluence, and it spread across this great, indulgent Nation. That feeble defense of the extralegal millionaire Costello, will go down as a joke of the first half century.

Perhaps we should ponder such things on this Good Friday, which in all Christendom is a time for sober reflection on the greatest sacrifice. It is a time to scrutinize those who never serve, much less sacrifice. And to compare their arrogant records with those who do their duty.

Costello, Adonis, Erickson, Cohen, Guzik, the whole gallery, who have grown rich in one way or another on the American urge to take a chance, must answer one question above all: "What have they done to repay this country?"

It is certainly no boost to discover their sticky collusion with police and politicians, or with such as Charles (Lucky) Luciano, who was bounced out of the country, most unsavory of them all.

It is revolting to discover that through racketeers' contracts, international dope smugglers flourish again, and have invaded our city schools to establish a wide new demand.

It is disgusting to see the names of such swaggering bums constantly mentioned by our chit-chat literati who, despite their limited culture, ought to ignore them on the dictates of simple taste.

It is shocking to see the influence such men have on younger people, who admire their ability to make a pile in a hurry. We have the recent basketball briberies to illustrate. Or kid car-theft gangs now flourishing.

It is bewildering when principals, teachers, even parents confess they cannot guide headstrong youth, who in one way or another are also chasing the fast buck. Youngsters are not particular whether it's by racket or politics, or both, legal or otherwise. The lazier use easy-rich arguments against working or study, declaring if they cannot do likewise there's always Government relief.

It is shocking, moreover, to note the bawdy sympathy, again more evident among the young, for the accused, without much condemnation for evils attached, or the ultimate decadence they've set in motion. Racket riches inspire the urge to live elegantly and at ease, without thought for those to come.

It is this last indictment which seems the worst. It's lubrication on the skid to ruin. It speeds the grand collapse.

Do not think, however, this persuasion is all prevading. By no means. There is a great, silent majority in this country which this Holy Week is finding voice.

They comprise the law-abiding, the dutiful, hard-working, patriotic, and God-fearing. They also happen to be in all sections, coast-to-coast, with roots deep in this America they love. They didn't jump ship and gain citizenship by lying and evasion, then slug their way to unearned wealth without a thought for the new flag and country. This quiet majority lives by brighter ideals, if not the bright lights.

The protests of these have been growing, but until Messrs. Kefauver, Tobey, and Halley turned on the televised report, the call for better living and higher morals was drowned in the applause for jerks. I have said, and repeat again, the period 1945–50 has shamefully disregarded the fundamental decencies, from international levels down to forgetful fools who have ignored the sacrifices of the Second World War.

It is the contrast to those who serve, therefore, which makes today's racket kings seem small. They are shabby in their gaudy eminence, disreputable amid phony glamor. Who are these lush-living tramps? What did they do in the crisis? What contribution to the common good, or to insure the security and happiness of those to come?

The boy plodding toward the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea with a machine gun over his shoulder, he should be rewarded. But who thinks of him, when Virginia Hill is telling how she spent gangster-given thousands? The GI bereft of legs or sight, recuperating in some Army hospital, can answer Senator TOBEY'S question with something that should stick. But those who chase a crooked rainbow have no time to listen. Who wants to hear of Korea now?

Do you wonder that heroes grow cynical? That black markets already are rising in the wake of U. N.'s liberators? That heartbroken first of kin read War Department telegrams, and cry out, "Why?"

To protect the likes of Costello, Adonis, Anastasia, and Gross? Whose answer is not even all the truth, when they mutter:

"I paid taxes."

Don't we all? There is more responsibility to it than that.

HOW TO GET RID OF THE CROOKS

(By Admiral W. H. Standley, USN, retired)

I spent two and a half years behind the iron curtain of California crime.

The lessons I learned as the head of the State Commission on Organized Crime are being applied with tremendous success in the former playground of mobster Bugsy Siegel.

California is no longer a resort for underworld big wigs. Our gangsters are going broke, and they're leaving our State like a bunch of fire-frightened deer.

Ont of the outstanding examples is Mickey Cohen. He's packing his bags in preparation for a trip to Tucson, Ariz. Mickey says he wants to go there to sell cigars. The truth is that he wants to escape the rigid surveillance of the Los Angeles Police Department.

The startling disclosures of the Kefauver committee have confirmed my belief that crime is organized on a national basis, that the tactics of gangland kingpins are basically the same regardless of geography.

What has been done in California can be done in your community. Our State has provided all America with a blueprint for action, a blueprint which can spell bankruptcy for every racket in the Nation.

Would you like to see your gangsters hop aboard the next train? You can use a very simple persuader that has been around for ages, taxation. We used this method, and it worked.

Have you heard of the mobster who knocked off a stool pigeon and then credited himself with an income tax deduction for the depreciation of his machine gun?

That's just a fable, of course, but it's not as fantastic as it sounds. Every year our State and Federal Treasuries are fleeced of millions of tax dollars by the bigshots of America's crime syndicates. They award themselves liberal deductions for the wear and tear of roulette wheels and swank brothels.

One of our high-class crooks saved himself half a million dollars that way. For 10 years he made other taxpayers bear the cost of hiring the goons that guarded his gambling casino in Gardena.

Racketeers dupe the tax collector by weeping about the high cost of maintaining a legitimate front for their criminal industries. In effect, they have asked the Government to subsidize their crimes. And the most fantastic thing of all is that their request is often granted.

But California is cracking down on the gangsters, hitting them where it hurts most—in the pocketbook. Our State legislature is plugging the loopholes in our income tax laws, and it is sparing no expense in its search for criminal tax evaders.

We took the mothballs out of an old conspiracy statute and made it a felony to be a bookie, gambler, or slot machine king. These boys usually were handled in the courts where we fined people for swearing and spitting.

One of the slimy fish caught in this net was Wiley Caddel. He was sent to San Quentin for attempting to organize a slot machine protection racket in Mendocino County.

The Kefauver committee has dramatically confirmed our discovery that slot machines siphon off $2,000,000,000 of our national income each year, that a large part of this money was used to close the eyes of law enforcement authorities.

Want that money to go back where it belongs, to homes and parks and schools? Try the law. It works.

The mere possession of a one-armed bandit is now unlawful in our State. Four years ago a group of slot machine racketeers arrived in California, in a limousine. Six months ago they left, in a bus.

Bookmaking was once the biggest and best organized racket in California. But that was before our Public Utilities Commission stepped into the picture. It clamped down on telephone and telegraph companies who furnished the services for these racing wires. The Continental Press wire, the major bookmaking service, was virtually driven out of business.

Today the monopolistic aspect of bookmaking has all but disappeared in California. And many of our bookies are now reading the help-wanted columns.

What we have discovered about bookmaking, slot machines, and other allied rackets also applies in such fields as prostitution, abortion, bootlegging, and dope peddling. It's the same story all over America, and the weapons available to the side of justice are ready and waiting.

The boys behind the scenes are running for cover, searching desperately for some place to avoid the national spotlight.

We Californians have made sure they won't find a haven in our State. Can you say the same?

Employment of the Physically Handicapped

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR
OF MARYLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, one of the responsibilities that devolves upon all citizens is assistance to the physically handicapped, many of whom have suffered their disabilities in the defense of our rights and freedoms. To keep before our people their duties and opportunities in this respect there are held each year essay contests on the local and national level, in which high-school students are participants, and in which the opportunities for the physically handicapped are stressed.

It was my pleasure and privilege to greet the Maryland winner of the prize offered by the Governor's committee to promote employment of the physically handicapped, Miss Margaret Ann Dilfer, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ferdinand Dilfer, of Lonaconing, Md., and a student at Central High School there.

Her prize-winning entry was submitted in the national contest, where it had the distinction of being favorably considered. Inasmuch as this year's contest attracted entries from all the States in the Union, Miss Dilfer deserves a great deal of commendation and congratulations for her success on the national as well as the State level.

In this connection let me pay tribute also to the cochairmen of the Maryland Governor's Committee To Promote Employment of the Physically Handicapped, Mr. L. B. Fringer and Mr. R. C. Thompson, who, together with their committee of outstanding Marylanders, did so much to make the essay contest the success that it was.

I ask unanimous consent that the essay by Miss Dilfer be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the essay was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY IN EMPLOYMENT FOR THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED

(By Margaret Ann Dilfer)

America's greatest assurance of progress is its people—their abilities, their ingenuity, their free procedures for attacking problems, and their mental capacities. All of these human resources must be utilized if we are to maintain the superior standards of our great democratic country. If our wells of mental resources and skills should be left undeveloped. Our country would not reach the highest ideals of living which may be enjoyed by a progressive and democratic country. The handicapped are an undeniable part of this society with any number of diverse skills and abilities to be utilized as part of America's progress.

Hundreds of thousands of workers are unemployed because they have physical handicaps which do not entirely prevent them from doing some type of good work. The problem is—the physically handicapped are not given enough opportunities to prove their abilities to do good work, and as a result many remain as dependent citizens. These Americans have as much right to be independent and self-supporting to their fullest capacities as they have to freedom of speech and freedom of worship.

History shows there have been many famous persons who have overcome their handicaps and climbed the ladder to success. For example, when Franklin Roosevelt learned that he was stricken with infantile paralysis, he dauntlessly said, "I'll fight this thing." Today, the world remembers his achievements, not his physical handicap. There are also other remarkable examples. Helen Keller was able to combat her handicap as she toured the country making speeches to a world she never saw or heard. Theodore Roosevelt had poor health as a youth, but he overcame this handicap and rose to the height of President of the United States. Of course, all the disabled cannot make such remarkable achievements, but many of them could make their mark if only they would be given the opportunities to work to the best of their abilities. If these people could express themselves as a group, I am sure they would reecho the words of Churchill, who said, "Give us the tools and we will do the job."

How, then, can we awaken the workshop of our Nation to recognize the fact that our handicapped are a source of economic wealth, not a liability? An undeniable fact must be faced—national strength is the sum of individual strength. Increased individual production means increased national strength. This cannot be accomplished unless we hire the handicaped. It must be remembered that America will benefit best by the productive power and skill of all, as she grows and prospers. Therefore, the work of the handicapped cannot and must not be disregarded.

Many handicaps, after all, do not permanently affect the individual's skills, intelligence, or initiative—it may increase one's drive for success. True, natural skills are sometimes impaired, or slowed down for a time, and may necessitate a particular type of employment—but their needs are answered by rehabilitation programs which help rebuild impaired capabilities to their maximum usefulness. Then, too, many skills which remain unaltered are discovered and developed to their fullest extent of usefulness. The patience of both the instructor and the handicapped student usually results in a skilled employee who frequently outdistances his normal competitors. Employers can learn this fact only through the experience of hiring the handicapped. They must give these people with impaired capabilities the chance to say, "I accept this job to prove my skill, to earn my way, and to be an active citizen of this great country of ours."

A study made by the Department of Labor surveyed actual work records in 109 plants of 11,000 physically handicapped workers and 18,000 able-bodied workers. It was proven that the handicapped are just as efficient, just as reliable, just as careful, and just as versatile as the able-bodied workers. These records offer substantial evidence to demonstrate that men and women with a history of some handicap can work, and do it efficiently.

It is expensive to deny jobs to millions of handicapped Americans. The cost to maintain a disabled person in dependency must be paid year after year. Thus, the United States citizens are burdened with these expenses because the handicapped are left unemployed. It is estimated that for every single dollar spent to rehabilitate a handicapped individual, the Treasury of the United States gets back a ten-fold return in Federal-income taxes alone. To give jobs to the handicapped, thus will lessen the expenses of the United States citizens. Helping handicapped persons to pay their own way is beneficial, not only to us, but to the handicapped themselves; for it is necessary for them to be equipped with a sense of security which can be obtained only through living productive, independent lives. There are no financial yardsticks to measure the difference between a self-reliant, happy worker carrying his own responsibilities, and a glum, depressed citizen depending on others for everyday needs. Those differences mean more than dollars and cents; they mean happiness, good citizenship, and social usefulness.

Hiring the handicapped need not be an act of charity. Employers may hire the handicapped for the same reasons they hire able-bodied personnel—for their ability—not their disability. The yardstick for measuring the efficiency of the workers is results. It is the results that count.

The key to successful employment is proper placement in jobs which match their abilities. Hiring the handicapped can be likened to the making of a suit to measure. Each disabled person presents distinct problems, the solution of which requires understanding, imagination, patience, and ingenuity. The proper placement of the handicapped in jobs will give the employer as much assurance of results as he may expect from any employee who is placed to match his abilities.

The first half of the twentieth century witnessed the growth of the United States from a debtor to a creditor Nation, from a productive child to an industrial giant, from a world observer to a world leader—an evolvement made possible by the blending of natural resources, unusual spirit, initiative, special industrial skills, and great vision. If our vision and hopes for the future are to be fulfilled, we must utilize wisely every possible material resource—our citizens, our democracy, and our land. Hire the handicapped—they, too, must share in the promise which is America. Hire the handicapped—they, too, are part of America's assurance of progress.

Healdsburg's Adopted Battalion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HUBERT B. SCUDDER
OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I desire to have printed three items appearing in the Healdsburg Tribune of recent date. One calls attention to the formation of a Citizens Club in adopting the First Battalion, Seventh Infantry Regiment, of the Third Division; an editorial on the same subject matter; and an article including a letter from Lt. Col. Fred C. Weyand and a letter from the First Battalion in response to the interest of the citizens of Healdsburg.

CITIZENS' CLUBS RESPOND TO FIRST BATTALION WEEK

Adhering to the proclamation of acting Mayor Roy Henderson proclaiming March 25 to March 31 "First Battalion Week" private citizens, clubs, schools, and various organizations responded wholeheartedly in making First Battalion Week a success.

According to Mrs. Fred C. Weyand, chairman of the First Battalion Committee, 24 cartons have already been shipped off to the adopted battalion in Korea and 10 more are packed and ready to go.

During the week various clubs and organizations requested their members to bring specific needed items to their regular meetings. The Healdsburg Women's Golf Club donated pocket-size mirrors, the 20–30 Club sewing kits, the Kiwanis Club towels and wash cloths, the Lions Club handkerchiefs.

The Business and Professional Women's Club have adopted an entire company, approximately 130 men, to whom they will send needed items.

The students at the Healdsburg Elementary School also responded wholeheartedly by bringing to school magazines, pencils, stationery, soap, towels, and wash cloths.

The Healdsburg High School students, as their project, will send news letters to the fighting battalion. Collection date for the letters will be decided shortly.

In addition three battery radios have been donated. One by Edna Walker, another by G. F. Graham, Hollydale Park and the third by Smith Robinson. Tanner Bros., West Street, repaired the radio given by Edna Walker.

Cash donations from Bill Wendt, Harold Vanderhurst, Mrs. Della Lovell, Mrs. R. B. Stevens, students of Lambert School, and Women's Golf Club have also been received.

The American Legion, American Legion Auxiliary and the War Mothers Club will make plans at their next meetings for collection of various articles.

The First Battalion adopted at a membership meeting of the chamber of commerce, March 13 is a part of the Seventh Infantry Regiment, Third Division. The regiment, referred to as the Cotton Balers for the use they made of cotton bales in the battle for New Orleans during the war with Great Britain, 1812–14, were first organized in 1798, mustered out in 1800, and reorganized in 1808, with continuous service dating from that time. As such they are the second oldest regiment in the United States Army.

OUR ADOPTED BATTALION

On March 13 at the general membership dinner of the Healdsburg Chamber of Commerce, a resolution was passed unanimously adopting the First Battalion, Seventh Infantry Regiment, Third Division. This resolution was subsequently sanctioned at the city council meeting of March 19, the acting mayor issuing a proclamation naming this week First Battalion Week.

The chamber of commerce was chiefly responsible for spearheading and corralling to a focal point the adoption as presented to them by Mrs. Arline Weyand, wife of the commander of the First Battalion.

The adoption of the battalion was indeed a fine gesture on the part of the citizens of Healdsburg and much praise for the action taken has been forthcoming. In fact, Nation-wide publicity has been received and a vote of thanks should go to all those who have made the adoption possible. During time of duress, such as now, we believe, it is a faith renewer to have such gestures take place.

However, the work in maintaining and supplying a battalion has only begun. To make this promotional activity the success it deserves, everybody in Healdsburg will have to do their share.

According to Mrs. Fred Weyand, the men who are fighting in Korea need many small items to make them just a little comfortable. Magazines, books, stationery, envelopes, lead pencils, cameras, film, sewing kits, battery radios, billfolds, towels, handkerchiefs, and "snack" items are just a few of the needed articles.

Get those needed articles now and bring them to the firehouse where they will be wrapped and shipped.

Do it now and help make First Battalion Week a rousing success.

DEAR CITIZEN—A LETTER FROM YOUR ADOPTED BATTALION

(Just received is the following letter and brief history of Healdsburg's adopted battalion written in the battalion's own words addressed to the citizens of our town. We are reprinting it here for all to read for the First Battalion is your battalion.—EDITOR.)

MARCH 20, 1951.

DEAR CITIZENS OF HEALDSBURG: I was in the process of writing a formal history of the infantry battalion you've taken as your own but I've discarded the idea. I found, not to my surprise, that this battalion has a mind and heart of its own. It has taken matters into its own hands by writing you a letter which I am enclosing.

On behalf of the men, I thank you for your kindness and generosity. The knowledge of your support has made better soldiers of them—they're trying just that much harder to live up to your expectations.

I only wish you could know each of the men personally, as I do, so you could be as proud of them as I am.

Thank you for your thoughts and prayers.

Sincerely,

FRED C. WEYAND,
Lieutenant Colonel, Infantry.

I'm an old fighting battalion, the oldest one in the Army. I had my first big fight under Andy Jackson at New Orleans and I've fought in every scuffle Uncle Sam has had since then. I'm proud of it, darn proud. I've been many places since 1812 and I don't guess I've ever had a place I can call home. It has usually been some spot in the world where there's trouble brewing or a lonely post somewhere in the ZI. I don't guess I've had any parents either, 'cause as far back as I can remember my Uncle has taken care of me.

Today I feel like a new-born babe, even as old as I am, because today I found one spot in this world which I can call home and acquired a lot of good people as foster parents. I've been adopted.

I know there's not much use telling you about my past because most of that is written in history books. Sometimes I fight alone but usually with a couple of battalions and together we compose the Seventh Infantry Regiment. We're part of the Third Division and have been since World War II.

I guess I had better bring you up to date about what I've been doing since I first landed in Japan last September. I had only bout 200 GI's then and I was plenty worried. General Mac (Gen. Douglas MacArthur) sent about 1,000 Korean recruits and I trained them like mad for 6 weeks. I kept about half of them, received 200 more GI's, and then I shipped out for Korea along with the regiment.

I went ashore at Wonsan on the 17th of November and proceeded north to Hamhung by myself. The war with the North Koreans looked like it might be just about to wind up but many bypassed soldiers were escaping to the north through the mountains. I was sent to a little place about 60 miles up in the mountains called Saachang to block this movement. I'll tell you frankly, I never did see a North Korean up there but brother, on the 23th of November I saw plenty of Chinese! I was sure surprised because I didn't even know they were in the war until then.

Their Eighty-ninth Division was headed down the valley and I was sitting right in its way. They hit me with everything they had and I guess they did "bloody" my nose a bit, but I stayed and fought them off by myself until December 2, 1950. I found out later that this division was on its way to help cut off the Seventh Infantry Division and First Marine Division. It arrived too late.

I'm mighty proud of that fight but I had to break it off and get out before they cut me off in those mountains. They nipped at my tail getting out but I made it all right. I fought a delaying action on out of the mountains and down to Yongpo Airfield. I held it long enough for the Air Corps to fly the wounded out and then themselves. My job from there on was to protect the left flank of the Hungnam beachhead along the ocean. It was a good fight and I sure rocked the Chinese back on their heels.

On the 24th of December, I too was evacuated from the beach. I didn't like it, but I had my orders. My troops were the last to leave.

I spent Christmas as a guest of the Navy, and I made the most of it. It was good to be clean and warm again, but that didn't last long. Some new guy over named Ridgway (Lt. Gen. Matthew Ridgway) wanted my punch and wanted it bad. The Navy put me back ashore at Pusan and headed north and back into the line above Chonan. Things were rough over here about then, and the guy calling the plays didn't waste any time finding me a fight.

I'm a "low lander" by preference, and I like the flat plains with the long fields of fire and unlimited observation. Did I get that? No! They put me to work in mountains where no self-respecting mountain goat would be caught.

My fight was for one big hill after another. I ran the Chinese off of them by day, and they came back by night, but I beat him every time. It was rough on my troops, but they never weakened. I didn't stop till I had chased the Chinese across the Han River, and that's where I am now, just south of Seoul. I'm ready to go again, and I like river crossing. The last big one I crossed was in Italy.

Yep! I'm an old fighting battalion, but I've lost a lot of good young Americans over here. They will never march with me again, will never fight with me again, but I know that their fighting spirit will be with me whenever the going gets rough again.

That's the special thing about me, the spirit of my men. Nothing gets them down. They have fought in weather that was 30 degrees below zero over terrain that is the worst in the world; it never fazed them. They have been constantly outnumbered 10 to 1; they don't care. They have been shot and shot at night and day; they never flinch. This fighting spirit of my men is the thing that makes me the best darn battalion in the world.

Well, it is getting late and time for me to dig in for the night. I'll most likely have visitors before morning. I feel a lot better now, because I know I have a whole city at home that's thinking of me and praying for me. I'll hit 'em an extra lick or two tonight, especially for you.

Sincerely,

FIRST BATTALION, SEVENTH INFANTRY REGIMENT.

The Wake Island Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article written by George Sokolsky and published in the Washington Times-Herald today, dealing with the report by Miss Vernice Anderson of a conversation between President Truman and General MacArthur.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THESE DAYS
(By George Sokolsky)

It used to be said of the fire horse that when he heard a gong he just automatically went to the wagon to be hitched.

Automatic responses should be studied carefully by child psychologists, perhaps to make humans more like the obsolete fire horse. A good way to start the training would perhaps be a course in eavesdropping with Miss Vernice Anderson as the teacher, she having scooped the world in doing automatically what parents used to tell children they should not do at all, namely, eavesdrop.

Miss Anderson makes the point when she stood behind a door and listened to the conversation between General MacArthur and President Truman, she did it automatically. She also took down her stenographic notes automatically. She did not destroy the notes automatically but kept them, typed them, and gave them to her boss, Dr. Philip Jessup, of the State Department and the Institute of Pacific Relations, automatically.

That is an awful lot of automatic action for a young lady and represents a high degree of aptitude in the field. She was brought on from Washington to Wake Island apparently to serve orange juice and other liquids, the others not being specified in any of the accounts given, but it might be presumed that automatic bourbon was included. However, that is a matter of speculation and not pertinent to automatic responses, which is the subject of this course of study.

I also would include keyhole peeping in this course for the young. There is nothing in the record to show that Miss Anderson has any aptitude for that. She apparently has cultivated her ears rather than her eyes and is able to hear through walls and closed doors. The peepholers will have to be found elsewhere in the State Department or in Central Intelligence.

Children would gain great knowledge quickly if they could only peep through keyholes, particularly after they had been ordered to bed. It might improve them more effectively than television, which is in the open and therefore evokes no special skills. Automatic peepholing could be developed into a fine art with prizes given each year by the freedoms foundation for those who never fail.

Microphone-placing in flower pots might also help the next generations. They could automatically hear papa and mamma discussing family affairs, but better still, it would build the ambitions of a young man. He could perhaps write on his application for a job in the State Department that he placed microphones in his sister's boudoir when he was 10 and tapped the telephone wires in the house by the time he was 14. That ought to fit him to be an expert on the Far East, to say nothing of the Middle East and Germany.

These things can, of course, become automatic, or what we used to call, second nature. For instance, it used to be second nature for small boys to peephole through the ball park fence. That was second nature, like jumping into a swimming hole or putting a garter snake in a bottle or putting a little girl's hair in the inkwell. Second nature can be something awful if you fail to curb it. Automatic responses possess an additional quality because they require training in some such place as the State Department.

And that automatically leads to some observations concerning Miss Vernice Anderson's boss, Philip Jessup, who is one of the high mucky-mucks in the State Department. He seems to be involved in everything, having come to that department from a professorship of international law at Columbia University and the Institute of Pacific Relations. He has been active in helping the country run its foreign relations, on and off, since 1924, but really did not mature until 1945, since when he has really been a big factor, second only in influence and prestige to Dean Acheson.

He goes to all the conferences and makes speeches on great matters. He has never had any far-eastern experience but purports to be an expert on the subject through his connections with the Institute of Pacific Relations whose files the McCarran committee is now studying. He has generally been identified with those other far-eastern experts whose predilections brought us to our present dismay.

Curious that the eavesdropping Miss Anderson, whose automatic responses led her to take down an off-the-cuff, unrecorded conversation between the President and General MacArthur, should be working for Dr. Philip Jessup.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. SMITH
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post for May 9, paying fitting tribute to a fine reporter:

SEVENTY YEARS YOUNG

There is nothing unique about a lawyers' lawyer or even a doctors' doctor, but there seems to be only one newspapermen's newspaperman in Washington, and that is Paul Wooton. We can think of few offices connected with associations of newspapermen in Washington that he has not held. For three terms he was chairman of the board of governors of the National Press Club, and later president of the club. In addition, he has been president of the Overseas Writers and the White House Correspondents' Association and for many terms was president of the National Conference of Business Paper Editors. For at least 30 years he appears to have had a finger in almost every journalistic pie that has been baked in Washington.

Since the first term of Woodrow Wilson as President, Mr. Wooton has been Washington correspondent for the New Orleans Times-Picayune. For many years he also represented the McGraw-Hill publications and more recently has written a business column. His fellow news writers marvel at how he finds time to turn out his copy between stints of organizing his fellow scribes' chores. We suspect that he has done more than any other person to give the press of this city a sense of corporality. As his friends celebrate his seventieth birthday, we join in saluting him for his good work, which he always does with a smile.

The Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted, there is printed herewith an editorial carried in a recent issue of the Hastings Banner, a newspaper published at Hastings, Mich., in the Fourth Congressional District, by Richard Cook. The editorial is well worth reading. It follows:

The dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur from the Far East command is a stunning defeat for the forces of democracy both on the military and diplomatic fronts. It comes as sort of supercolossal Munich that must have "Uncle Joe" chuckling contentedly into his whiskers. It is notice to the world that more appeasement is to be the order of the day in dealing with threat of Communist imperialism.

Neville Chamberlain's house of cards came tumbling down about his umbrella soon after Munich with a reverberation that shook the world. Unfortunately for us, the forces with which our administration is dealing with so little effect are much more tremendous and threatening than Nazi Germany under Hitler.

Does it make sense to remove from duty one of the great military men of our time (and about the only major American statesman to achieve a glowing record in the bleak era of postwar diplomacy) in an effort to bolster the sagging prestige of our Department of State? Why not keep MacArthur and inject some much-needed new blood into State Department leadership? But maybe that is so obviously logical that it just doesn't make sense in present-day Washington.

Consider the record. General MacArthur suddenly thrust into military leadership in Korea under conditions that were almost fantastically impossible, performed brilliantly. In the field of statesmanship, he has made great progress in winning over Japan to the American point of view. A former deadly enemy has been changed into a possible strong ally in the Far East—a region where we need friends badly. In fact, Japan is about the only major area where United States diplomacy has been outstandingly successful.

Secretary of State Acheson, on the other hand, has been a consistent wrong guesser. The present "police action" in Korea can be attributed directly to his misjudgment of Soviet intentions. American diplomacy in Europe has produced few strong ties (the only reliable ones, at present are Turkey and Greece) despite billions of dollars spent abroad for "reconstruction." Mr. Acheson, despite the theoretically strong position of the United States, has never been influential with foreign diplomats and has not been able to forge sound or desirable alliances. Even the Atlantic nations loosely grouped together for mutual protection do not seem to be greatly impressed by our Secretary of State. Under Mr. Acheson our foreign policy has been vacillating and puzzling both to people abroad and those of us here at home. We have been weak in an era when firmness and strength are needed as never before.

Technically, MacArthur may have been playing tag with insubordination in voicing opinions that verge closely on matters of foreign policy despite warnings from President Truman and frantic pleas from our jittery Department of State. However, the line where politics ends and military responsibility begins can never be clearly defined.

The entire situation in the Far East is very confused and, as the general states, without parallel in military history.

Technically, for example, General MacArthur was serving under the United Nations, not directly under command of the United States, and thus, in theory, even represented Soviet Russia, a member in good standing of the U. N. despite the fact that she is the real power backing the North Korean and Red China armies that the United Nations forces are battling.

Although American casualties have been higher during 9 months of the Korean fighting than during the first full year of our participation in World War II, neither the State Department nor President Truman will admit we are fighting a war—it is merely a "police action" and our enemies, or rather, the lawbreakers with whom we are involved, are permitted to maintain a sanctuary just across the North Korean border where they can, in perfect safety, build up reserves of men, munitions, and supplies to support their armies in the field.

The United Nations are directly involved with Mao's troops. Red China is not a member of the U. N. However, Nationalist China which is a member in good standing hasn't been permitted to supply soldiers even though additional battle-tested ground troops are desperately needed.

Why are we in Korea? Only a little more than a year ago, Secretary of State Acheson declared that the United States was not concerned with Korea. That nation had nothing to do with our security. Our troops were withdrawn. This, of course, amounted to an open invitation to the Communists to move in. But when they did, Korea of a sudden became important. Mr. Truman and the State Department decided to resist under circumstances that couldn't have been much worse for defense forces. Once again we were caught unprepared. The unsound policies of Louis Johnson and the old Department of Defense were quickly brought to light.

Green troops had to fight a type of war for which they had not been trained. Somehow they managed to keep from being pushed back into the sea and then rallied splendidly. The intervention of Chinese troops in substantial masses prevented the close of what might have been "the Korean incident."

Where to now? Are we to fight an indecisive action back and forth across the thirty-eighth parallel—killing and getting killed in the process? Are we to withdraw? Are we to be given sufficient strength for decisive action?

The above paragraphs, we believe, should be given consideration in judging General MacArthur's action.

Some dismiss him as an egotist; some claim he has a weakness for flowery phrases and hunting out the headlines; some believe he is making a bold bid for public acclaim.

Maybe these criticisms are true in whole or in part.

However, General MacArthur is no fool. As a military man he knew the consequences of insubordination; as an individual he was aware of the tendency of Americans to dismiss public idols who have been caught "off base."

Therefore, our own guess is that the general had so much faith in his own analysis of the Korean situation and was so gravely concerned with the indecision and lack of policy at Washington that he felt it his responsibility as a top-flight soldier to disregard normal channels and go directly to the real source of authority—the people of the United States—the "body politic" to which even presidents owe allegiance.

General Ridgway, close-mouthed, brilliant field commander of our forces in Korea, recently issued a guarded statment that backed MacArthur's point of view. Will he, too, be sacrificed to "strengthen the hand" of our State Department.

In our opinion MacArthur is of much greater value to the United States and the cause of the democratic nations than Acheson and Truman combined.

Go It Alone?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, General MacArthur has testified that if other nations refuse to accept his recommendations, we should "go it alone." I should like to call attention to two analyses of this phase of the general's argument. The first is a recent editorial from the Washington Post, and the other a column by Thomas L. Stokes which appeared in the Evening Star. They follow:

[From the Washington Post]

GOING IT ALONE

The President rose to the occasion last night in his defense of a limited war in Korea fought by the United Nations. His task was to show that this strategy is superior to General MacArthur's—a broadened war in the Far East fought by the United States and Chiang Kai-shek in alliance. The President, in our opinion, demolished the case in behalf of that kind of nationalistic war. When he said the MacArthur policy would "unite the Chinese people behind their Communist rulers," he spoke in words that both history and common sense attest.

As in other countries, communism, it is reported, is on the defensive in China, but the way to strengthen Peiping's hold on China is the very intervention that General MacArthur proposes. Leave aside the possibility of limiting support for Chiang. The mere fact that this country was actively alined with Chiang would evoke an intense anti-Americanism throughout China. The Chinese are notoriously antiforeign, anyway. They celebrate a round dozen days of humiliation at the hands of foreign invaders or interventionists.

Not only that. After so many years of incessant warfare, they must blanch at the prospect of more and yet more American bombs hurled into their country. More American than Soviet armament is still being fired at our American boys in Korea—American armament that was originally conveyed to the Communists by surrendering Nationalists. It was conveyed in such quantity that the Communists called Chiang Kai-shek during the high point of the surrenders, their "supply sergeant." Yet General MacArthur is proposing, and the administration has given way in part to him, to restore Chiang to that role. It must be bitter tea to the Chinese farmer as he tries to plow his war-soaked fields in intervals of oppression and extortion. If Communist China is as weakened as General MacArthur says, why interfere with the disintegration, and give the Communists a rallying point in American intervention?

It is the past help to the Communist supply sergeant that should have been pondered before new help was sent. It is this past help, and the tribulations of our boys in Korea arising from its impact, that should be pondered before we loose hot words as well as criticism upon our allies for supplying our enemies with strategic materials. Our allies are struggling to their feet after two grueling contests in a generation with a world aggressor. Their full recovery is inhibited by the partition of Europe. In the old days the industrial west traded with the agricultural east in a system which gave Europe a high standard of living. The division has shattered this system, and an all-out blockade in the Far East would deal Western Europe another blow at its economy which it will certainly not sustain as an ally of the blockaders. Western Europe would suffer far more than a self-contained China (when not Russian-contained) from a complete blockade, and so, incidentally, would Japan and every other Asian country. Moreover, Western Europe, seeing the diversion of American naval power, would see their military security jeopardized as well as their economic security.

The President took for granted a knowledge of some of these repercussions of the MacArthur policy. He concentrated mainly upon the assertion of his belief in the policy of going along with the United Nations. He rested his case upon a common policy with our allies. "We cannot go it alone in Asia," he declared, "and go it in company in Europe." He is abundantly right. If there were a break in Asia, there would be a break in Europe, and Europe's bases and industrial resources would then be denied to American arms. To be sure, a coalition policy in waging a limited war in Korea requires patience. But any other policy would, as the President said, be playing the Kremlin game, which is "to drive a wedge between us and the other free nations," as well as to see us get bogged down in Asia.

[From the Washington Star]

GENERAL MACARTHUR AND THE U. N.—FAILURE TO MENTION UNITED NATIONS SEEN AS CLUE TO CURRENT DISPUTE; CAN UNITED STATES GO IT ALONE?

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

Sometimes a simple clue will open up a seemingly complex mystery.

As, for instance, the failure of Gen. Douglas MacArthur even to mention the United Nations in his recent speech to Congress.

And now, reinforcing this clue, his colloquy with the 83-year-old Senator GREEN, Democrat, of Rhode Island, which lights up, like a star shell, the whole mass of testimony before the combined Senate Armed Services-Foreign Relations Committees relating to Korea and Far East policy.

Senator GREEN wanted to know if the United States wouldn't be going alone, without the other United Nations, if we adopted the general's program for lending support to General Chiang Kai-shek's troops to invade China and for bombarding Chinese coast cities and establishing a blockade. The general said he could not testify about the United Nations. When asked about his own expectations, he replied:

"My hope would be, of course, that the United Nations would see the wisdom and utility of that course, but if they did not I still believe that the interest of the United States being the predominant one in Korea, would require our action."

"Alone?" asked the Senator.

"Alone, if necessary," the general replied. "If the other nations of the world haven't got enough sense to see where appeasement leads after the appeasement which led to the Second World War in Europe, if they can't see exactly the road that they are following in Asia, why then, we had better protect ourselves and go it alone."

Alone? In the hard and cruel sort of world today. Alone?

The general, certainly a great military strategist, here seems to reveal a lack of understanding of over-all political considerations, of the essential meaning of the United Nations, itself, which is the reason for our being in Korea, and of the world-wide calculations upon which our policy necessarily must be based if we are to win a world-wide struggle. These include the adherence and support of friends and allies without whose help we could not possibly sustain ourselves.

This common front, which from time to time may require policy adjustments and compromises, is the very essence of collective security. Nor does that mean "appeasement," a word bandied around too loosely of late.

It is not necessary for a general in the field to understand all of this to win battles, and General MacArthur has won battles. But, by the same token, a general who can win battles is not thereby qualified to set himself up to direct policy which must, perforce, go far beyond the area in which he operates. That is what General MacArthur sought to do, and still is assuming to do, without portfolio, so to speak.

The policy-making job is the function of the civilian government which must operate on all fronts in such a world-wide contest as that in which we are engaged. It must take account of the needs and requirements of those fronts, including the political, and meet them in the manner best adapted to the whole problem at hand.

Unwittingly, the general, himself, has confessed publicly to the indictment upon which he was removed and has, simultaneously, offered the final, clinching argument for supremacy of the civilian government over the military. That not only has been our tradition, but in sustaining it, in the past, Presidents have had to confront military figures as popular in their day as the general is in this, and weather the same sort of public uproar.

In other similar episodes in the past, too, there have been Members of Congress who joined in the procession and the outcry to promote political interests, and congressional committees investigating, and efforts to give Congress the reins. But always, in the end, this all has passed.

Now, as to practical considerations of today. What would happen under the MacArthur "go it alone" policy to the stability and energy we have helped to pump into the United Nations so that it stood up and met the first open challenge of aggression? To the friendships we have so carefully built up through the Marshall plan and the Atlantic Pact which, at the same time have brought economic and military strength to our side? And what would be the effect on the people of China, with whom we always have been friends, if the United States should "go it alone" in all-out war on their teeming cities?

Alone?

Hardly.

Excise Tax on Cigarettes and Tobacco

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WATKINS M. ABBITT

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. ABBITT. Mr. Speaker, considerable interest has been aroused by the proposal to increase the excise tax on cigarettes and tobacco generally. Tobacco is taxed more than any other commodity with the possible exception of alcohol. Tobacco has been one of the principal agricultural commodities exported from the United States since colonial days. Presently it is the main source of income for more than 800,000 farm families in the United States and Puerto Rico. Tobacco is the product primarily of the labor required to produce it. It is estimated that about 480 man-hours are required to produce an acre of tobacco.

Dr. J. L. Maxton, extension agricultural ecoonmist at the Virginia Polytechnic Institute, has made a study recently on cigarette costs and tobacco taxation. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an analysis of this study made by Dr. Maxton, which I think is indeed revealing and which I hope will be helpful to the Members of the House in dealing with the proposed increase in tax on cigarettes and tobacco, as in my opinion any further increase in the excise tax on cigarettes will result in decreasing consumption which will disrupt our economy.

The analysis follows:

A recent statistical release by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics gives a general breakdown of the cost of cigarettes from 1926 to 1950, inclusive.

In 1926 the average retail price of a package of 20 cigarettes was 14.6 cents. Of this sum the farmer receives 1.30 cents, the manufacturer and leaf dealer 4.0 cents, distributor 3.2 cents, and Federal and State governments for taxes 6.1 cents.

By 1950 the average retail price of a package of 20 cigarettes was 20.1 cents. Of this sum the farmer received 2.9 cents, the manufacturer and leaf dealer 4.0 cents, the distributor 3.9 cents, and Federal and State governments for taxes 9.3 cents.

In 1950 the manufacturer, leaf dealer, and distributor reecived 40 percent of the retail price of cigarettes, Federal and State governments received 46 percent of the retail price of cigarettes and the farmer-producer received only 14 percent.

Any further increase in the excise taxes on cigarettes by Federal or State governments may be expected to result in decreases in consumption with bad effects to our economy.

The price mechanism is exceedingly delicate. With controls on acreage in the form of acreage allotments and controls on marketing in the form of marketing quotas both the tobacco growers' hands are effectively tied. It hardly seems fair then, with the producers' hands tied by controls, that Federal and State governments should take turns slapping his face with increased taxes on the manufactured product. It is accepted as sound economics that price increases not accompanied by corresponding income increases result in consumption decreases. Many of the cigarette smokers are white-collar workers (not members of any labor union), whose incomes have not been increased in the last year in proportion to their increases in living costs. The only alternative for this group is to go into debt or decrease their tobacco consumption. Since the Federal policy for controlling inflation has been to tighten credit controls their only recourse is to smoke fewer cigarettes or switch to consumption of some cheaper alternative such as smoking tobacco.

Tobacco somehow in the past has become considered as a luxury item. ECA however, considers it a necessity as an incentive good and has shipped hundreds of millions of dollars worth to European, Asiatic, and other countries under its rehabilitation program. In most foreign lands it is a better trading item than food or money itself, therefore is considered a necessity. Frankly, the time is at hand to approach this matter realistically with a full and open discussion on the matter of justification for the taxation of tobacco.

It is a product that lends itself to taxation because of ease of collection. But surely ease of collection of taxes is no justification of itself for taxation. Taxation should be based on income or ability to pay to be fair. The taxes collected from many users of cigarettes are collected from people who are in the lowest-income classes. It would appear that an open airing of the whole matter of tobacco taxes, their justification, the effect on consumption and on tobacco producers and similar considerations is in order. We owe such action to ourselves in the name of progress.

Central Intelligence Agency Reports

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Ex-Head Asserts CIA Reports Should Have Gone to MacArthur," from the Washington Star of today. The article deals with a statement by Rear Adm. Roscoe H. Hillenkoetter, head of the CIA from June 1946 to October 1, 1950, regarding reports by the Central Intelligence Agency on conditions in Korea.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EX-HEAD ASSERTS CIA REPORTS SHOULD HAVE GONE TO MACARTHUR

HONOLULU, May 10.—The man who once headed the Central Intelligence Agency said yesterday he believed it was Washington's responsibility to supply General MacArthur any available evidence on Chinese Red mobilization in Manchuria.

CIA operations have figured in the hearings now in progress in Washington over the removal of General MacArthur from his commands.

General MacArthur has said Washington failed to report to him on the shift of the Chinese Third and Fourth Field Armies from China into Manchuria.

Rear Adm. Roscoe H. Hillenkoetter, head of CIA from June, 1946 to October 1, 1950, said in an interview that CIA was responsible for reporting such strategic intelligence as Chinese troop movements to Manchuria.

NORMAL PROCEDURE

Normal procedure, he said, was for CIA to report to the President, the National Security Council and the Joint Chiefs of Staff. It would be normal for the Joint Chiefs to advise General MacArthur, he added.

Admiral Hillenkoetter said he did not remember prior to October 1 any reports of Chinese troop shifts into Manchuria. And he added he knew nothing of CIA operations since Gen. Walter Bedell Smith, the present CIA chief, replaced him.

The Chinese Reds intervened in Korea in late October.

Admiral Hillenkoetter said CIA had cordial and effective relations with General MacArthur's Far East command up to the time he left the intelligence post.

CAN'T PREDICT INTENTIONS

President Truman told a news conference last week that General MacArthur had denied CIA operations in Tokyo until persuaded by General Smith. General MacArthur, in New York, called that "tommyrot."

Admiral Hillenkoetter said CIA could not be called on to report more than the location and estimate of the capabilities of any Chinese troops in Manchuria.

"To predict the intentions of the enemy, real or potential, you would need a crystal ball," he added.

Free Trade Marches On

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, heretofore granted, I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following article which appeared in the Wall Street Journal under date of May 9, 1951:

TARIFF TRADE—UNITED STATES WILL SLASH DUTY 25 TO 50 PERCENT ON TENTH OF IMPORTS NOW TAXED—IN RETURN, 15 NATIONS WILL MAKE MINOR CUTS ON TWENTIETH OF UNITED STATES EXPORTS—TV, TULIPS, AND TAXIMETERS

(By Ray Cromley)

WASHINGTON.—Uncle Sam has agreed on a new "horse trade."

The United States will cut tariffs on a sizable chunk of our imports from all countries—heavily.

In return, nine countries will reduce their tariffs on United States goods—modestly. Six others agreed to minor concessions.

It figures out this way:

The United States will cut tariffs from 25 to 50 percent on a tenth of all the goods on which we now charge import duties.

In return, the United States will get tariff cuts from the 15 foreign countries on less than one-twentieth of United States exports. Most of these cuts will be trivial.

THIRTY-COUNTRY CONFAB

That in a nutshell is the result of the 30-country tariff conference just ended at Torquay, England, after 8 months of discussions.

One conference paradox: The United States tariff talks with Britain broke down—because the British were unwilling to make any important concessions to us. Yet Britain will be one of the big gainers from United States tariff cuts.

"That's because the cuts we give to one country, we automatically give to every country, even to those countries that won't cooperate," says one official.

Another conference paradox: 16 countries at Torquay announced they were raising some of their tariffs. France, for example, said she was raising duties on 38 types of goods.

Theoretically, these 16 countries made new tariff cuts to make up for the ones they raised. Mostly, though, the concessions they renounced were greater than the new cuts they offered in exchange.

United States tariff cuts will have a mixed effect here.

Consumers will get many goods cheaper, if price hikes don't wipe out the effects of lowered duties. United States producers face hotter foreign competition on the American market.

Cuts by the United States cover thousands of goods across the board. They will range from mop cloths and clothing through raisins and figs to lead, aluminum, machinery, and tobacco. Even the opium duty was cut in half.

DELIGHT FOR TOPERS

Party goers should be delighted. Champagnes will get in a little cheaper. So will French and Italian wines. Also, French laces and perfumes. Canadian whiskeys are included, too—but not Scotch.

If you're a teetotaler, you get in on this too—with a cut on grape-juice duties.

The levy on Canadian caviar was cut in half; on imported orchids also. The foreign-made gold or platium jewelry you might want for a party dress—if you can afford it—will be taxed a little less as it comes in. Metal users from war manufacturers to auto and refrigerator makers will get a little relief.

Duties on key metals and minerals like lead, bismuth, chrome, zirconium, vanadium, and barium will be cut squarely in half. So will tariffs on boron, strontium, thorium, and silicon. Tariffs on titanium, pig iron, ferromanganese, zinc, and aluminum will be cut from 20 percent to 30 percent.

If you're a smoker, these new tariffs may help you, too. The duties on cigars and cheroots will be sliced in half. Unstemmed cigarette leaf tobacco duties will be reduced a quarter.

PISTOLS AND HORSERADISH

If you're more interested in what your wife puts on the table, there are reductions in duties on cheeses, frozen blackberries, grapes, bananas, horseradish, and candied apricots and peaches.

If you're a gardener and like Holland tulips, or narcissuses, tariffs on imported bulbs will be reduced a little.

Then there are cuts on cocoa and chocolate, on Italian matches, on tanning extract, French garters, drawing ink, Korean iodine, lampblack, white lead, mica, German razors, telescopes, swords, and sewing machines—to say nothing of Swedish taximeters, German pistols and revolvers, Turkish licorice. Brazilian plywood, Canadian cream, French post cards, Norwegian fish cakes and acetic acids. Musical instruments and radios and television are included, too, along with a host of other goods, important and trivial.

Many American businessmen are going to be worried by these tariff cuts. There are 50-percent lower duties on many types of clocks and clock movements and parts, for example.

American canners won't be happy about the 40-percent cut which United States diplomats promised on imported canned salmon.

EARTHENWARE AND FILBERTS

American makers may be miffed by the lowered rates in store for Italian earthenware.

American nut growers—who have been complaining about tariffs being too low—won't be happy that United States negotiators promised not to raise duties on imported filberts. American fig, grape, and raisin growers will be bothered about the new low rates on these imported fruits.

American manufacturers are going to be bothered by growing competition from West German exporters. A key to what's coming shows up in the United States tariff cuts won by German negotiators.

The Germans argued for and won lowered United States duties on china, chinaware, drawing instruments, clocks, and on wool yarns and a wide variety of toys. Harmonica tariffs were slashed in half; camera duties a quarter. Duties on some coal-tar chemicals were cut in half. A wide range of German machinery will also get in cheaper.

United States exporters will reap some benefits from these tariff cuts.

If you are an American fruit exporter you'll get a number of breaks. Several countries cut tariffs on typewriters and other office machinery and equipment. Some concessions were made to United States exports of tires, passenger cars, and trucks.

Canada cut tariffs on many types of machinery, and on many iron and steel products. Brazil reduced levies on electric motors and dynamos. Peru cut duties on some electrical equipment. Korea cut tariffs on wheat flour, Norway on some kinds of tractors and grinding, boring, and drilling machinery.

State Department officials say the Americans who export to Canada and Western Germany will be the biggest beneficiaries. Canada seemingly made the biggest concessions of any country on the list—except for the United States, of course.

Officials here say it's not certain when these new tariff rates will take effect. Some will start in June. Others will be put into effect gradually between June and November this year as the conference countries ratify the Torquay agreements. Each of the 147 separate Torquay agreements will go into effect 1 month after the countries concerned ratify.

Letter of Jack Allen, of Los Angeles, Calif.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. AYRES
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, although I have never had the privilege of visiting the great State of California I have enjoyed making the acquaintance of many California Members in the House of Representatives. I have what I believe to be a rather startling story of interest to all the Members of the House.

I own a small heating company in Akron, Ohio, and am listed in Dun & Bradstreet as its president. I am known to be a successful small-business man and have never been known to be a sucker for fast operators. Nor am I a race-track fan in any sense of the word.

The letter printed below was received in my office in Akron and as stated the writer called collect on the morning of April 26. My efficient secretary there answered the phone and informed Jack Allen that although I was the president of William H. Ayres, Inc., he would have to call me in Washington as I was now a Member of Congress. Mr. Allen replied: "What, he's a Congressman!" and hung up. No doubt he had heard of the Kefauver committee.

I think the Members of the House will be interested in this letter:

ALLEN LEWIS CO. ENTERPRISES,
Los Angeles, April 17, 1951.

Mr. WILLIAM H. AYRES,
Akron, Ohio.

DEAR MR. AYRES: On Thursday, April 26, 1951, at Jamaica, Long Island, racetrack in New York, there will be a horse entered which, I have every reason to believe, will be of great interest to you. It is my sincere belief that this horse will win at good odds.

Relative to the above-mentioned transaction, I will take the liberty of calling you on that date collect. If you are interested, kindly accept my call.

Should you desire any further information, feel free to contact me at your earliest convenience.

Looking forward to our conversation.

Yours truly,

JACK ALLEN.

MacArthur Controversy and American Destiny

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Walter Lippmann has, in the following article, posed some questions which are certainly worthy of our attention:

THE QUESTION OF AMERICAN DESTINY
(By Walter Lippmann)

This must surely be the first time in all human experience that a people has conducted a council of war in the presence of its actual and possible enemies.

The hearings, to be sure, are not open to television and the transcript of the testimony is being subjected to a certain amount of censorship. But what is being censored must be of little interest, let us say to Moscow and to Peiping, as compared with what is being brought out.

The censor is deleting certain military facts and estimates which, assuming that they are not known, would enable our adversaries to measure more accurately the efficiency of our intelligence services and of their own. The censor is not deleting the conflicting war plans and conflicting political ideals over which this country, and even its professional military leaders, are so bitterly divided. Whatever the outcome of this public council of war—this farthest north in superpublicity, this unique case of open strategy openly arrived at—Moscow and Peiping will know it as soon as we do.

They know what General MacArthur and the Republicans would do if they could get the better of President Truman and the Democrats. They have weeks, perhaps months, to work out their reply in case the MacArthur policy wins out. They know also, more or less accurately, what President Truman intends not to do, if he can rebut the MacArthur party. They can choose to make it hard or easy for the Truman policy; they can play the war to get whatever result they think is desirable, to entangle us more or to entangle us less, knowing at all times as much about our intentions as we know ourselves.

The controversy itself covers a lot of ground and turns on a series of great issues. Some of them are deep and far-reaching. When the general was speaking it seemed at times that there was at issue the very conception of the American destiny. Is the American destiny now an imperial destiny? Or is it the American destiny to be the protector and the promoter of the Atlantic community and of the western civilization which is at home within it?

At the bottom of the whole controversy, which did not begin this year, or last year, but has smoldered on since long before the World War, there is a profound conflict of view about what is the American destiny.

This conflict is older than MacArthur and Marshall and Truman, not to speak of TAFT and KNOWLAND and WHERRY. It goes back at least as far as the Spanish-American War and the conquest of the Philippines. It is not going to be settled soon, and we shall be arguing it for a long time to come.

As we argue it we should realize that it is a great, indeed a noble, controversy. It turns upon whether, like all our predecessors in the days when they rose to power, we must become, and wish to become, the masters of an empire which we rule for our glory and for its benefit—or whether we wish to be the first servants of a community of free nations, all of them the big and the small alike, the heirs with us and the custodians with us of the western civilization which originated in the Mediterranean and has expanded about the Atlantic Ocean.

But though this controversy—the truly great and enduring American debate—cannot be settled and concluded in these hearings, or in the next election, it is, I believe, the necessary context for understanding General MacArthur's views and the opposition to them.

The incalculable risks—incalculable by his own admission—which General MacArthur wishes to accept by making war on China are simply incomprehensible if nothing more is at stake than to bring about a cease-fire in Korea and the withdrawal from Korea of the Chinese—and presumably also the American—armies. The risks that General MacArthur wishes to take become comprehensible only in the context of the general's vision—his vision of the Pacific Ocean as an American lake and of Japan as lying within the sphere of American power and of China, with Chiang restored, brought within the American sphere of influence.

The general's proposal to risk a third world war in order to end war in Korea sounds, when one first hears it, like a case of wishing to burn down the barn to roast the pig. The risks are fantastically greater than any advantage that could be got out of taking them.

But his proposals take on a different look if we recognize that his objective is American paramountcy in the Far East—in Japan, Korea, and China. That would be, that has often been, the kind of objective worth a world war, which empire builders have worked for. But there will be many of us, most of us I truly believe, who think the prospect of such an empire a dreary one, likely to destroy not only American freedom, as we have known it, but also the desire to use power generously, which is so very American.

United States Occupation Policy in Germany

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, in February General Eisenhower addressed a joint meeting of Members of Congress and established his now famous position on Germany, stating:

I personally think that there has to be a political platform achieved, an understanding that will contemplate an eventual and an earned equality on the part of that nation before we should start to talk about including units of Germans in any kind of army.

Shortly thereafter, I compared the occupation policy in Germany under High Commissioner McCloy with this position in a speech on the floor of the House of Representatives raising the subjects of the decartelization and denazification programs and the Nazi war criminals, and again suggested an investigation of our occupation policy in Western Germany as part of our foreign policy. In response to this expression of views I have now received a detailed letter from High Commissioner McCloy, which should be of great interest to all who are concerned about our occupation policy there. The seriousness of the situation is underscored and the dangers evidenced by the success of ultra-Nationalist and neo-Nazi parties in recent elections in lower Saxony and Austria. A firm and knowledgeable occupation policy in Western Germany was never more necessary than now. High Commissioner McCloy has given me his permission to release these parts of his letter and I append them hereto:

UNITED STATES HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR GERMANY,
APO 757-A, Frankfurt, April 18, 1951.

The Honorable J. K. JAVITS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JAVITS: Thank you for your letter of February 8, 1951. Although I have replied to a later letter from you, which reply in part covers some of the material in this letter, I have thought it wise to go over the field covered in your earlier letter in some detail. I am sorry of the delay in answering, but these letters take time to prepare and the pressures have been particularly heavy in the past few months.

On the matter of a congressional investigation, I have already given my views. I still believe that such an investigation would not be in the American interest in the present situation.

Most of the specific points raised in your resolution will be fully reported on at the appropriation hearings in Congress in the next few weeks. They are all fair and important questions, but I think they can be satisfactorily answered either at that time or found in the carefully prepared reports which this office makes quarterly in Germany. As I have said before, it is of the greatest importance in Germany and Europe today that the United States avoid giving the impression of disagreement and lack of clarity about its foreign policy—and this I believe would be the inevitable effect of the investigation you propose. However, should it be decided to hold such an investigation, this office will naturally do everything to cooperate with you.

Before I go into details of your letter and the speech which you enclose, I should like to make a few general observations regarding the problem of Germany. I have now been fairly directly concerned with United States policy in this country since 1941 when I became Assistant Secretary of War. I think I have gained some understanding of the problems we have to contend with, and I have had some share in the development of the policy to meet those problems. Though in one or another respect there have been changes in policy, there has been no change regarding our over-all objective regarding the extirpation of nazism and the fostering of democracy in Germany. It has been very clearly realized that stamping out nazism is not only a matter of defeating it in a war—it means changing the social and cultural conditions out of which it developed, and creating conditions which will lead to democratic developments.

This I take to be our major objective still. Any policy which forgot what our stake in a democratic Germany is, or which assumed that our democratic objective could be sacrificed to other more expedient aims, would be criminally negligent and dangerous.

This brings me to your letter, in which you place great emphasis on General Eisenhower's report on Germany. You apparently believe that the policy as stated by General Eisenhower is different from the policy of HICOG in Germany. On this, as I indicated in my earlier letter, I am unable to agree with you. The policy of the United States in Germany, as I have understood and carried it out, has from the days of General Clay had as one of its aims what General Eisenhower admirably summed up in the words "eventual and earned equality." The London Conference of 1948, that at New York, and then at Brussels, have all dealt with a Germany progressively regaining her place in the family of nations. The policy expressed by the Foreign Ministers at all these meetings has each time made clear that the progress which Germany makes toward equality depends upon the German people themselves.

The present discussions concerning German participation in western defense are wholly consistent with this policy. It is still our objective to prevent a militaristic Germany from coming into being. It is still a matter of grave concern to us that Germany be a peaceful and democratic nation. We have no need to sacrifice these objectives by proposing that Germany contribute to the defense of the west.

It is true that in some quarters, both American and German, there has arisen a feeling that the present situation is such that the United States is now inclined to "buy" or bid for German participation in European defense at the cost of our democratic objectives. I have taken every occasion to combat this notion in public statements and in practice. By this time, it is not a widespread notion any longer in Germany, though it still seems to be held in the United States, since even the Landsberg decisions were treated in this light by a section of the American press.

I should like to say a few words on this subject too, because in your press release of February 2 you refer to the decisions as though they were related to the political situation in Germany, and the issue of German participation in particular.

The fact is that I appointed the Clemency Board in March 1950, long before there was any thought of German participation. I appointed the Board because I considered it a fundamental principle of American justice that persons accused shall have a right of appeal. I call your attention to the fact that unlike criminal cases in the United States or England, there was no provision for these cases to have further court review for possible errors of law or fact after they had been passed on by the court of first instance.

The Board's report and my own examination of the cases were made entirely in the context of "justice American style," as you put it, and without regard to political pressures of any kind. I am sending you a copy of a pamphlet which we have prepared on the Landsberg decisions. I hope you will look through it. I recommend especially to your attention the introduction to the Clemency Board's report which begins on page 13. I also call your attention to the fact that the Board submitted its report in August 1950, a month before the matter German participation was first raised at the New York Conference of Foreign Ministers.

As for the particular case of Alfried Krupp, I find it difficult to understand the reaction on any other basis than the effect of a notorious name. After a detailed study of this case, I was convinced that Alfried Krupp deserved clemency. Certainly there was reasonable doubt that he was responsible for the policies of the Krupp Co., in which he occupied a rather junior position. I also found it very doubtful that he had any responsibility for the use of slave labor in the Krupp plant. It is true that the name of Krupp stands as a symbol of evil, of the German armaments industry. I was not concerned with a symbol. Instead, I had to decide on the extent of the guilt of a specific individual, Alfried Krupp. Others whose responsibility was greater than his had been given lighter sentences (and had been released) for the same crimes for which he was convicted. Moreover, it was this man's father, not the defendant, who helped finance Hitler and who was the directing force of the Krupp works. I am inclined to think that the son took his place in the dock largely because his father was on his death bed at the time. Certainly he would not have occupied as prominent a place if his father had likewise been tried.

Finally, I should like to say that by reason of the Landsberg decisions, I believe that the true nature of the Nazi crimes, their depth and extent and their motivation, are better known and understood today in Germany than they have ever been. We have sent out 780,000 copies of this pamphlet in Germany. More people have read and thought about the Nazi crimes than ever was the case during the trials, and the latter can no longer be dismissed as merely the law of the victor over the vanquished.

Germany is progressing. It has yet to meet the great tests of its final status. They may not come for 10 or 15 years. The new Government has been in existence for little more than 1 year. Nazis do not control the Government. It is controlled by resistance people, former Weimar people, large representations of labor, Socialists, and Conservatives, but they are far from Nazis and just as fine people as the Liberals. There are on the outer fringes some Communists and some old Nazis. That is the present order of the German Government.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. McCLOY.

School Safety Patrol

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK T. BOW

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, this week end the Nation's Capital will be the scene of an invasion by 23,000 of America's finest young citizens.

The young people of whom I speak are members of school safety patrol units throughout the United States.

These boys and girls are carrying out in magnificent fashion a very vital task—the task of guarding the safety of their schoolmates en route to and from school.

They receive no pay. They are at their posts early in the morning and stay until the last each evening. Their noon hours are seldom their own, and they remain on duty even in the most inclement weather.

Therein lies the foundation of good citizenship. Devotion to service to their fellow students without thought of compensation brands these boys and girls as citizens from whom we can expect leadership in the years to come.

I am happy to pay tribute to all these fine young people. I am particularly pleased to do so since 112 of these attending the fifteenth national assembly here this week end are from my own Sixteenth Ohio District.

It is especially fitting that a group from Canton, Ohio, should be here for this assembly, for Mr. Harry Staley, of Canton, was one of the originators of the school safety patrol program.

Mr. Staley, a member of the Canton Automobile Club and the Canton Board of Education, became aware of the need for some type of safety program.

In 1924 he established a system which was widely adopted, and which became one of the primary bases for the School Safety Patrol system in use throughout the Nation today.

I know that Mr. Staley would be very pleased and very proud if he were able to be in this city this week end, for the school safety patrol program has developed into the fine organization which he must have envisioned.

Congress Should Extend Hospitalization, Medical Care, Compensation, and Other Benefits to Korean Veterans on Same Basis as Has Been Provided for World War II Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOE L. EVINS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, I earnestly hope that the House will see fit to take immediate action upon this resolution, House Joint Resolution 257, which the leadership is today proposing in order to extend to our new veterans—the veterans of the Korean conflict—the rights and benefits allowed to veterans of World War II. This is long overdue and certainly to delay further would only multiply the instances of inconvenience and injustice which have inevitably developed.

This resolution would grant to veterans of the Korean war the same rights and benefits as have heretofore been provided under the law to the veterans of World War II—including hospitalization, medical care and other benefits and entitlements including compensation and pensions, but not including veterans education and training benefits. This latter veterans benefit program is yet to be enacted.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I have heretofore introduced in this Congress bills to provide Korean veterans with hospitalization and medical care and also compensation and pensions—benefits similar to those provisions of law affecting World War II veterans. I had hoped that action might have been obtained in this regard long before now. Such action has been incumbent upon us for a long period of time and I am most pleased that the sentiment has developed for taking such action and passing this meritorious legislation for the protection of our new veterans. Certainly no debate or long discussion is needed or necessary—this is a case of simple justice to our men fighting in Korea, our new veterans and our future veterans. I commend the leadership of the House in proposing action in this particular. So let us act now.

Should Give Priority to Perjury Prosecutions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial which appeared in the May 6 issue of the Jackson (Miss.) Clarion-Ledger:

SHOULD GIVE PRIORITY TO PERJURY PROSECUTIONS

Mississippians, with a decent concern and consideration for their State's good name and that of the Democratic Party in Mississippi, welcome the Washington announcement that the records compiled by the Senate committee which investigated charges of sales of Federal jobs in the State are to be turned over to the Justice Department for possible criminal prosecutions of persons involved.

Many of these Mississippians may share the attitude expressed by Postmaster General Donaldson as a witness in Washington when he said: "If I were sitting as judge, I would be inclined to quit those who were forced to buy the jobs and prosecute to the limit those who forced them to make the contributions."

Much of the testimony made it very clear, however, that fair and effective prosecution of any job sellers would be seriously handicapped, if not made impossible, unless preceded by perjury prosecutions to bring out the facts, to determine who lied and who told the truth, who can be believed under oath and who cannot.

Two of the three Senators who conducted the hearings in Jackson declared at their conclusion that much perjury had been committed.

"There is bound to have been some perjury committed," Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN, a Democrat, declared.

"There was a lot of perjured testimony," Senator KARL MUNDT, North Dakota Republican, bluntly stated. And he added, "This will be referred to the Department of Justice."

The briefer hearings held since then in Washington have produced more sworn testimony directly contradicting some of that given here in Jackson.

For example: Postmaster General Donaldson is quoted as denouncing as pure falsehood, sworn testimony by Clarence E. Hood, given in Jackson, quoting the Postmaster General as saying that he wasn't taking the job-selling charges seriously because they were made by Mississippi Congressmen trying to regain control of patronage.

"I want to be as forceful as possible," Mr. Donaldson was quoted as saying about Hood's testimony, "but all I can say is that it is pure falsehood."

Washington testimony by Robert M. Moore, assistant to Democratic National Chairman Boyle, also denied sworn testimony by Jackson witnesses.

He denied that he has ever told leaders of the pro-Truman Mississippi Democratic group that it was all right for them to accept contributions for the national committee.

He denied that Curtis Rogers had offered to share with the national committee the proceeds of the Mississippi Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner sponsored by that group.

He denied telling Mrs. C. B. Murphy, of Winona, that she would be reimbursed for refunds to purchasers of Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner tickets.

Mr. Moore, in brief, swore that he had no knowledge that contributions were being made by Mississippi job applicants.

The Washington testimony thus contradicts much of the testimony offered at the hearings in Jackson, and much of the latter testimony was so contradictory that the presiding Senators declared that perjury was obvious.

Mississippians would like to see any and all job sellers prosecuted. But just and effective prosecution requires that the truth, the whole truth, be brought out. And that cannot be done until juries in perjury trials decide who lied and who cannot be believed under oath.

Old Soldiers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Daily Evening Item, Lynn, Mass.:

SONG REVIVED—OLD SOLDIERS' COMPOSER FOUND TO BE LYNN WOMAN

The Library of Congress has discovered that the barracks ballad resurrected to fame by Gen. Douglas MacArthur—Old Soldiers Never Die, They Just Fade Away—originated in a semisacred song composed in 1858 by one of the Singing Hutchinsons of Lynn.

According to a reference librarian in the Library of Congress music division, the ballad that General MacArthur paraphrased in his address before Congress April 19, was originally entitled "Kind Words Can Never Die." It was composed by Abigail Jemima (Abby Hutchinson) Patton.

She was a member of the famous family of troubadours who lived on High Rock. Three generations of the Singing Hutchinsons returned to High Rock after concert tours which took them from Boston's Faneuil Hall to the California gold field. Pioneers of family group singing, they performed for Lincoln in the White House and for McClellan's troops.

John Hutchinson, "the Bard of Lynn," gave the city the land on which High Rock Tower was erected.

It is not known just when the Kind Words song evolved into the Old Soldiers' version. Perhaps during the Civil War, for the Old Soldier song was a favorite with Civil War veterans.

"It is curious," said the Government librarian, "how the chorus has survived without the original verses." Except for a note or two, the chorus of Old Soldiers is the same as when Sister Abby composed Kind Words.

MacArthur—Ridgway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, permit me to call attention of the House to the following very interesting article by Marquis Childs:

LEADERSHIP BY RIDGWAY
(By Marquis Childs)
HEALING THE SPLIT

The civil war in Washington has pushed the Korean war off the front page. Unfortunately this has obscured the achievement of a general who has proved that he was right by the only test that counts—success in meeting and stopping the enemy.

While he has now transferred his headquarters to Tokyo, the successes in Korea owe a lot to the leadership of Lt. Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway. To understand this is only necessary to recall the situation prevailing when Ridgway took over last December 26.

The retreat from North Korea had not been halted. There was still talk of disaster. Tentative plans were approved in the Pentagon to fall back to the old Pusan beachhead in the south and then to evacuate American troops from there to Japan, with the remnants of the South Korean army going to Okinawa.

Ridgway was flown out to take over after Lt. Gen. Walton Walker was killed in a jeep accident on December 23. It was one of the darkest periods in the Korean war.

In 5 months the new commander reassembled and regrouped the United Nations forces. He put new morale and new conviction into an army that was pretty well demoralized. As a consequence, the latest Chinese Communist offensive has been held according to plan.

The enemy, in the opinion of Lt. Gen. James Van Fleet, now in command in the field, is preparing another attack. But the same confidence prevails that this time, too, the Red drive will fail. Here is an achievement of the first magnitude, and it should not be lost sight of in the midst of this snarling mess at home.

What General Ridgway has done is further obscured by the stand that General MacArthur takes in his testimony in the Senate inquiry. MacArthur denies that his forces were dangerously split in the drive into North Korea. He goes so far as to insist that they were deployed exactly right and that he would not change his orders if he had to do it again.

He insists in the same connection that there was no rout, no disorder, as the Eighth Army fell back. This, says General MacArthur, was a planned retreat.

News stories written by combat correspondents on the scene at the time were almost directly contrary to this. Some of these correspondents have since returned to America and in their writings and speeches they repeat that the U. N. forces in Korea were divided in such a way as to invite the enemy into a vacuum in the middle. They say that the liaison between the divided forces was almost nonexistent and they reaffirm what they wrote at the time about the rout that followed the intervention of a comparatively small force of Communist Chinese.

Some correspondents go so far as to say that the initial intervention may have been by a mere reconnaissance force of four to five divisions. After these divisions discovered the true situation, the invasion in mass took place. These same correspondents say that when the orders were issued from MacArthur's headquarters in Tokyo to push to the Yalu River, Chinese prisoners were already being taken and that fact reported to Tokyo.

In the light of this contradiction, I should like to make a most earnest recommendation to the Senate committee. Call before the committee under oath some of the able combat correspondents who have seen the Korean war at first hand. I am thinking of newsmen like Stan Swinton of the Associated Press, Keyes Beech of the Chicago Daily News, and Homer Bigart of the New York Herald Tribune. Other names will occur and it should not be difficult to compile a list of a half dozen who have seen more of the fighting than any general and who have heard at first hand more about the war than any general.

If the committee does this, it will, in my opinion, have a better chance of getting some objective facts than in any other way. The testimony of the newsmen will have nothing of self-interest in it. Most of these men covered World War II or they fought in it. They are as much military experts—for my money, much more so—than the desk generals who too often are surplusage at Army headquarters far in the rear of the fighting front.

These veteran correspondents need not be called on for their conclusions if there is any apprehension lest the prejudice most of them share against MacArthur's headquarters should enter in, although I, for one, would like to hear their conclusions. But let them be asked about what they saw and heard.

If this is an inquiry to get at the truth, here are eyewitnesses who also happen to be trained observers. The committee has a chance to give the public something besides partisanship.

Murder of a Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE I. BAKEWELL
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. BAKEWELL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to invite the attention of the membership of the House to an editorial which appeared in the St. Louis Star-Times of Tuesday, May 8, entitled "Murder of a Program."

Today we are concerned with preventing the spread of communism and increasing our preparedness effort. The slums are the most fertile breeding places for communism. A man does not care about ideologies when he cannot keep a roof over himself and his family.

The preparedness effort will result in the influx of large numbers of people to the urban industrial centers. They are necessary in order to man the machines which are once again turning out the weapons of war. Unless we have the manpower we cannot make the guns, the ships, or the planes. But how can you induce a man to move to a place where he cannot find a decent dwelling for his family? I say, Mr. Speaker, that those who contend that because of the world situation we cannot afford a program of public housing distort the facts. Now of all times we must push forward with such a program.

The editorial is as follows:

MURDER OF A PROGRAM

Economy, like charity, it becomes increasingly obvious, can be used to cover a multitude of sins. It has just been used by the House to excuse an action that would practically kill off the public-housing program in this Nation.

With more than a third of the Representatives absent or not voting, the House decided no more than 5,000 public-housing units should be built in the Nation this year. That would mean, on an equitable distribution, only 104 units for each of the 48 States. Construction on such a microscopic scale would be senseless. It would be more honest simply to kill off the program and let it go at that.

St. Louis alone has plans for more than 5,000 units of public low-income housing. And the briefest of tours of St. Louis' slums will show that the plans are not overambitious. The cancerous tenements are eating away the very life of the city. They must be replaced, and with housing that the present slum dwellers can afford. Only Government aid, it has been abundantly established, can provide such housing.

It will not do to say that the Nation is in a military crisis and so cannot now afford the "luxury" of adequate housing. This is no luxury. It is at any time a necessity of sound national living. That is even more forcibly true now, when defense production must of necessity depend in large part on provision of good housing for defense workers.

President Truman already had made in his budget allowance for the pressures of military spending. Instead of recommending construction of the 350,000 public housing units that previous congressional action had authorized, he asked for only 75,000 units. So much was a sensible cut. That which the House has made was outright murder of a whole program.

Fortunately public reaction to the House maneuver has been prompt and vigorous. Mayor Darst already has taken the lead in rallying forces from other municipalities to impress on Congress the need for a good housing program. Since the third of the House that was silent on the first vote can still be induced to force reconsideration, his campaign stands a good chance of success.

Certainly it should attain that success. This Nation will be immensely the poorer if it does not.

"Air Force Pilots, Navigators, Bombardiers, Air and Ground Crews, Drilled Relentlessly in Their Jobs, Are Approaching a Readiness for Any Emergency"—Benjamin Welles

OF
HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, there have been times in recent months when it seemed that the survival of the free nations of the world was altogether dependent upon the readiness with which the Armed Forces of the United States could successfully repulse sudden assault. It is still conceded that the United States Air Force B–36 and the atom bomb have long been the sole deterrent against attack by communistic Russia in her lust for power.

It was because of these facts that I was particularly intrigued by an article which I found in the New York Times—carrying a London date line and written by Benjamin Welles, special correspondent of that great metropolitan daily.

The article, headed "United States Air Force in Britain Nearing State of Readiness for Emergency," discloses but a small glimpse at the global defenses being developed by the United States Air Force to take care of every foreseeable emergency.

Mr. Speaker, it was indeed heartening to read just how effectively our Air Force is on the forefront of the fighting lines throughout the world—readied as far as is possible for every emergency—not alone here at home—but abroad as well.

Pilots, navigators, bombardiers, air and ground crews, are drilled relentlessly in their jobs. In the language of Benjamin Welles:

In case of war, United States air fleets could be in action in a mere matter of hours.

Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues in this House and the people in general might have a fuller appreciation of the splendid work being done by our Air Force, I include herein the article entitled "United States Air Force in Britain Nearing State of Readiness for Emergency," as reproduced in the New York Times.

That article is as follows:

UNITED STATES AIR FORCE IN BRITAIN NEARING STATE OF READINESS FOR EMERGENCY

(By Benjamin Welles)

LONDON, May 6.—An unpublicized but significant build-up in United States air strength in Europe lies behind the transformation of the United States Third Air Division here into the Third Air Force. The new designation was announced from General of the Army Dwight D. Eisenhower's headquarters a few days ago.

There are now more than 20,000 United States airmen, ground crewmen, engineers, and antiaircraft artillerymen stationed in Britain as part of the Western World's defense against sudden aggression.

The promotion of Maj. Gen. Leon W. Johnson's Third Air Division to a full-fledged air command means that the air installations here are approaching a readiness for any emergency.

It is not so much the number of planes as the facilities for those planes that are being increased. Vast runways are being rebuilt to take the landing shock of B–36 or B–50 bombers, gasoline and lubricants are being stored, a radio communications network installed, spare parts stocked, and pilots, navigators, bombardiers, air and ground crews drilled relentlessly in their jobs.

In case of war, say those who know, the United States air fleets could be in action in a matter of hours. The units in Britain could fly from here, while other units could pass through. To handle such traffic, months of intensive preparation are necessary. Such preparations are well advanced.

A "gentleman's agreement" between the United States and Britain makes it possible for United States planes to train on British territory in peacetime. The United States pays for some facilities it uses, the British Government donates others. The basic accord between the two Governments is virtually unwritten.

The vanguard of United States air units came here in 1948 under command of General Johnson, holder of the Medal of Honor and veteran of the raid on the Ploesti oil field of Rumania in August 1943. General Johnson's main task here was to train bomber wings sent over in rotation by the Strategic Air Command. These wings, of forty-five bombers each, spend 90 days or more here, return home for leave, then do another training tour in the Caribbean, Labrador, or Alaska.

GENERAL OLD TO HEAD TRAINING

From now on, the bomber wings in training here will be supervised by Maj. Gen. Archie Old, head of the Seventh Air Division, which has just been set up under General Johnson's Third Air Force. General Johnson is expected to devote most of his time to overseeing completion of installations at a dozen United States air bases throughout the United Kingdom, leaving General Old free to carry out the training.

At present, United States air power in Britain consists of 1 bomb wing (45 to 50 bombers); 1 fighter wing (a similar number of F–84E Thunderjet escort fighters); 20 converted B–29 refueling planes, and a half dozen RB–45 four-jet reconnaissance bombers that will be replaced soon by British twin-jet Canberras.

For the first months of the Korean war the Far East Air Forces and the Strategic Air Force had top priority for United States Air Force planes, men, and materials. Now more men and especially base equipment are arriving here as the United States defenses in Europe grow under the North Atlantic Treaty program.

RELIEVE RAF UNITS

As United States airmen arrive in greater numbers, the Royal Air Force airmen who have been on loan in thousands for the last 3 years to maintain and service the United States bases are going back to their own units. The newly arrived United States Thirty-second Antiaircraft Artillery Group is relieving British brigades from the responsibility of protecting United States bases.

"Without British help in the past 3 years, I don't know what we would have done," a United States air officer said recently. "I know we have been helping to protect Britain by being here—but they have gone out of their way to help us, even when it meant sharing their own limited facilities."

In the coming months, it is expected, United States bomb wings in training may participate in Atlantic Pact air exercises. The Third Air Force is under Lieut. Gen. Lauris Norstad, General Eisenhower's top American air aide, who commands also the Twelfth Air Force on the Continent and will head a still undesignated air force to be set up along the north African coast.

"We don't have so many planes in Europe as the Russians," a highly informed source said recently. "But we're building facilities that will give us a terrific punch if trouble comes. It took months before ground facilities were ready for us in the last war; this time we've learned our lesson."

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, at long last one great American, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, has placed devotion to his country ahead of personal considerations. When the General spoke his honest convictions he sacrificed his career as a soldier. Because he dared to disagree with the President, he was removed from his command.

The American people have been aroused by the action by the President in taking immediate reprisal against General MacArthur. They do not approve of the method which the President used even if they agree to his right to remove the General. And the administration is well aware of the temper of the people.

As usual when the administration blunders, the smoke screen is speedily set up. Once again we are warned of the horrors of atomic bombing, a danger of which every American is well aware. And once again the President takes to the air to try to sell himself as the people's champion for peace.

It is ironic to listen to the President as he warns of the results of an atomic war, and hear his words uttered apparently in all seriousness, "I do not want to be responsible for bringing that about."

But who started the Korean war? A review of the facts discloses that it was Mr. Truman who ordered American intervention in Korea, and after that order was issued called upon the United Nations to join the United States in that action. Did Mr. Truman on that occasion have any assurance that Russia would not move? Was not our initial action in Korea a calculated risk, a gamble which has already cost us more than 60,000 casualties?

Mr. Truman hopes that the American people will forget such trivial facts and will accept him as the great proponent for peace. He hopes they will forget that it was his decision that the atom bomb first be used at Hiroshima and Nagasaki thereby setting the precedent for the use of this monstrous weapon of destruction against unarmed noncombatant civilian population.

It is tragic that in this time of national crisis the administration places partisan and personal interests before national concerns. The past blunders of the administration have contributed to the serious situation which we face today, and a look at the record proves this fact.

The following editorial from a recent issue of the Los Angeles Tidings reviews the dismissal of General MacArthur and the facts behind administration policy, and I recommend it for your attention:

THE GENERAL PROTESTS SLOW SURRENDER POLICY

(By Richard L. Stokes)

It seems a pity that a great soldier must sacrifice his career if he wishes to express an opinion on public affairs contrary to that of this Commander in Chief, the President of the United States.

At the Yalta conference, Admiral William D. Leahy, President Roosevelt's Chief of Staff, was struck with misgivings over the deliverance of Catholic Poland into the hands of atheist communism, and the creation of a military vacuum in Europe which the Red Army would be tempted to occupy.

Leahy protested to Roosevelt, who replied feebly that it was the best he could do. It never occurred to the admiral to carry his opposition to the American people. He waited to publish it until he had retired from service and was at liberty to write his memoirs.

AMERICA'S WORST DEFEAT

Thus there was no obstacle to that ghastly scene in which Mr. Roosevelt reported to Congress as a triumph what was actually the worst defeat in American diplomacy.

The surrender of Czechoslovakia was offered to Gen. George S. Patton, Jr., by the Nazi commander in Prague. He was forbidden to accept it by General Eisenhower, acting under instructions from Mr. Roosevelt and General Marshall.

Against military advice, the late John G. Winant, Ambassador to Great Britain and American representative on the European Advisory Committee, refused in 1943 to ask from Russia guaranties of free access to Berlin by land and water.

"We can't do that to our gallant Soviet ally," said the Ambassador, with tears in his eyes. But he drove a hard bargain with England for right of passage through its zone from Hamburg to Berlin. He, too, acted under instructions from Washington. Winant took his life after the Berlin blockade revealed the harm he had done to his own country.

General MacArthur had the patriotism to break the tradition, at immense personal cost, in order to bring home to the American public what he considered the fatal policy of the Truman administration in the Orient.

The President and his advisers, MacArthur charged, refused to admit that they had blundered into an all-out war with Red China, and insisted on stalling in Korea at the price of more than 1,000 American casualties a week.

CHARGES BOOMERANG

The Government promptly branded the general a "warmonger," and exalted Truman as a champion of peace. But who started the Korean war? Certainly not General MacArthur. By his own admission, President Truman began it, at the insistence of Secretary of State Dean G. Acheson.

The general was then accused of violating the Constitution, under which the President a civilian, is made Commander in Chief of the Nation's Armed Forces. But the Constitution also limits to Congress the power of making war.

On his sole authority, President Roosevelt waged an undeclared war against Germany, in the Atlantic, months before Pearl Harbor. Truman followed in his footsteps by initiating a one-man war in Korea which may well prove the prelude to world war III.

What the authors of the Constitution had in mind with regard to the Presidency may be proved from the document itself. Election to the Presidency was withheld from popular vote. The legislatures of each State were to choose their ablest and most patriotic citizens as members of an electoral college which in turn would pick as President the best qualified man in all the Nation.

Not for a moment did they suspect that the party system would enable a President to make himself master of Congress and the Supreme Court; to make treaties, under the guise of agreements, without the advice and consent of the Senate; and to plunge the Nation into war without advice.

PARTISAN INTERESTS PREVAIL

It was not anticipated that Presidents would come to put partisan and personal interests invariably before national concerns; and that in time a soldier, without political bonds, might have the only voice capable of speaking for the country as a whole.

It was that accent of devotion to the national welfare, uttered in simple sincerity for the first time in years, that made General MacArthur's address to the Congress so moving and memorable.

Strange also, to American ears, as coming from a public man, was General MacArthur's stress on religion. Not for a long time had a statesman dared say that our soldiers are "in my prayers always" and that our defenses "must be of the spirit if we are to save the flesh."

Quoting from his own address following Japan's surrender, the general recalled that every secular means—including military alliances, balances of power, and leagues of nations—has failed as an alternative to war. He concluded with the truth, familiar to all Catholics, that salvation is to be found only in the regeneration of the individual.

"Basically," he had the courage to declare, "the problem is theological, and involves a spiritual recrudescence and improvement of human character."

But the pious soldier has been overthrown by the very men who destroyed the missionary movement in China. Through their appeasement of communism, President Truman, General Marshall, and Secretary Acheson surrendered Christianity in the Orient to an ideology which has sworn the death of all religions.

Farmers Again Slapped Hard by Administration Hirelings and Price-Control Antics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. R. GROSS
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, farmers of Iowa and the Nation are now being forced to pay the penalty for some of the procrastination and stupidity that has been all too evident in the price-control set-up.

This latest move to force farmers to take a roll-back in the price of beef cattle is one of the most discriminatory actions yet taken. What other important industry in this country has been ordered to take a roll-back?

Failure of administration hirelings to take action months ago has resulted in empty feed lots in Iowa. This, together with the present wholly unfair control action will result in less rather than more beef on the dinner tables of America. The real chaos in the beef situation is just beginning.

To illustrate, I quote from the following letter received May 5, 1951, from a farmer in the Third Iowa District, who extends permission to use his letter but asks that his name not be used:

Hon. H. R. GROSS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GROSS: We have a 280-acre farm in Tama County on which there is a mortgage.

We have fed cattle for years but last fall they were talking ceilings or roll-backs and feeder cattle were so high. We were not in a position to lose money on cattle so therefore we didn't purchase any feeders.

We have hay and corn on hand, 48 acres of pasture plus clover and we still cannot see our way clear to pay the price for feeders when we know there will be nothing in feeding them out.

We have two boys, one is married. We want to do our part, but this situation is most unfair. We have the help, feeding equipment, hay, corn, rough feed, but our yards have been empty all winter and the way this price situation is being handled the grass in the pasture will grow up and fall over this summer.

Can you help get this across to those who are responsible?

Possibilities of Fuel Shortages

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including two most significant articles recently appearing in the New York Journal of Commerce. The first is an item from Houston, Tex., reporting upon the concern expressed by Gen. Ernest O. Thompson, senior member of the Texas Railroad Commission and a man eminently qualified to appraise the possibilities in this field, and also by Mr. William J. Murray, Jr., junior member of that commission. It is as follows:

FEAR IRAN OIL LOSS WOULD DRAIN UNITED STATES RESERVE CAPACITY

HOUSTON, May 6.—Loss of Iranian oil by the Western World would drain off the little rapidly dwindling reserve producing capacity in the United States, according to Gen. Ernest O. Thompson, senior member of the Texas Railroad Commission.

"Our reserve producing capacity would drop to around 139,000 barrels daily if we are called on to supply Western Europe with the 300,000 barrels daily of petroleum products it now gets from Iran," he warned at a Texas Railroad Association meeting here.

William J. Murray, Jr., junior member of the commission, deplored the fact Iranian oil seemed to be slipping away and said he feared gasoline rationing might result in this country if the United States is required to supply Western Europe requirements that have been met by Iran.

Thompson said that United States reserve capacity has already dwindled to 439,000 barrels daily, "the lowest I've ever known it."

In contrast, last August after the Korean fighting was under way reserve producing capacity of the United States—most of which is in Texas—stood at an estimated 1,113,000 barrels daily, Thompson said. Accelerated output since then has brought the sharp reduction.

Reserve capacity is the amount of additional oil it is estimated could be produced from wells already drilled without causing harm to the wells, he explained.

ABADAN OUTPUT LAGGING

Thompson noted Iran's Abadan refinery, largest in the world with a capacity of 550,000 barrels daily, now is supplying only a comparatively small amount of Western Europe's needs due to recent strife over nationalization.

Eventually, Iranian oil output under nationalization probably will get back to normal, Thompson said. But, he hinted, it would be easily possible Russia might wrest part of the country's petroleum supply through trade agreements without starting a world war.

Thompson said this country would have to continue its feverish search for oil to prevent shortages in the future.

The second is a dispatch from Dallas, Tex., reporting on a recent speech made by the Honorable Bruce K. Brown, Deputy Administrator of the Petroleum Administration for Defense. He, too, is in an excellent position to appraise the complete situation with reference to natural gas and his warning is timely, even though it is an unhappy one. Certainly the responsibile committees in Congress should consider carefully both these dispaches and leave nothing undone which might contribute to the creation of a disastrous condition in this country. The second dispatch is as follows:

PAD SEES EXTREMELY SHORT NATURAL GAS SUPPLY LOOMING

DALLAS, May 8.—A high Government official warned today that the country faces the "unfortunate prospect" that natural gas "is likely to be in extremely short supply next winter and in the next few years.

"It may be expected that shortages will occur in a number of important industrial centers and in such a way as may adversely affect defense production," Bruce K. Brown, Deputy Administrator of the Petroleum Administration for Defense, told the natural gas division meeting of the American Gas Association. His speech was delivered by William S. Tarver, PAD assistant general counsel.

PAD, which has authority over natural gas, will have to take steps to assure that the best possible use is made at all times of available gas supply, he said.

PIPE SUPPLY LESS THAN HALF

Brown told the group that the total supply of line pipe available for the months immediately ahead is likely to equal less than two-thirds of the planned usage by gas and oil companies.

"After deducting certain 'must' uses of small-diameter line pipe," he declared, "it appears impossible that the supply of large-diameter pipe for gas and oil transmission lines will add up to more than half of the amount needed before winter to finish pipe lines already under construction."

"We can only hope," he continued, "that increased steel production, further cutbacks in less essential uses, and better definition of needs through the application of a controlled materials plan, will improve the situation later." (J. E. Goble, president of the National Tube Co., told the meeting yesterday that steel allocations for natural gas transmission lines this year and in 1952 would exceed last year's 2,425,000 tons.)

Brown declared that the availability of materials to produce, process, transport and distribute gas and oil is "small indeed" in relation to the need—"in spite of a most vigorous attempt on the part of experienced gas and oil men in PAD to convince the Governmental authorities holding the materials purse strings of the reality of the demand."

Commodity Credit Corporation Administration Expense Limitations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, since the section of the agriculture appropriation bill containing the Commodity Credit Corporation administrative expense limitation has not been reached, I want to submit for the consideration of my colleagues certain basic and fundamental facts with reference to this item.

In the RECORD of May 9, at pages 5139 and 5140, I submitted data I had been able to assemble at that time from the committee hearings and report and from the monthly reports of the Commodity Credit Corporation, particularly that for the month ending March 31, 1951, which was made public on Monday.

I am completely convinced that the amount recommended by the committee, $15,000,000, can and should be reduced substantially without any actual possibility of injury to the necessary operations of this agency.

As I said on Wednesday, the committee is to be commended for having reduced the amount requested from $20,200,000 to $15,000,000, and it is on entirely sound ground when it reported that "this reduction is believed justified in view of the current outlook for agriculture and the probable changes from surpluses to shortages in many of the commodities normally handled by the Corporation."

This positive fact, that the Corporation will not be called upon to incur in the coming fiscal year anything remotely resembling the costs resulting from the purchase, storage, handling, and sale of many of the commodities it has dealt with during the current fiscal year, is proven beyond any possible question by two kinds of evidence.

First, the committee members and, in particular, the able chairman of the subcommittee, brought this out forcibly in their questioning of this Agency's witnesses. I want to quote portions of this evidence from seven parts of the hearings. They are as follows:

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Trigg, last year I asked about the employees who do not have any work to do. We were told that you attempt to keep all the folks busy and find something for them to do. Now that we have reached a problem in manpower, why not let some of them go instead of trying to find some made work for them. You are asking here for the same number of employees, the same amount of money to operate the CCC that you had last year when it is evident there is going to be a decrease in the operations carried on by the Commodity Credit Corporation. How can we justify a request of that kind to the Congress? (p. 117).

Let me repeat for emphasis the words of our colleague, "when it is evident there is going to be a decrease in the operations carried on by the Commodity Credit Corporation."

Mr. WHITTEN. Well, let us just get down to brass tacks. I think you will admit, under the present outlook, that you will not have one-half the volume of commodities for the Commodity Credit Corporation next year that you have had this year, will you not?

* * * * *

Mr. WHITTEN. I cannot see where the CCC will be called upon to handle a volume this year anything like it had last year, and yet your estimate for personnel and for administrative funds for next year is the same as for this year. I think you ought to reconsider that.

* * * * *

Mr. WHITTEN. Whether you can or cannot agree is not the point. I am asking you whether you think the estimate is one that we can justify before the Congress. If it happens to be out of line just a little bit, you can come back and ask for additional funds (p. 118).

This latter suggestion is entirely sound and, as I see it, does not run counter to the provisions of the Antideficiency Appropriation Act. In any event, it is a practice which has certainly been followed, and only recently by this very agency.

I call your attention to the estimate by the chairman of the subcommittee that the volume of commodities would be reduced by at least one-half. This has a definite bearing upon the amendment which I intend to offer when this section of the bill is reached.

Mr. WHITTEN. But, as I was pointing out, you will not be handling as big a volume of commodities for one thing.

Mr. TRIGG. Of course, we will not. * * *

Mr. WHITTEN. We should set these figures of administrative expensse knowing today that there is every probability that you will handle less volume. If the situation gets out of hand later, you could then come back and ask for more employees for the CCC (p. 119).

* * * * *

Mr. WHITTEN. Again, I am not suggesting a major reduction in expenses. I am just discussing the difference between $17,000,000 and $20,000,000 or $15,000,000 for that purpose. I think your figures can stand a lot of study for the next fiscal year (p. 119).

Mr. HORAN. I just want to point out that we have revised our thinking, too, up here in Congress, and the Korean war and the defense effort has caused that. The average cost has gone up, and I think that you as taxpayers are looking to us to do what we can to hold down costs wherever we can, to see that any of these items are justified in reality, and I am disturbed about the size and the shape of this particular item. I do not want to do anything to hurt the Commodity Credit Corporation. I realize what it means, but along with the chairman and the rest of this subcommittee, we need your cooperation on this. We want to do what we are supposed to do, but frankly I am still at a loss as to why this item should be increased (p. 132).

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. HORAN, I think you have proven our case. The testimony up to this point is that last May and June the Commodity Credit Corporation made a survey and arrived at how much manpower it would take to handle a given volume on a per unit basis. Then they multiplied that by the volume, and they came up with this $20,200,000, which includes the $3,850,000 they are asking for now. They cannot sustain that because they will not have that volume.

Mr. BEACH. It appears that way.

Mr. WHITTEN. You just said it was that. You said last May and June you worked up the unit cost, coming up with $20,000,000. Now, you come up with the same number of dollars, so you are bound to have used the same volume. You may have some difference from one program to another but you are using approximately the same volume in total. You cannot justify it.

* * * * *

Mr. WHITTEN. If you handle much less in commodities you will not have as much work to do as in handling a big volume of the commodities. You have arrived at your total demand for funds by multiplying the unit cost times the volume (pp. 132–133).

May I call attention to the undeniable truth of the statement by the chairman of the subcommittee, that this budget estimate was completely unrealistic, and that it could not be justified. I submit that that in itself properly raises in the minds of those of us who are not members of the Appropriations Committee substantial doubt as to whether the Agency furnished the subcommittee with any kind of yardstick or formula upon which a definite recommendation could be made and defended.

Mr. WHITTEN. Now, the Commodity Credit Corporation's activities—you cannot have anything like the volume of work through the Commodity Credit Corporation next year that you had this year (p. 534).

The second class of evidence is from the records of the agency itself.

In the data I inserted in the RECORD for May 9 at page 5139 I pointed out that between June 30, 1950, and March 31, 1951, this agency's holdings in butter, cheese, dried milk, and dried eggs had dropped from 677,401,610 pounds to 171,701,878 pounds. I also submitted figures for 16 other commodities showing very heavy decreases in inventories, which is true of the trend of all such holdings. It bears out clearly the truth of the statement made by the chairman of the subcommittee when he brought out the inherent weakness in the justifications presented by this agency.

Finally, I would like to call attention to the record of the administration expense limitations for this agency between 1938 and 1949, inclusive. In terms of millions of dollars, it is as follows:

1939	.7
1940	2.0
1941	2.3
1942	3.5
1943	4.4
1944	5.4
1945	7.2
1947	8.8
1949	8.1
1950	15.4
Estimated, 1952	20.2

I call attention to the 1949 item of $8,100,000. In terms of the postwar period, and particularly in terms of the excessively large 1948 crops, it might be fairly argued that such a figure could well be used as a measuring rod as against the request made by this agency for the next fiscal year. In any event, surely somewhere between that figure and the $15,000,000 contained in the bill is the clear area within which this House should reach its determination.

The amendment which I intend to propose will be submitted on the basis of these facts and any others that I may be able to develop between now and the time when this section of the bill is reached.

Migratory Farm Labor—H. R. 3283, the Poage Bill, Compared With the Recommendations of the President's Commission on Migratory Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 3283 is an amendment to the Agriculture Act of 1949, adding Title V—Agricultural workers. Although the President's Commission on Migratory Labor had been holding hearings and investigations for some 6 or 7 months previously and its report was completed early this year, our committee has apparently ignored the work of this Commission and the recommendations it has made. Where it deals with the same matters, this bill is contrary to the recommendations of the Commission.

RECRUITMENT OF MEXICAN WORKERS

Section 501 provides for the recruiting of agricultural workers from Mexico pursuant to arrangements made between the United States and Mexico; for the establishment and operation of reception centers near places of actual entry of such workers into the United States; the provision of transportation for such workers from recruitment centers outside the United States to reception centers, and transportation from such reception centers to recruitment centers at the termination of employment. It further provides for subsistence, emergency medical care and limited burial expenses as may become necessary during such transportation or while such workers are at reception centers. The Secretary of Labor is authorized to assist the free and voluntary negotiation of contracts between such workers and employers and to guarantee the performance by employers of the provisions of such contracts.

Section 502 provides that no workers shall be made available under this title to any employer unless such employer enters into an agreement with the United States to indemnify the United States against loss by reason of its guaranty of such employer's contracts, and to reimburse the United States for essential expenses incurred for transportation and subsistence.

Section 503 provides that no workers recruited under this title shall be available for any employment in any area unless the regional director of Employment Security of the United States Department of Labor in such area has determined and certified that sufficient domestic workers who are qualified for such work are not available at the time and place when needed and that the employment of such Mexican workers will not adversely affect the wages and working conditions of domestic agricultural workers similarly employed.

The foregoing interrelated provisions are sharply in contrast with the recommendations of the President's Commission on Migratory Labor. The report of the President's Commission places the greatest emphasis on the use of migratory American farm labor. The report says that—

> First reliance [should] be placed on using our domestic labor force more effectively.

They then recommend that no special measures be adopted to increase the number of alien contract laborers above the number admitted in 1950. They recognize that there might be some need for additional agricultural labor than can be recruited within the borders of the United States and recommend that preference be given to citizens of the offshore areas of the United States such as Hawaii and Puerto Rico. Their fourth recommendation under this heading is that future efforts be directed toward supplying agricultural labor needs with American workers and eliminating dependence on foreign labor.

DISCRIMINATES AGAINST AMERICAN WORKERS

The Poage bill provides for the payment of transportation costs and maintenance during travel of foreign workers from recruitment to reception centers; but there is no such provision for domestic workers. It is left unclear in the bill whether the employer will pay the cost of transportation from the reception center to the place of employment or whether such cost can be deducted from wages; but it is expected that the employer will pay the cost. American migratory workers are not given equal treatment with imported Mexican workers. They do not receive travel expenses and subsistence and medical care of any kind. This prejudices the opportunity to use domestic labor more effectively. The Department of Labor testified that the provision of transportation for American workers would increase the mobility of the farm labor supply and provide more American workers for farm employment.

H. R. 3283 is essentially a bill dealing with the import of Mexican farm labor with some guaranty of fair treatment backed up by the United States. It omits consideration of the problems of mobilization and full utilization of domestic agricultural labor, while the recruitment of American citizens of the offshore areas of the United States is also disregarded. Giving to the regional director of the Bureau of Employment Security the specific authority to certify that domestic workers are not available is not the way to utilize the full manpower resources of the United States because the regional director in an independent status is in no position to determine the availability of workers outside his region, because there should be interregional clearance of available workers, and also because even the most upright men located in particular localities are greatly influenced by the surrounding pressures. The Mexican Government has already stated that it will not deal with numerous separate State authorities. Added to this is the drawback that the low wages paid Mexican imports and wetbacks decreases the attractiveness of these jobs to American workers in many localities.

Regarding the actual recruitment of alien contract labor in American agriculture, the President's Commission recommended that no employer, employer's representative, or association of employers or labor contractor should be permitted to contract directly with foreign workers for employment in the United States, although they may participate in the selection of qualified workers when all other requirements of legal importation are fulfilled. The Commission was so much impressed with the abuses of foreign-labor recruiting and contracting that it recommended that the Immigration and Naturalization Service be the principal contracting agency and that private employers should secure their foreign workers exclusively from the Immigration and Naturalization Service. They specified that, after certifying the need for foreign workers, the United States Employment Service should have no administrative responsibilities in connection with any foreign labor program. The Immigration and Naturalization Service would deliver the imported workers to the farm employers who have submitted the necessary applications and bonds and who have signed individual work agreements. They recommended that in its general supervision of employment of foreign workers the Immigration and Naturalization Service should be authorized to terminate any contract of employment and remove the workers or to refuse to supply any foreign workers to any employer when there has been repeated or willful violation of previous agreements, or when there is reasonable doubt that the terms of the current agreement are being observed.

WAGES

The Poage bill provides for the guaranty by the United States of the amounts owed by employers under the individual contracts for wages and transportation; but it makes no general provision for the amount of wages which must be paid for work performed. The agreement with the Mexican Government is supposed to provide for the payment of wages prevailing in the community for work of a similar nature paid American workers. There is, however, no machinery provided under this bill for determining prevailing wages or to make certain that they will not reflect the miserable wages being paid wetbacks, and, as a result of the individual bargaining between large-farm operators and unlettered Mexican laborers, any wage agreed upon becomes the prevailing wage.

The President's Commission was keenly aware of these abuses and it recomended that Congress enact minimum-wage legislation to include farm laborers, including migratory laborers, that State legislatures give serious consideration to the protection of agricultural workers, including migratory farm workers, by minimum-wage legislation, that minimum housing standards be established for foreign workers with a simplified agency for administration and enforcement of such minimum standards on the basis of periodic inspections, and that collective bargaining be required on the larger farms.

The Commission's report was very skeptical about the method employed in determining "prevailing wages," which experience shows has been a unilateral employers' agreement of a rate initially offered, which proves too low to attract the needed number of workers. The "labor shortage" might well be the consequence of the low wages fixed before the season opened and the effective going rate had an opportunity to equate the supply of labor with the demand. The Commission stated: "The wage practice in agriculture and the demand for alien labor are directly associated. Alien labor importation cannot be divorced from the practice of fixing an arbitrary wage which does not attract a sufficient number of workers. The wage at which we declare a farm labor shortage to exist is the result of a one-sided wage bargain made by associations of farm employers."

It would seem that at the very least the determination of prevailing wages should be determined by public authority after public hearings and that these determinations be widely publicized to give American migratory workers the knowledge and assurance which would assist in making more American workers available. This much should be required by amendment to the present bill, while some of the other recommendations of the President's Commission would require more extensive legislation.

WETBACKS

Section 504 of the Poage bill provides that Mexican nationals already within the borders of the United States may be permitted to remain and that no penalty bond shall be required which imposes liability on any person for the failure of such worker to depart from the United States upon termination of employment. This provision would legalize the status of Mexicans now illegally in the United States. In contrast, the President's Commission on Migratory Labor recommended that legislation be enacted making it unlawful to employ aliens illegally in the United States. The report recommended that the Immigration and Naturalization Service be strengthened by clear statutory authority to determine if illegal aliens are employed and that statutory penalties for harboring, concealing, or transporting illegal aliens be imposed. They recommended the imposition of a variety of sanctions against the employment of aliens illegally in the United States. The Department of Labor in its testimony submitted before a congressional committee warned that if illegal Mexican workers are employed under this provision, this would ignore Mexico's economic interest, would be incompatible with the international agreement, and would serve as an open invitation to Mexican nationals to enter the United States illegally. A similar provision in the Ellender bill was amended to limit employment to those who entered the United States legally.

H. R. 3283 really does nothing effective about the wetback problem. As recommended by the President's Commission, there should be a clear provision in the bill which would prohibit the use of Mexican labor illegally in the United States, with penalties imposed on American employers who knowingly employ them.

USE OF MEXICAN LABOR IN NONAGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT

Section 508 defines "agricultural employment" to include not only the activities so defined in the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Social Security Act but also such activities as cotton ginning and compressing, crushing of oilseeds, and the packing, canning, freezing, drying, or other processing of perishable or seasonable products.

These latter activities, when not within the area of production as defined by the Administrator of the Fair Labor Standards Act, are covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act. Some of these activities, when within the area of production, are exempt from both the minimum wage and overtime provisions, while other activities are exempt from overtime but not from the statutory minimum wage.

Two consequences grow out of this broadened definition of agricultural employment:

First. Some Mexican workers will be employed in activities which heretofore have not been regarded as agriculture.

Second. Where they are so employed, many of them must be paid at least 75 cents per hour and overtime payments must be made where applicable, for it must be understood that broadening the definition of agricultural employment under this bill can have no influence on determining the coverage and applicability of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Thus a small proportion of the imported Mexican workers will be paid on a different basis than the great bulk of the workers engaged in agriculture as defined under the Fair Labor Standards Act. This provision was amended in the Senate to restrict the employment of imported Mexican labor to agriculture, which is exempt from the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Need for Safety Codes for Natural-Gas Pipelines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. HESELTON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, in connection with consideration of H. R. 88, which would authorize the Federal Power Commission to prescribe safety requirements for natural-gas companies, I am including the first of a series of articles by Hartley W. Barclay, appearing in the New York Times, on the general subject of the need for safety codes for natural-gas pipelines.

PIPELINE DANGERS STIR WIDE CONCERN—REGULATION OF GROWING NATURAL GAS NET IS INADEQUATE AND HAPHAZARD, STUDY SHOWS—SAFETY CODES CALLED FOR—CITIZENS IN MANY AREAS SEEK STATE AND LOCAL ACTION AS UNITED STATES POWER IS LIMITED

(By Hartley W. Barclay)

Communities in Westchester and other counties near New York have no adequate official safeguards against hazards of new high-pressure interstate natural-gas pipelines now authorized and due for construction soon. Similar conditions exist up-State and in Connecticut and throughout much of the entire country, it was learned in a canvass of safety conditions.

There is no national code enforced by law for assuring safe construction and operation on the $1,000,000,000 natural-gas pipeline industry expansion program, involving more than 40,000 miles of new pipelines in which it is expected that 6,000,000 tons of steel will be used.

In an extensive study of safety aspects of these projects, it was estimated that 28,875 miles of new natural-gas pipelines were authorized for construction up to January 1, while for 15,866 additional miles there were applications pending approval at that time.

CONTROL DEEMED INADEQUATE

Only limited control of the lines is held by the Federal Power Commission. While State public service commissions may have jurisdiction, safety codes do not exist in most eastern States. Budgets, enforcement personnel, inspectors, technical consultants, and requirements for filing plans, specifications, and reports are generally lacking.

To check on current conditions regarding official supervision and legal enforcement of safety rules in interest natural gas pipeline construction and operation, more than 12 National, State, or local regulatory bodies were consulted in the last 3 weeks. Reports from individual pipeline companies were studied, engineers were interviewed, trade and engineering society codes that lack legal standing for enforcement were studied, and officials of communities were questioned.

It was generally conceded by these sources that the safety of high-pressure natural gas pipelines in interstate commerce is not strictly regulated under a national code. In contrast, the construction and operation of less dangerous local gas lines is strictly regulated in most regions, largely by local authorities. In interstate commerce the handling of explosive materials and containers comparable in hazard to high-pressure gas and shipped by railroads is strictly safeguarded by a complex variety of legally enforced rules.

It also was generally conceded that building codes in most municipalities outside New York are obsolete so far as covering construction requirements for high-pressure interstate natural gas pipelines.

A number of locally sponsored "citizens' movements" to press for Federal, State or local safety laws to control interstate high-pressure natural gas pipeline companies are rapidly getting under way in Eastern States and New England.

Engineers interviewed stressed that safety rules for high-pressure interstate lines are not to be confused with safety practices used by local, intrastate gas companies.

SOME OF THE BIG PROJECTS

Some big pipeline companies now holding Federal Power Commission certificates of public convenience and necessity authorizing high-pressure pipeline construction projects in Eastern States include the Tennessee Gas Transmission Co., Northeastern Gas Transmission Co., Algonquin Gas Transmission Co., Transcontinental Gas Pipe Line Corp., New York State Natural Gas Corp., and Niagara Mohawk Power Corp.

Among officials of governmental agencies, those of the Federal Power Commission said that agency had no statutory authority to rule upon safety hazards to local communities resulting from these projects.

At State regulatory levels safety codes are not written out in New York and Connecticut to require regulation by strict standards and codes. Technical employees of the New York Public Service Commission said they thought the commission had no authority over interstate companies.

Cities near New York have just awakened to the fact that they need to enact promptly new safety codes for such purposes. Connecticut has just started to strengthen safety regulatory powers.

There is one important precedent that is considered by engineers as adequate to prove that strict licensing, safety control and regulation by permits can work successfully in protecting public safety. Under the Federal law known as the River and Harbor Act of 1899, builders of structures of all kinds put in navigable streams are required to file plans and obtain permits from the Secretary of the Army. Defiance of a ruling under this law is punishable by fine or imprisonment.

America in the Far East

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALVIN F. WEICHEL
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, there is included a well-expressed editorial on America in the Far East by the Erie County Reporter of Huron, Ohio:

IN MEMORIAM TO THE DEATH OF AMERICAN PRESTIGE IN THE FAR EAST

President Harry Truman, through his action in stripping Gen. Douglas MacArthur of all his commands in the Far East, has made himself a place in history, but we fear it will be an unenviable one. Judas Iscariot also has a place.

This act was the result of demands made on the President by Dean Acheson, George Marshall, and others of their ilk, who should also receive credit for the loss of China to the Communists.

Thus the betrayal of America, which has progressed through Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam has reached another milestone.

The lives of many fine American boys will be the price to be paid for Tuesday's action. But they won't be the lives of sons of the Trumans, Achesons, and Marshalls.

We trust there will be rejoicing in England and Russia. The English will be happy because they can continue their blood-money trade with the Chinese Commies and the Russians can now see ultimate victory in their campaign to take over the entire far eastern theater.

Teamwork in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following interesting article from the Christian Science Monitor, Boston, Mass., Tuesday, May 8, 1951:

EMPHASIS ON COOPERATION

Korea has provided a gripping laboratory test of the whole concept of collective security. For the first time in history 50 nations have joined in a tremendous experiment in cooperation to keep the peace. In the midst of current controversies Americans can gain perspective by recognizing the importance of success in this noble endeavor.

Indeed, the people in each member country of the United Nations may well take counsel with themselves to see whether they are in any respect failing to relate national purposes to this vast international peace project. In much of the debate over General MacArthur's recall Americans have given woefully little attention to the value of keeping U. N. action united. The general says that if necessary the United States should go it alone. This, it seems to us, is a perilous course, but other members of the U. N. should recognize that they have a real responsibility for a situation which has brought such a proposal into serious consideration.

One basic trouble in Korea has been that in the actual hostilities the United States has been so largely going it alone. More than 50 nations voted against aggression; only 15 have sent forces against it in battle. There were extenuating circumstances. Some countries were still too weak and war-torn. Others were heavily engaged against communism on other fronts. Some offers were turned down because of the difficulties in transport, training, equipment, and coordination—particularly in the early months.

But this last reason no longer holds, and General MacArthur is quite right in urging other U. N. nations to supply forces or increase those they have sent. The arrival in the Far East of troops from little and remote Ethiopia (which the League of Nations failed to save) should shame and awaken larger and nearer nations. Several countries far from any immediate necessity to defend themselves should take a good second look at their professed allegiance to U. N. One Colombian gunboat is the sole Latin-American fighting representative in Korea.

From the start this newspaper has emphasized the value of having more nations actively represented in Korea. Every additional U. N. member represented there strengthens by so much the effort to make the operation there not only militarily but morally successful. The Asian peoples are particularly susceptible to the Red propaganda that this is just another arrogant drive by western imperialism. Fifty nations have said in words that it is police action to keep the peace. To be fully persuasive they should join the force visibly.

Aside from the faults in the U. N. Charter which complicate any enforcement action; aside from failures of tact or worse by the United States which alienated certain members, particularly the Arab bloc; aside from confusions which have held most of the Asian nations back; aside from fears of General MacArthur's strategy; aside from honest anti-Communist opinion that the Chinese were thinking of Korea as Americans would of Mexico—the fact remains that U. N. has taken a stand against aggression. The majority of members still are not backing that stand in the field.

Even the United States, while furnishing the bulk of the forces, is not thinking of Korea primarily as a U. N. enterprise. There are ample grounds for disagreement with progress for attacking the Chinese at home, but there can be little ground for failing to support the U. N. in Korea. The world's aspirations are fixed on the possibility of outlawing war—as General MacArthur so eloquently urged. But everyone recognizes that it cannot be done by one nation—that it requires teamwork. Korea offers the practical opportunity.

New York Gets 5½ Cents in Aid for Tax Dollar

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, if Members of Congress from New York State occasionally seem unenthusiastic about programs of Federal aid for this, that, or the other activities, inherently commendable, it becomes more understandable when such facts are borne in mind as are revealed in the accompanying analysis by Mr. Kermit Hill, of the Gannett News Bureau, published in the Rochester (N. Y.) Times-Union, set forth below under leave to extend my remarks.

We must not, of course, lose sight of the fact that the best interests of the country as a whole must be considered in our appraisal of the merit or demerit of legislation providing for contributions on the part of the Federal Government. Let those Members from such States as Mississippi, however, which receive benefits from Uncle Sam far in excess of the amounts paid by their citizens to keep the Government running, remember the importance of maintaining national solvency just as they expect Members from States like New York and Delaware, who pay into the Federal Treasury many times what they take out, to view with sympathy the needs of the States making modest tax contributions.

Pay-envelope deductions for taxes have just about reached the breaking point for many people. One of the places where we should make substantial reductions at this time is in many of the so-called grant-in-aid programs which are nearly all designed to siphon funds from individual taxpayers, wage earners, and business enterprises of States like

New York and send them, via the Washington route involving the usual shrinkage along the way, to benefit individuals and business concerns in other parts of the country.

The inequality of this situation is drastically illustrated herewith:

NEW YORK GETS 5½ CENTS IN AID FOR TAX DOLLAR

(By Kermit Hill)

WASHINGTON.—New York State got back in Federal grants-in-aid only 5½ cents on the dollar from 7.2 billion dollars in Federal taxes collected there in 1950.

This State consistently gets back one of the smallest returns of any in the Nation, according to official Treasury Department figures.

New York taxpayers paid a grand total of $7,215,467,000 into the United States Treasury last year. The State got back only $399,759,026 through the 76 Federal grant-in-aid programs, which include such things as highway aid, farm payments, research grants, payments to veterans under the GI bill of rights, school-lunch programs, and old-age assistance.

The return figures out at slightly more than 5.5 percent on the tax dollar.

These figures don't include the millions of dollars spent to run the white-collar agencies of the Federal Government in the State.

New York's slim return from its Federal tax payments is in sharp contrast to returns from the Treasury received by some other States.

Those States got Federal funds for gigantic construction projects such as the TVA and similar power developments, irrigation reservoirs, etc., heavily outweighing Federal allotment for public works in this State.

Mississippi, for example, received $1.33 in 1950 for each dollar in Federal taxes collected in that State last year, according to Treasury Department figures. Mississippi taxpayers paid 88.3 million dollars in Federal taxes last year, and got back 117.3 millions through the various Federal aid programs.

Arkansas paid in 105.4 millions in Federal taxes in 1950, and received aid grants from the Treasury totaling 97.6 millions—a 93-cent return on each dollar.

North Dakota received 56 percent of its money back through the Federal aid program. North Dakota taxpayers paid in 52 millions in Federal taxes. The State got back 29.6 millions last year in Federal aid.

Although New York's 5½-cent return on the dollar was almost the lowest in the Nation, it might have been worse.

Delaware paid the Federal Treasury 360 millions last year, but Uncle Sam paid back only 9 millions—a 2½-cent return from each of Delaware's tax dollars.

Strange News

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the British Socialist administration has been financed by billions of dollars by our New Deal regime, and in repayment the American citizen-taxpayers are subjected to abuse and ridicule. The British are furnishing Red China with the material to slaughter our fighting forces in Korea. How long will the American people tolerate this scandalous betrayal by our alleged ally?

Under leave to extend, I am inserting an editorial which was published in the Evening Observer of May 8, 1951, as follows:

STRANGE NEWS

Quoting three items in the same column of another newspaper:

1. "Despite MacArthur's removal, boos and hisses are still greeting newsreels of his stateside appearances when they're shown in British movie houses." The same item says, "MacArthur's ouster leaves Britain and the United States no nearer an agreed far-eastern policy."

2. "London goes Yankee to encourage American tourists to come to the festival of Britain." Just how the British will make the Yankees feel at home in such a postwar attitude of hostility we do not know and cannot guess.

3. A Frenchman predicts: "People will have had enough of Britain after a couple of days. Then they'll scoot over to France."

All of which leads us to the general observation that Uncle Sam's largesse never deprives anyone of any self-respect. The more we give to those in need the more those in need strive to impress us with how much they hold us in contempt.

Or, as some weary American remarked, "Suppose we go to war with Russia, will we be expected to continue to give them lend-lease in order to enable them to fight us? And if not from us, where will Russia get the lend-lease with which to fight?"

Times change. Remember when Churchill said: "Give us the tools and we'll finish the job." He implied that our manpower would not be needed. As we approach world war III we find ourselves providing all the cash and virtually all the casualties. In spite of this some of our recent allies and lend-lease beneficiaries are striving to frustrate and belittle our policies. It is a strange world in which generosity and gratitude are never in balance. The latter diminishes as the former expands. Just let the hard-pressed taxpayers pony up with another billion or two and everyone will hate us, if, indeed, they do not do so already.

State Aid to Defense Production and Procurement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HORACE SEELY-BROWN, JR.

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. SEELY-BROWN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address, State Aid to Defense Production and Procurement, delivered by Sidney A. Edwards, managing director, Connecticut Development Commission, Hartford, Conn., in Miami Beach, Fla., April 16, 1951.

The Connecticut State Development Commission has been designated by Governor Lodge, a former Member of this House, as the State agency to aid small business in every proper possible manner.

Those of us who live in Connecticut recognize the forthright manner in which the development commission has tackled this difficult problem.

Connecticut's 10-point program of industrial mobilization provides a pattern of action that many other States may well wish to adopt and follow:

STATE AID TO DEFENSE PRODUCTION AND PROCUREMENT

(Address by Sidney A. Edwards, managing director, Connecticut Development Commission, Hartford, Conn., at sixth annual conference, Association of State Planning and Development Agencies, Miami Beach, Fla., April 16, 1951)

I feel highly honored to have been selected to discuss this subject which is of such compelling interest to so many of our State planning and development agencies at this particular time.

Unless all signs fail, the matter of defense production and procurement will be with us for many years, even though we may be spared the need for all-out war production.

Many of the agencies represented at this meeting went through the experience of events leading up to our participation in World War II, the war itself, and the period of readjustment to civilian production preceding the present emergency.

Many lessons were learned as a result of that experience, especially the effects of a controlled economy on the operations of the so-called small-business man. Some people seem to think that the small-business man is some rare individual who is different in many respects from the ordinary run of businessman or manufacturer. He may be different, but he most certainly is not rare.

If we take the definition of small business as prescribed by the Federal Government, namely, any concern employing 500 persons or less, and apply this to a small but highly industrial State like Connecticut, what do we find? We discover that rather than being rare small business constitutes 96 percent of all manufacturers in our State, and collectively this 96 percent of Connecticut's manufacturing establishments employ 43 percent of those engaged in industry.

Consequently, if we are to design a program of industrial mobilization for defense production which will aid the greatest number of our manufacturing concerns, we must necessarily give particular consideration to the problems of small business.

It has been our observation that the large manufacturer or the one employing more than 500 persons is generally able to solve his own problems without any great assistance from State development agencies. As a matter of fact, he can usually help us more than we can help him, and part of our job is to secure his cooperation in helping the little fellow.

With all of the talk about helping small business in connection with Federal procurement, and with Congress insisting that the little fellow be taken care of, many small-business men unfortunately have concluded that all they have to do is just sit back and wait for orders to roll in.

Those of us who have seen this work before and recognize the complicated procedures associated with Federal purchasing during an emergency realize only too well how futile any such conclusion can be.

We have all experienced the so-called invitation-to-bid method of Government buying and the discouraging aspects of such transactions. There has probably been more disillusionment attached to that method than is generally known or admitted. The expense involved, as well as the difficulty in securing complete specifications, blue prints, and other information in time to submit an intelligent bid within the period of grace, has been such as to discourage most small manufacturers from even making the attempt.

Federal procurement agencies in general greatly dislike that method of buying because of its uncertainties and the tremendous amount of red tape involved. As related to the usual size of order placed. Some branches of the Government have abandoned this method completely and others are inclined to do so. It is a safe prediction that within a short time most Federal procurement will be conducted on a negotiated basis.

If that assumption is correct, where does this leave the little fellow? His chances of competing sucessfully with the large manufacturer who is thoroughly schooled in this method of dealing with the Government and has his representatives in Washington; Wright Field at Dayton, Ohio; Philadelphia; or at other buying centers are very slim indeed, and he would be well advised to save his time and money.

The Government purchasing agencies which are held responsible for the delivery of a vast variety of material within a specified period of time cannot afford to and if they can help it will not distribute those orders among hundreds of inexperienced suppliers. Furthermore, it is not in the best interests of our national defense effort that they be compelled to do so.

In spite of any statements to the contrary, the principal interest and activity of such agencies stops at the door of the large prime contractor. To be sure, there are many specialized shops employing less than 500 persons who will and should serve as prime contractors, but in general the average small manufacturer will be well advised to forget about securing prime contracts and concentrate his major attention on making his facilities and capabilities for defense production known to as many prime and potential contractors as possible.

This, in my opinion, is where the State planning and development commissions can render their greatest service to the greatest number. Because of their familiarity with the personnel, character, equipment, and capabilities of the hundreds of small manufacturing plants within their respective States, they are in a better position than any other agency, Federal or State, to make a major contribution to the defense effort and supplement the work of the Federal procurement agencies in getting the over-all job done in the shortest possible time.

I know from experience that the Federal procurement agencies as well as the large prime contractors will greatly appreciate this type of assistance and will cooperate once an effective program is set up.

I also know that many States like Connecticut are hard at work developing such programs and, although these State programs may differ in some details, their objectives are quite similar.

At the risk of repeating some of the points already discussed, I will list here the objectives of Connecticut's 10-point program of industrial mobilization which were adopted by the Connecticut Development Commission last September and briefly describe the procedures and reasons applying to each point.

Please note that this program represents our concept of how our particular agency can render greatest assistance to small business during the present emergency.

1. To prepare Connecticut industry for the unusual challenge of making the greatest possible contribution toward national defense and at the same time meet the present and future demands for consumer goods—consistent with such restrictions as may be prescribed by the Federal Government: The approach which we have used or will use includes the holding of State-wide and regional defense production clinics in cooperation with the various Federal agencies dealing with defense procurement, the issuance of press and radio relases. and special bulletins and news letters to all manufacturers, chambers of commerce, and manufacturers' associations.

2. To establish a central clearinghouse for information concerning Connecticut's various and widely distributed production facilities and make such information available to all Federal procurement agencies: To accomplish this we conducted a State-wide survey of all manufacturing plants last September in order to secure the necessary basic information regarding their capabilities for civilian as well as defense production. The Register of War Production Facilities in Connecticut, now in the process of being published, will comprise approximately 450 pages, 8½ by 11 inches in size. It will contain essential information regarding 2,900 companies which jointly employ 87 percent of all industrial workers in Connecticut. In the metal-working industries, 92 percent of the total employment will be covered. This directory will be distributed to all Federal procurement agencies and the more important prime contractors located in the Northeast.

3. To explore fully the subcontracting possibilities to be found in Connecticut's hundreds of smaller industries and make such information available to present and potential prime contractors, both in Connecticut and nearby States: This calls for a separate survey covering machines, equipment and idle capacity as well as space for expansion. Such a survey is now in progress. The essential information will be transferred to a card index and will be kept currently up to date because such a file will enable our industrial engineers to select all qualified subcontractors who can handle each specific job and convey this information promptly to prime contractors in search of potential subcontractors.

4. To inform Connecticut manufacturers where they may secure advance information regarding Federal procurement contracts to be placed, as well as those recently placed in Connecticut and nearby States: The technique used here is constantly subject to change depending upon such information as may be released by the Federal Government. It is not our purpose to duplicate but rather to supplement any information services which may be available to manufacturers through various sources. We will have no hesitancy in directing interested manufacturers to any such sources, public or private, which we consider reliable.

5. To assemble and make available to Connecticut manufacturers necessary blueprints, specifications, and regulations associated with bidding on and completing Government defense contracts: The assembly of constantly changing regulations is comparatively simple. The procurement of necessary blueprints and specifications is more difficult, especially from Federal agencies. The best source of such information is the prime contractor who is interested in sharing this work with subcontractors. We anticipate no particular difficulty here once the Federal procurement program is stepped up and the demand for subcontractors is increased.

6. To assist Connecticut manufacturers in the location of essential materials or substitute materials through the operation of a central information service: Here again much will depend upon the restrictions placed by the Federal Government and the issuance of priorities or DO orders in connection with essential materials. Such priorities issued to the prime contractor will be passed along to the subcontractor and supplier. At present, manufacturers who have plenty of defense orders are not particularly troubled regarding shortages of essential materials, but those whose principal output is for civilian use will need to study all possibilities of using substitute materials. Such information as can be secured along this line will be assembled and made available to interested manufacturers.

7. To assist manufacturers and potential manufacturers in the location of manufacturing space or industrial building sites: Such information and service is the stock in trade of any industrial development agency. However, unless a special effort is made it can easily become obsolete or incomplete. During the emergency the need for accurate information of this type and having it readily available when needed is particularly acute. Any extra work that can be done to give such assurance will pay real dividends.

8. To fully explore and make available to Connecticut manufacturers information regarding production and/or construction financing: Here again we are introducing nothing new in the way of a service but are attempting to make sure that we are not overlooking any of a wide variety of possibilities which can be passed along to interested manufacturers. Some State and local governments go much further than others in this respect. But even in those States which are fairly well restricted some very ingenious methods of financing have been developed. We propose to keep ourselves well informed regarding any Federal aid which may be available to stimulate defense production and to publicize such possibilities among our manufacturers.

9. To assist Connecticut manufacturers in securing various types of technical or professional guidance incident to more economical and/or more efficient production and distribution: This may be approached in a number of ways but in Connecticut we have compiled a technical-professional roster containing the names of more than 350 engineers and technicians, including members of college faculties, private consultants, those who have been retired because of age, and many presently employed who would be available for part-time work to assist small manufacturers facing technical problems. Applications for such assistance are made through the local office of the State employment service and wherever possible the talents available locally are explored fully before calling on the central office in Hartford. To the best of our knowledge this represents an entirely new approach in helping to meet the manpower shortage, especially in the professional or technical field. Arrangements for reimbursement are left entirely to the mutual satisfaction of the two interested parties.

10. To fully utilize the services and assistance of local public officials, chambers of commerce, manufacturers' associations, local offices of the State employment service, newspapers, radio stations, and any other agencies or organizations which might contribute to the success of the program: In any program of this type we have always made a special effort to enlist the cooperation of such public or private agencies as we feel have a mutual interest in the success of the program. We are quite willing to share the responsibility as well as the glory if we can get widespread participation in any program of State-wide interest. We are quite willing to be regarded as a stimulating and coordinating agency and if we convince people that our program is their program we shall be satisfied with our performance.

I am sure many of you will recognize in the previous list of objectives and methods several services which are regularly performed by such agencies as ours under normal conditions. This only serves to emphasize their true worth and shows that as reliable working tools under any circumstances they should be kept well sharpened.

When it was learned that Dr. Alfred C. Neal of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, who is an associate member of ASFDA and a good friend of many of us, would be unable to appear on our program this afternoon, I suggested to our president, Don Davenport, that the remaining time be reserved for hearing statements from the several States' representatives as to what they are doing to render aid to defense production and procurement in their respective States.

I am quite sure that we do not have all the answers in Connecticut and we should like the benefit of your ideas and experience.

In closing, I should like to add that in Connecticut we feel that the State development commission is not only the most logical but the best equipped State agency to deal effectively with current problems which are plaguing the small-business men of our State and that our ability to help solve those problems can well determine our real value to the State in a time of need.

The World's Gain—Our Loss

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me previously, I should like to insert into the RECORD the following speech by Mr. Charles M. White, president of the Republic Steel Corp., which was delivered before the Transportation Association of America in Cleveland, Ohio:

On July 4, 1776, a New England merchant took a quill pen firmly in hand and inscribed his signature on a document. He wrote it large enough, he said, so that "John Bull can read my name without spectacles and may now double his reward of 500 pounds for my head. That is my defiance."

His act was the climax of months of debate, discussion and argument.

As President of the Continental Congress, John Hancock signed the Declaration of Independence and formally gave birth to a new Nation.

Few more scathing indictments have ever been drawn than were the charges directed against England by the Colonists as they recited the freedoms thay had been denied. Point by point the crimes of the mother country against her harassed colonies were detailed.

But at the very beginning of the Declaration the Congress wrote these words:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness."

The signers of the Declaration of Independence wrote revolutionary principles in this paragraph—principles that are too much taken for granted today. They declared boldly that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness were not the gift or grant of a sovereign but inalienable rights endowed by the Creator.

Under this philosophy, the individual, you and I, became important in his own right. He was not the puppet of a glorified bureaucrat or subject to the whim or caprice of any ruler.

Eleven years later, again in Philadelphia, the delegates from 12 States adopted the Constitution. In the preamble are these significant words: "and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

All of our rights and freedoms stem from this great document and its amendments. In it the pattern of our Government was blueprinted. The powers of the Federal Government were defined and limited and all powers not specifically delegated were reserved to the States. The first 10 amendments were quickly added and specifically detailed freedoms inherent to the individual, freedoms not to be taken away or denied by any branch of government. These 10 amendments—our Bill of Rights—are so taken for granted that few even in this audience remember all the provisions which must be kept constantly before us.

Is it any wonder that these two documents became beacons for the liberty-loving peoples of the world? Is it surprising that they furnish the seed from which the tree of freedom grew in many lands?

In Europe, in North and South America, crusaders for freedom risked their security, their very lives to further the cause of liberty. Few of these efforts succeeded at first, but many of them became the foundations on which later and successful efforts were built.

Freedom and liberty became inspiring watchwords as men and women struggled and died for the rights accorded the individual in our Declaration of Independence and in our Constitution.

Yet, though the Constitution proclaimed liberty as one of the rights of man, there were those among its authors who foresaw the ease with which liberty could also be lost.

In the first Federalist paper, Alexander Hamilton warned that the danger to our new form of government lay in the demagogs who would attempt to steal away the liberties of the people under the pretext of helping them. Mr. Hamilton said: "A dangerous ambition more often lurks behind the specious mask of zeal for the rights of the people than under the forbidding appearance of the zeal for firmness and efficiency of government. History will show us that the former has been found a much more certain road to the introduction of despotism than the latter, and that of those men who have overturned the liberties of republics, the greatest number have begun their career by paying obsequious court to the people; commencing demagogues and ending tyrants."

There are those who disagree with the political philosophy of Hamilton, but no one can deny his keen insight into human nature.

Look around the world today. On every hand are the proofs of his penetrating wisdom.

In Russia, in the countries behind the iron curtain, men began as demogogs and ended as tyrants. In England other men began their careers by paying obsequious court to the people. Or, in today's less polished but more forceful language, the people were promised pie in the sky, security without effort, a Santa Claus pack full of presents, with the Government wearing the white whiskers.

But the people of Russia, of England, were not told that they would pay a price—a staggering price—for this tinsel. They were not told that the price was Government interference in the everyday life of the individual; that the price was the loss of liberty and freedom, as sure as the devastating course of a cancer; that the price in Russia was slave-labor camps; that the price was ever higher and more confiscatory taxes.

It is of great concern to us that in our own country recently the symptoms of this same grasping for power have been distressingly evident. Here, too, we find the present Government paying obsequious court to the people.

Here, too, we find the Government trying to be all things to all men. Here, too, we have seen vote-catching plans, dishonest in their design, ballyhooed as the panacea for all our ills.

We have seen group set against group, race against race, one section of the country against another. But recently the people have begun to smell a rat.

Some of you may think that this is not the time to criticize our Government, that in this time of great crisis there should be unity and we should skip politics.

Of course, we must be a united Nation intent on a single purpose—that of becoming militarily strong again.

But we must not let our effort to preserve the freedoms of others result in the loss of our own. We need not accept edicts from on high without debate. We must not export so much freedom that there is little left for home consumption.

We must be vigilant in seeing that temporary suspension of freedom and liberty during this emergency does not become a permanent loss. Even as we fight for freedom abroad we must preserve freedom at home. Let us never say that the operation was successful but the patient died.

As almost the last nation dedicated to the freedom of the individual—certainly the strongest nation supporting that ideal—we have a responsibility not only to ourselves but to those who love freedom throughout the world. We have an obligation to hold high the torch of freedom that we may serve as a rallying point for those who have lost their freedom and want desperately to regain it. But it won't be easy.

We must realistically appraise the entire world picture and weigh the possible results of action—or of inaction—for it seems to be our responsibility to lead.

Whether we like it or not, our foreign relations have become so intertwined with our domestic affairs that in almost every decision we make we remember that one field impinges upon the other.

We are faced with revolutionary communism in Asia, in Europe, in some spots in the Southern Hemisphere, and even in our own midst. The decisions we as a people, we as a government, make to meet this threat will largely determine whether we retain or lose our precious freedoms.

If we do not do enough to stop the worldwide menace of communism, we may find our own Nation engulfed. If we do too much, we may find that we have accomplished that which Stalin long ago predicted—the internal destruction of our form of government by spending ourselves into bankruptcy.

Today perhaps our foremost obligation is that each of us personally understand to the best of our ability the forces that are moving to destroy freedom.

We cannot afford the luxury of being arbitrary in the face of those who differ with us, for I doubt that any single person is either entirely right or entirely wrong in his conclusions on our foreign affairs.

And, even were we right today, what Moscow does tomorrow might demand a complete revaluation.

We all have grave questions in our minds as debate rages in Washington over our foreign policy. Were we right in throwing our ground troops into Korea in the first place? Should we have gone beyond the thirty-eighth parallel? Should we have withdrawn when we found ourselves confronted by hordes of Chinese Communists? If we should finally be successful, will our victory be significant and important, or worth the price of American boys dead and wounded? Similar momentous questions confront us in connection with China and Formosa.

The ramifications of every move we are called upon to make on the European front are so enormous that any sane person hesitates to assume either complete knowledge or complete certainty as to the answers.

This we do know, however: The most sacred trust that we have is to preserve the freedom of our people, of our Government. We can never lay this freedom on the bargain counter. We must forever protect it in our own self-interest, and as an eternal beacon light for enslaved people of other lands as it has been for more than a century and a half.

I have but three conclusions, based upon broad, fundamental principles, as an approach to our problems:

First, I know that each and every attempt to short circuit the Congress as representative of the people in arriving at our decisions is a primary blow at the constitutional safeguards of the United States.

Second, every step that we take must conserve this country's resources and manpower.

Third, those who seek to label as an isolationist any person in or out of Government who dares to challenge the policies of the State Department are also attacking our liberty of discussion.

World responsibilities face us on every hand. We cannot dodge or duck our assignment. But we must keep constantly before us the need for protecting our freedoms here at home.

It is so easy to lose freedom and so hard to regain it.

And what are those freedoms at home that we must guard? Let me mention a few.

We must see that the basic structure of our Government is preserved so that temporary abridgments of our freedoms—the controls and restrictions—can be quickly and easily removed as soon as the need for them has passed.

We must be sure that all such restrictions are spelled out as emergency measures and that new emergencies are not created to prolong these restrictions just for the sake of politics and power.

We must resist restrictions on our rights to express ourselves freely, forcefully, and clearly.

In my estimation, the recent Buchanan committee was an attempt to hamper free speech and action. Its very demand on business for copies of advertisements, booklets, speeches, etc., has thrown a scare into timid businessmen.

If Republic or any other company believes that a Government policy is contrary to public and/or company interest, there should be no hesitation to say so. We may be wrong in our interpretation, but no Government pressure—no real or implied threat—should discourage us from expressing our ideas.

If anything, business should speak more frequently, more forcefully. Business is an important segment of our economic life on which the success of our rearmament program depends, and it has a duty to present its views. No threats of legislation should interfere with this right.

Though this is perhaps not the best time to discuss taxation, I still believe the Government should preserve to the individual the right to spend his own money to the fullest possible degree.

No one is stupid enough to believe that we can fight a war in Korea and at the same time vastly increase our armament program without a heavy increase in Government expense. But as yet the Government has shown no disposition to cut back on nonmilitary expense. We should raise every penny necessary to rearm. Our dollars would have little value if we should lose our fight with communism. But ordinary Government operation can and should be cut sharply. We can't afford pork barrels today. We can't afford to start Fair Deal programs that will cost hundreds of millions. We should declare a moratorium on free pamphlets and services, on construction for nonmilitary purposes, on bureaus which have outlived their usefulness, on subsidies, boondoggling, and chairwarming. Economy in Government is never popular with those who get the ax, but it would reassure the taxpayers tremendously, and might help solve some of our manpower problems. More money for guns, tanks, and planes and less for forms, reports, and red tape—that makes sense.

We must use to the fullest our freedom of expression through the ballot box. Every election in a free country is important, whether it be local, State, or national. By majority vote we citizens set the policies for those who hold office. If they choose to disregard our wishes, we can and should turn them out.

I am not one who believes that only Republicans can intelligently run the United States Government. There are plenty of patriotic and able Democrats, some of whom are in office today. When we vote we should vote for ability first. Unfortunately we have had too many second-raters in office, whose ability to promise exceeds their ability to perform. We need more able men to offer themselves for office in both parties. That gives us freedom of choice—one of the most important freedoms we have.

We must also, and this is important, preserve our freedom of opportunity.

This country became great because the individual American had the opportunity to make the most of his abilities and talents. He could venture his capital or labor and keep his gains, if any.

He could engage in work of his choice and change it whenever he wished.

Because he could profit from his efforts, he was willing to take chances. The result was an expansion such as no other nation has ever seen.

Any encroachment on a man's freedom of opportunity destroys in some part man's progress.

We must fight against bureaucratic red tape and restrictions which discourage men of imagination, courage, and willingness who are willing to work and create opportunities.

The constant warfare carried on by Government against business is far from encouraging. The impression has been given that all businessmen are enemies of society. This is obviously nonsense.

Another freedom we must retain is the freedom to paddle our own canoe.

We have only to look at England to realize how governmental interference in private affairs destroys individual initiative.

When Government takes upon itself a cradle-to-grave program (financed by ourselves), it is too easy to set back and wait for hand-outs instead of making our own way. This cannot produce a strong, self-assured, independent people. We don't help the weak by pulling down the strong.

I do not close my mind to the fact that some must be given help by Government, but this help should be local in nature and be reserved for those who really need it, who are really entitled to it, and not for those who merely ask for it or would like to have it.

These are some of the freedoms we must preserve and cherish.

But freedoms also means obligations. We must continually earn our freedoms, work for them.

What are some of these obligations?

First, there is the obligation to be informed. Too many of us form our opinions haphazardly or repeat someone else's opinion without thought or study.

I grant we can't all be experts in every field but in those which most closely concern us we can and must inform ourselves.

We should study both sides of a question, weigh it, think of the pluses and minuses involved. We should make up our own minds and not let other people make them up for us.

No, we won't always be right but we'll have a much better chance of being right if we do a little homework ourselves. This means a lot of reading, listening, and thinking. Thinking is hard work but in these days of rapid and far-reaching communication both sides of every question are always available if we only look. Take the trouble to look at both sides on the basis of what you have thought out. Don't follow the herd.

We also have an obligation to take an active part in the political life of our country. By that I mean that you must do more than vote and/or send a check to a political party. No, it's a lot more than that.

You must lend your help and counsel. Get in and pitch.

Take part in precinct and ward politics and encourage your employees to do likewise. That's where votes are made. Show by your example how to fight against corrupt and misguided government and support honest and intelligent government. Your government is what you make it and in the end you get what you deserve.

There are many other freedoms and obligations which I might detail to you tonight. But there is a time factor which must be considered.

So let me close with this thought.

Most of us in this audience are well past our youth. Most of us have children. Many of us have grandchildren.

We've had a fine country in which to grow up. Under our system of individual opportunity we have done pretty well.

But will our children and grandchildren do as well? Will they have the same opportunities we had? Not unless we do a better job of thinking and selling our ideas.

Gentlemen, it's up to us. We can't afford to fail. We must fight and win the battle for the preservation of freedom for the next generation.

We must win back what we have lost and carry freedom's banner to new heights.

We must protect and preserve the freedom of this great land of ours so that we can "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

That, gentlemen, is our task. We can do it if we work.

Sequoyah

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM G. STIGLER

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. STIGLER. Mr. Speaker, my attention was recently called to an article appearing in the April issue of the magazine the New Yorker entitled "Talking Leaves."

This article dealt with an American Indian named Sequoyah, a full-blood Cherokee, and whose statue is one of Oklahoma's contributions to the Hall of Fame in Statuary Hall.

Sequoyah accomplished a feat which no other living human had done when he invented a Cherokee alphabet which adapted the English alphabet to the Cherokee language. In 1821 he announced that his task was finished and the entire Cherokee Nation, living in Indian Territory, which is now Oklahoma, was swept by excitement.

Mr. Speaker, the article is a valuable contribution to our history, and I include it as a part of my remarks:

TALKING LEAVES

Word that the bulk of Bernard Shaw's fortune is to be used to further the spread of an expanded English alphabet of his invention has prompted us to look up a few facts about an American Indian named Sequoyah who, without the help of a fortune or, for that matter, of any schooling, worked out the written language of the Cherokee Nation. As far as we know, he is the only man in history ever to have done such a thing singlehanded. Starting from scratch, with no knowledge of English or any European language—with, in fact, no knowledge of any language other than Cherokee—he devised an entire, and entirely workable, system of writing, a feat that some philologists regard as one of the most sublime acts of intellection of all time. It's one that might have abashed even Shaw.

Take him for all in all, Sequoyah seems to be one of the most inspiring and attractive figures in our history. He was born in 1770, or a few years earlier, in the village of Taskigi, in what is now Tennessee and was then the land of the Cherokee Nation. His mother was part Cherokee and part Shawnee, his father was a white man who has never been definitely identified but is popularly believed to have been a Virginian named Nathaniel Gist, a friend of Washington's. Sequoyah's English name was George Guess, sometimes spelled Gist or Guest. He was brought up as a Cherokee and, as a young man, became an accomplished silversmith and an excellent painter of animal subjects—two skills theretofore not developed among his people—and is said to have made paint brushes of animal hair without ever knowing that there were already such things in the world. He saw and was deeply impressed by books, which the Indians called "talking leaves," and, refusing to go along with the prevailing Indian notion that the ability to put speech into written form was a divinely ordained perquisite of the white man, determined, along about 1809, to invent a written language for the Cherokees. (He was unaware that a number of missionaries had tried their hands at adapting the English alphabet to the Cherokee language, had found its 26 characters insufficient to represent Cherokee sounds, many of which are made largely with the nose and throat, and had given up the job.) Sequoyah first set out to draw a different picture for each word, but soon realized that more pictures would be required than anyone could possibly hope to remember. After several years, he hit on the idea of using a different symbol for each Cherokee syllable. Copying from an English book, he used most of the letters of the Roman alphabet as symbols and then designed a much larger number himself. He had no interest in how the Roman letters were pronounced; the Roman "D" became the Cherokee "A," the Roman "R" the Cherokee "Tso."

Sequoyah listened diligently to conversations among his fellow Cherokees, and every time he detected a new sound, he made a note of it, scratching his symbols on bark with a knife or a sliver of wood. Eventually, he compiled around 140 syllables. These he winnowed down to 85, which he found the minimum necessary. What he had done was devise a system of notation known technically as a syllabary, which requires more symbols than an alphabet but much less writing, provided the language is low in multiple consonants, as the Cherokee language is.

In 1821 Sequoyah announced that his task was finished, and when he was able to demonstrate that his brand of talking leaves worked just as well as the white man's, the Cherokee Nation was swept by excitement. It took only 3 or 4 days for the average Cherokee to master Sequoyah's syllabary, and within a few months practically the entire nation had become literate.

In 1825, a Cherokee preacher named David Brown, probably a convert to the Moravian faith, completed a translation of the New Testament into Cherokee, and scores of manuscript copies of it were put in circulation. Then the Cherokees decided that it would be fine to have their own newspaper, and in 1827 a Boston firm cast a font of type in Cherokee characters. This, together with a font of Roman type and a press, was shipped to New Echota, the capital of the Cherokee Nation, and soon the paper appeared. It was called the Cherokee Phoenix, and, later, the Cherokee Phoenix and Indian's Advocate. Sequoyah was honored both by his own people and by the white man. He went to Washington in 1828 as a member of the delegation that negotiated the treaty that moved the Cherokee Nation west to what is now Oklahoma—or, rather, had the treaty rammed down their throats. He and the other delegates signed the treaty in Cherokee, instead of merely making their marks, as all other Indians had always done. The treaty noted that the Government was to make Sequoyah a grant of $500. It took 6 years for the grant to arrive, and when it came, it consisted of $150 in cash, plus 22 kettles of salt, 3 saddles, and a small quantity of other merchandise. Sequoyah died in 1843 in Mexico, where he had gone in search of a group of Cherokees who had left the nation years before. In 1907 the Indian Territory voted that it was to be called Sequoyah when it attained statehood. To its chagrin, it got combined with the Oklahoma Territory, and was called Oklahoma instead. The people kept faith as best they could. They saw to it that an Oklahoma county was named for Sequoyah. Furthermore, the giant redwoods of the West were named sequoias in his honor, which is probably better than having a State named after you.

Nerve Gas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I believe that it would be valuable for the people of this country to know of the development of chemical warfare in recent years and particularly of new gasses which have been discovered. I, therefore, include the following article by the dean of the Florida delegation, my able colleague, Congressman ROBERT L. F. SIKES, printed in Saga magazine:

THE INSIDE STORY OF THE INCREDIBLE WEAPON NERVE GAS

(By Hon. ROBERT L. F. SIKES, Member of Congress)

This is the story of the incredible weapon. The weapon whose effect is deadlier than the sting of a hooded cobra. The weapon whose presence cannot be detected by the human senses.

A drop of liquid the size of a dime on exposed skin brings death in a matter of minutes; its vapor inhaled for a few seconds may be fatal. It has no color, odor, or taste; so insidious is its action that laboratory findings after death reveal no trace of it in the body.

Its story is being told now because its war potential, properly applied, may prove greater than the atom or hydrogen bomb.

This is neither fantasy nor science fiction, but cold, hard fact for 1951.

Even its technical name is a secret—we may only refer to it as a nerve gas.

I will never forget seeing the captured German films which showed the gas in action. Tethered goats, munching wisps of hay, were blinking in the sunlight. There was a slight hissing on the sound track. For a moment the goats seemed unaware of the shapeless cloud that was rolling toward them. Suddenly it struck. The goats reacted as though they had touched a charged wire. They plunged blindly, trying to butt their invisible foe. Their backs arched, their legs twitched convulsively. Before they could bleat they dropped to the ground. They were dying in a matter of seconds.

After the war, as a member of the Armed Services Subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations, I visited the United States Army Chemical Center in Maryland. Here I had a close-up view of the liquid gas—its most lethal state. Except for the slight oily trace around the neck of the two-gallon jar, it might have been so much distilled water. It was hard to reconcile its harmless appearance with its tremendous destructive power.

Since nerve gas is the only chemical weapon which offers a potential enemy a chance for an effective long-range attack on the United States, the wraps of secrecy are now being lifted in part. The public must know what this gas is, what it can do, and what can be done in the way of defense against it. Otherwise panic might result from its surprise use against our cities.

We must also begin to grasp the meaning of what this weapon can do for us, and how it can work a military revolution on any future battlefield.

Nerve gas is revolutionary because, being odorless, tasteless, and colorless, it strikes with little warning. It may achieve its deadly effect before the victim can make a move to protect himself.

It is revolutionary because unlike other gases which strike at the respiratory system, or raise poisonous blisters on the skin, it attacks an essential ingredient of the nerve process itself, interfering with the body's communication lines. Far more toxic than any chemical agent hitherto known, it gains entry to the body not only by being breathed, but through the skin, the eyes, and through the mucous membranes of the respiratory and digestive tracts.

It packs a triple wallop, having some of the effects that would be characteristic of a poison brewed from toadstools (muscarine), cigar butts (nicotine) and curare, the lethal stuff that South American jungle Indians use on darts and arrowheads.

Since various types of nerve gases were developed by the Germans, and huge stocks were confiscated after World War II, their characteristics are now well-known to both our allies and potential enemies. For that reason they are a factor to be reckoned with in the lives of every one of us. Their action is swift—there is little time lag after initial contact. One whiff of high concentration, and you've had it.

In 1937, two German scientists discovered that a certain chemical compound is an essential factor in transmitting impulses between nerve endings, and that once this chemical is destroyed, nerve action becomes inhibited. The brain is no longer able to transmit its messages clearly, physical processes become confused and disorganized, and life becomes a welter of erratic responses. To create a gas which would destroy this vital nerve chemical became a top-secret, high-priority objective of Hitler's war machine.

The first rumors that something mysterious was afoot began to trickle back to this country in 1940. Various German refugees hinted that the Nazis were in possession of an invisible gas that had no odor and which could penetrate any known gas mask. Lacking supporting data, such rumors sounded like the usual Goebbels propaganda myth.

As time went by and the rumor persisted, Allied intelligence authorities began to take more notice, particularly after an agent delievered a strange-looking German mask to British intelligence in the fall of 1943. This mask covered not only the eyes and mouth, but also the ears. The agent reported that it was being worn in a chemical plant where a mysterious new gas was being manufactured. With this, intelligence officers hastened to put the new gas at the head of their target list, up with the buzz-bomb and the V-2 rocket.

By 1944, the reports were more specific—the gas was two to four times more toxic than anything previously known and was persistent enough to contaminate low ground and woods for weeks at a time. Reports of German experiments revealed that during the initial stages it caused congestion of the chest, severe headaches, nausea, blindness, convulsions and cramps. It was also reported—exaggeratedly, as it turned out—that degeneration of the brain cells took place, and that its victims became raving maniacs.

That the Germans should possess such a weapon, without any counterthreat on the part of the Allies, was of course a serious situation. It was essential, therefore, that the same gas, or a better one, be developed to perfect a defense against it, and to be held in reserve for retaliation.

How we came to develop a counterpart which proved even more deadly than the original is a story as fascinating and as complex as the development of the atomic bomb.

Although many of the details are still secret, it can be stated that Allied intelligence sources not only obtained the German formula but also samples of the mysterious new substance. Only the manufacturing process remained elusive, but in a race against time, our efforts to solve this problem proved successful. So successful that today experts consider the German gas the Model T of a more fully developed chemical arsenal. Without going into any of the secret technical characteristics of the latest types, this is how nerve gas acts:

If only traces of the vapor are encountered there is difficulty in breathing, accompanied by coughing, shortness of breath and a watery discharge from the nose. The eye pupils narrow to pin points, there is a flushed face, rapid pulse and a sensation similar to muscarine (toadstool) and nicotine (tobacco) poisonings. This, the mildest of all exposures—a whiff or two of an extremely low concentration—can be relieved by small doses of atropine. These effects, similar to an asthma attack, we are told, will last "only a few days."

With a slightly larger dose, there is a painful tightening of the focusing muscles of the eye, a drawing pain in the back of the eyeballs, and painful sensitivity to bright light. In other words—a migraine headache plus partial blindness. If larger doses of vapor are breathed, or the liquid absorbed through the eyes, skin, or saliva, the involuntary muscles of the diaphragm begin an aimless flutter, and the victim, be it man or beast, can neither inhale nor exhale, becomes confused and falls unconscious. Blood pressure drops to shock levels, the heart slows to a death march rhythm, and death itself is not far off. Nevertheless, severe as these symptoms are, they can still be counteracted if the victim can be given medical assistance before breathing has stopped. Heavy, prolonged intravenous or intramuscular doses of atropine may completely reverse the clinical picture. As the antidote is administered, breathing becomes relaxed, the stalled heart resumes its regular beat, blood pressure rises, and if massive doses can be continued every few hours for at least several days, the chances of recovery are good.

Even with recovery, however, the central nervous system may be not quite the same, and involuntary spasms of muscle fibers, ranging from facial tics to grand-mal epileptic seizures, may persist.

In mild cases, giddiness, tension, anxiety, sleeplessness, and excessive dreaming continue, while in severe exposures, depression, restlessness, tremor, emotional instability, and irrational behavior may occur. Thus, under certain conditions, the gas may destroy sanity.

Such are the grim facts about nerve gas and what it is known to accomplish.

How can we defend ourselves against it?

Since the gas is colorless and odorless, the only way we can get an early warning of its presence is by a physical or chemical means of detection. An indicator that gives a striking color change, or that registers an electrical alarm would do the trick. Such devices, we are told, have been discovered. Pending their manufacture and distribution in sufficient quantities, however, civil defense will have to rely on the ability to recognize nerve gas symptoms after the attack has occurred. That is why I have spelled them out in such clinical detail.

If there is only vapor in the air, gas masks will suffice. But if the liquid is present, any contact against skin or clothing becomes extremely hazardous. Those who enter affected areas must wear, in addition to a mask, impermeable clothing, gloves, and boots. Rubber gloves and rubber boots will be safe for a half hour if the contamination is light. If heavy, their protection will last only 15 minutes.

Against the nonpersistent type of gas, where the effects last less than 10 minutes, a fair amount of protection is afforded by breathing through a towel or handkerchief soaked in an alkaline solution—such as baking soda or soapy water.

Since the gas strikes with such swiftness, medical treatment must be geared accordingly. Disaster plans call for the injection of atropine as soon as possible, deep into the muscles of the thigh, buttocks, or shoulders of every victim who has serious difficulty in breathing, who is unconscious, or who is in convulsions. Artificial respiration will need to be given in some cases.

From what we know about the stability of nerve gas it can dangerously contaminate exposed foods which have a high water or fat content, especially milk. Dry foods such as sugar, flour, and cereals are relatively little affected. Food in airtight packages is not harmed by vapors, but only sealed glass or metal containers are safe from the liquid.

As for our water supplies, tests show that while the vapors will not seriously affect such large bodies as reservoirs or lakes, the liquid gas is capable of dangerous and persistent contamination of water.

That a determined enemy using such a gas might be able to reduce substantially United States atomic production without ever dropping a bomb or firing a shot is now an ever-present possibility. That the same enemy might paralyze any strategic center is implicit in the very nature of the weapon.

Eighteen years ago, headlines in the New York Times read: "Gas bombs shut stock exchange—Gasping brokers flee knock-out fumes in cooling system."

What happened on that day, August 4, 1933, may be worth reviewing.

The New York Stock Exchange is housed in a large office building at the corner of Broad and Wall Streets. Some 2,000 brokers and employees have access to its trading floor, the size of a college gymnasium. At 12:05 p. m., a slight haze was noticed near the air conditioned grille on the ceiling, near the Broad Street side. Those who looked up saw a thin bluish wisp of smoke shimmering in the light rays coming through the arched windows. It looked like cigarette smoke, but unlike cigarette smoke, which rises off the floor, this smoke was descending.

The employees at the quotation machine on the Broad Street side were the first to sense something wrong. They waited until the haze enveloped them. Then they ran, gasping to the center of the floor. Almost immediately fumes covered the entire area. Brokers and clerks, alike, made a rush for the doors. By the time someone rang the gong for trading to cease, there was no one left to hear it.

As one of the most sensitive trading spots in the Nation's financial structure, the sudden cessation of stock exchange activities threw most of the country's marketplaces into confusion.

Wall Street itself was in a near panic, reminiscent of the bomb explosion of 1920, as the noon-day crowds watched the floor traders burst through the exits into the street, coughing, choking, gasping for breath, with handkerchiefs to their eyes.

A half hour later police discovered that two tear-gas bombs had been released next to the fifth-floor inlet of the ventilating system. The gas, normally used to subdue prison riots, was fortunately nontoxic. The incident itself had been staged as a publicity stunt for an obscure and short-lived one-man political party.

Change tear gas to nerve gas, the perpetrator from an eccentric to a skilled saboteur, the locale from the stock exchange to the Pentagon, Oak Ridge, or any other strategic installation whose crippling is deemed worth the risk, and you can appreciate why, in any future war, chemical weapons may be more decisive than the atomic bomb.

Realistic, not wishful, thinking is imperative for survival. Dare we suppose that a weapon potentially so destructive would be completely ignored by a determined enemy, particularly when its principal attribute is surprise? Make no mistake about it—if and when a nerve gas attack is launched, it will come with great speed and on a scale never before witnessed. We know, for example, that the Soviet Union came into possession of German stockpiles of nerve gas, as well as German technical personnel who had worked on its development and manufacture. We know that the principal German nerve gas producing plants lay within what is now the Soviet zone. So we must assume that as a minimum the Soviets can reproduce the German gases, with the probability that they, too, have engaged in further development and improvement.

The facts about nerve gas are grim enough without indulging in any flights of fancy. There is no need, for example, for anyone to assume that the stratosphere over our cities could be saturated with infinitesimal particles of the new poison which would filter down and kill every living thing. If in the future you read of entire cities being wiped out overnight by this silent weapon, just pass it off as the work of an overheated imagination. After all, there are limits to what this, or any other, unconventional weapon can achieve, and mass annihilation is one of them.

Tests show that nerve gas may be effective up to a half-mile radius from the point of the releasing explosion, but this does not mean that death will come to all within the zone. Ground winds will vary in intensity, and since gas is heavier than air and its flow is downward, those who are above the second floor of any building have less chance of coming into contact with the vapors, although a great deal depends on local air currents inside as well as outside any tall building. Gas masks, of course, will give some protection.

The gas may also be placed on its target from the air. It is capable of being dispersed from a high altitude as a spray or mist, and the atomized particles, drifting for miles with the wind, will cause at least mild reactions to those who breathe the vapors. But until a potential enemy acquires an air fleet, or sufficient guided missiles to support a long-range massive attack on the United States, there is only a slim chance of this occurring. However, we cannot overlook the possibility that an enemy might consider the use of nerve gas in conjunction with other ultra-destructive weapons in order to cause the maximum confusion and disruption to the strategic target. The threat of such an attack, causing tens of thousands of living casualties requiring immediate medical attention, must never be underestimated.

It would be dangerous to assume that because World War II saw no use of chemical warfare, any future conflict would be bound by similar considerations. In World War II we adopted a policy that we would not use chemical weapons offensively unless they were used against us—a threat of instantaneous and overwhelming retaliation which we were prepared to make good. United States policy in this respect was voiced by President Roosevelt in 1943, in the following statement:

"I have been loathe to believe that any nation, even our present enemies, could or would be willing to loose upon mankind such terrible and inhumane weapons * * *.

"Use of such weapons has been outlawed by the general opinion of civilized mankind. This country has not used them, and I hope that we will never be compelled to use them. I state categorically that we shall under no circumstances resort to the use of such weapons unless they are first used by our enemies."

Nevertheless, the United States is not signatory to any international covenant restricting the use of poison gas. As recently as 1926, at the Disarmament Conference, the same prohibition was advanced, and the United States Senate refused to ratify the Geneva gas protocol.

Since June of 1950, one of the grimmest battles in American history has been fought in Korea. Greatly outnumbered, attacked by a foe that has thrown in masses of men regardless of losses, our troops have undergone the most bitter trials of war. From this struggle, one aspect now stands clear—namely, our forces, using every conventional weapon, suffered heavy casualties whenever the enemy amassed the manpower to take an objective regardless of losses imposed by our normal ground, air, and naval weapons.

Despite the fact that chemicals, including nerve gas, are better suited to defense than to attack—(one does not contaminate the area into which one proposes to advance)—these weapons were not used, yet they may hold the answer to the still-unsolved problem of the Communists' "human sea" tactics.

Granted that there is a deep-seated repugnance to the use of chemical weapons. Nevertheless, the time has come for the fullest public discussion of the pros and cons of these, or any other weapons which will aid our forces in dealing with an enemy, stronger only in numbers, but numbers capable of winning a decision in a battle limited to conventional arms.

Korea may be the proving ground of a future conflict, just as Spain was in 1936.

If world war III becomes a reality, we may have to throw away the book of rules and use every weapon in our arsenal. It probably will be total war. One day this issue will have to be met. The time to get our thinking in order is now.

Gas warfare has been condemned as horrible and inhumane. The underlying reality is that no warfare is humane. Before rejecting gas as too cruel for use by a civilized nation, let us look at the casualties and suffering inflicted by an accepted weapon—an air bombardment for example.

Consider for a moment what happened in Hamburg, Germany, on the night of July 27–28, 1943, when 16,000 buildings were set aflame, when the air temperature in some city blocks registered 1,472 degrees F., and when between 60,000 and 100,000 civilians perished. I quote from the United States Strategic Bombing Survey's report on the Effect of Bombing on Health and Medical Care in Germany. If you are squeamish, stop right here.

"Soon after the sirens had sounded—a little before midnight on a clear night—the first bombs dropped. The warning was adequate for everyone to go to his shelter or bunker, and thereby evacuate the streets. * * * Incendiary bombs started fires which spread particularly in thickly inhabited parts of the town. In several minutes whole blocks were on fire and streets made impassable by flames. The heat increased rapidly and produced a wind which was soon the power and strength of a typhoon.

"This typhoon first moved in the direction of the fires, later spreading in all directions. * * *

"The heat turned whole city blocks into a flaming hell. * * *

"Literally hundreds of people were seen leaving the shelters after the heat became intense. They ran across the streets and were seen to collapse very slowly like people who were utterly exhausted. They could not get up. Many thus killed were found to be naked. Two explanations have been offered for this phenomenon; that the flames spurted across the street with the speed of a tornado and consumed the victims' clothing, singeing their skins; or that the intense heat made the clothes dissolve without actual fire. The shoes were usually the only covering left on the bodies.

"Most of these people were not burnt to ashes when recovered, but dry and shrunken, resembling mummies. * * *

"In the course of hours the air in the shelters became increasingly worse. Matches or candles did not burn. People lay on the floor because the air was better there and they could breathe easier. Some vomited. Some became tired and went to sleep. Wherever the ventilators were still working they brought in hot smoky air instead of cool fresh air and had to be turned off. Filters proved insufficient to keep out smoke. The apparent safety of many shelters was only temporary as the approaching fire increased heat and smoke.

"Thus the picture changed from hour to hour. Whoever was still able to make his own decision had one of two alternatives—to stay or escape. Many looked into the streets, saw that everything was on fire, decided they could not get through and withdrew to the corners of the shelters. Some tried to get out, and for them it was a race with death among explosions, fire bombs, machine guns, and falling flak. Beside all this, flame spurted through the streets and the wind caught up with many and threw them to the ground. There were screams from victims all around. Many stated that 'the air just didn't come anymore' and breathing became very difficult. Otherwise they did not feel anything, and the rest went on over those who had fallen. One man was observed to fall. He was about to pull himself up with his hands when flames were seen to envelop his back and he burned within 5 minutes without changing his position.

"Only a few reached safety in areas which had not been hit. Some found safety in the bottom of a bomb crater, others found death by drowning in water-filled craters. The only safe refuge in all this time was the water of the canals and the port. Most of those who got there were entirely exhausted. Lips, mouth, and throat were dry. They were blistered on the nose and ears, on the hands and face, and their eyes burned with pain and could hardly be opened after having been exposed to so much smoke. Many collapsed, then lost consciousness and died. Many jumped into the water. Even here the heat was hardly bearable. They took blankets and handkerchiefs and soaked them in the water and then protected their heads and the uncovered parts of their bodies with the wet cloths. But the water evaporated so quickly that this procedure had to be repeated every few minutes.

"In the meantime the burned-out houses caved in. The rubble and debris lying in the street prevented many from escaping. Many of the bodies were lying in the street half-clothed or nude. After a few hours the bodies shrunk to small objects with hard brownish black skin, and frequently to ashes and complete disappearance.

"Carbon monoxide as the major cause of death from aerial bombing was a possibility which few had expected before the war. It is now recognized as a typical 'shelter or cellar death.' Carbon-monoxide death assumed such importance that the high command of the Luftwaffe issued an order to procure statistical evidence. * * * Concentrations up to 95 percent were found in many of the 'shelter dead.' It was stressed at the conference in Jueterborg that the public should not be informed as to the danger of carbon monoxide originating in large-scale fires. In view of the inadequacy of preventive measures only, unrest and even panic would be caused."

After reading the foregoing, I think all will agree that war is inhumane in all its aspects, no matter what the weapons. In the future the employment by our enemies of chemical weapons to achieve a military objective is very likely to be judged solely on the grounds of its military applicability. Our own survival may depend upon our recognition of this hard fact.

There is no point in minimizing the horror of fire raids or of gas. Either can produce widespread death in a matter of minutes unless effective countermeasures are at hand. Yet if we are forced to fight, we may also be forced to use the most effective weapon at our command.

Modern war reveals a trend toward the concentration of immense destructive power in increasingly smaller packages—packages which cost less than the vastly greater number of older weapons needed to achieve equal potency. Experts call this the ABC pattern of warfare—atomic, biological, chemical. Up to now we have concentrated almost exclusively on atomic potentials—in attack and defense. But such a narrow view may not long be sustained. Warfare is more than a matter of cold steel, hot atoms and jet-propelled gun-platforms, especially when we are confronted by the problem of Communist mass infantry attack—the tactic which broke the back of the German army in Russia, and which twice produced a near-debacle in Korea. What happened in Korea is only a foretaste of what may happen in Western Europe should our military leaders continue to ignore the one weapon which may be best suited to defense against hordes.

For whether we realize it or not, nerve gas is capable of permeating the air envelope in which the armed horde moves and breathes. Nerve gas can shoot around corners, creep into foxholes, and ooze into otherwise impregnable strongpoints. The damaging power of high explosive ends when the shell bursts. When a chemical shell explodes, its damaging power only begins—its lethal quality can remain for minutes, days, weeks, or even months.

When a rifle bullet reaches the end of its trajectory and is spent without hitting anything, it is wasted and useless. Combat analysis shows that a great percentage of small arms fire misses its target. Nerve gas, spread out over a far greater area than either shell or bullet, would just be starting its effect. Its deadly molecule remains alive and kicking, moving with bullet-like speed to penetrate the tiniest pores. Gas is like a machine gun that fires a million bullets a second.

Since we have no offensive intentions, the fact that a chemical weapon is often more suited to the defense rather than the offense, is a very important point to be considered. Contaminated ground is denied to the enemy, and his attack is forced into narrow channels which can be covered by rapid fire supporting weapons.

In Western Europe, as in the United States, prevailing winds are from west to east. Any enemy facing us, would have gas clouds blown in his face, including any gas which he released. This is one reason why the Germans were at a disadvantage in using gas, and the same problem will confront any similar army which looks into the west wind.

Furthermore, war demands that we think beyond the moment of conflict to the time when facilities of the war zone must be restored to productive living. The principle of economy of force demands that every unnecessary act of physical destruction be avoided, as the smaller the loss, the greater the victory. This is something which we lost sight of during World War II, when we smashed into rubble the very facilities which, in order to maintain the peace, our taxpayers have paid millions to restore. Chemical weapons subdue personnel without destroying property.

No one can deny the ultra-destructive character of atomic weapons—in that sphere they have no equal. But one may well quarrel with any glib assumption that they can win a war, if by winning, one means the enforcement of a nation's policy with physical destruction held to the minimum, instead of being maximized to the point where war has no victors, only losers. Nor should we assume, because we are fascinated with the atomic weapon, that Soviet war planners fall into a similar error. In fact, knowing that their primary interest lies in the conquest of the physical assets of the world intact, we must assume that they are giving increasingly greater consideration to the use of chemical means to obtain their objectives.

The ideal weapon may be a gas which temporarily destroys the will to fight but does no lasting harm. Such a weapon might make short shrift of any aggressor, and render his defense powerless. Such a weapon properly used, would free the world from fear of destruction and might well save civilization itself from collapse.

This, however, is a glimpse into a future which may be unpredictable. The present demands that we face reality. Nerve gas may never be used against our country; that at least is what we can hope. But no one can be sure. If a nerve gas attack does come, what you have read here will enable you to sense when it is occurring, and may help save your life.

That is why this story is being told.

Partition of Ireland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following very interesting article that appeared in the weekly bulletin of the Department of External Affairs of Ireland on April 23, 1951:

IRELAND AND WESTERN DEFENSE

In a letter to the British Catholic weekly, the Tablet, Mr. Sean MacBride, minister for external affairs, answers recent criticisms of Ireland's attitude toward western defense contained in a Tablet editorial entitled "Ireland and the Atlantic Pact." The Tablet had commented critically on extracts from Mr. MacBride's speech to the National Press Club in Washington on March 31.

Mr. MacBride writes:

"After quoting my remarks as to the impact on Ireland of Russian and British policies, and my remark that 'both are powers with imperial traditions, and to imperial powers the partition of small nations has always seemed expedient and therefore just', you go on to say that the Communists are addicted to 'a similar line of argument' when they defend their acts of religious oppression by reference to the English Reformation in the sixteenth century. * * *

"The speech would certainly have been an ill-considered one if it had in fact represented 'a similar line of argument' to the Communist one with which you so imaginatively compare it. But, in fact, I was not talking about the English Reformation, or even about Peter the Great; I was talking about the partition of my country, which was effected by Great Britain in 1921 and which is still, in 1951, being maintained by Great Britain. This is not an 'old unhappy far-off thing' but something very modern and, to us, very important. Some English people would rather forget about it. That is quite understandable. It should be understandable also that we in Ireland find it hard to forget about it; to us it is very real present-day fact. In fact, however, many people in Britain, and yourself, sir, apparently among them, do sincerely find it hard to understand that a small nation which has opposed British rule for hundreds of years should object to your continued interference in its affairs. That inability to see our point of view is what I ascribe to your imperialist traditions; I have no interest in those traditions except insofar as they affect living issues in the world today. * * *

"You will, I hope, forgive me if I see in your own editorial some evidence of an imperialistic tradition which is characteristically your own. You say that instead of attacking in principle the partition of my country as I did, I would have done better 'to dwell on the evidence that can be brought forward to support the view that the Catholics of Northern Ireland are the victims of religious discrimination.' Now the Catholics of Northern Ireland are subject to religious discrimination, and 'the evidence that can be brought forward to support the view' that this is so, has, in fact, been brought forward by Mr. Geoffrey Bing in his pamphlet John Bull's Other Ireland, published by Tribune. I may say that some of us find it rather noteworthy that the honorable task of inquiring into this injustice was carried out by Tribune rather than the Tablet. But from our point of view the anti-Catholic discrimination in the six counties, despicable as it is, is not the only matter involved. We would still object as strongly as ever to the partition of our country if the Catholics in the partitioned area were pampered. Ireland would still object because Ireland is a nation, and a nation, as long as there is life in it, will not accept division, whatever the motives and circumstances of the division are. * * *

"THE UNGRATEFUL IRISH

"In your comments on discrimination and on the Dutch affair you are taking, perhaps unconsciously, the attitude which your paper has so often in the past taken toward Ireland. The Irish, for the Tablet, have always been simply a type, and not quite the best type, of Catholic Britons. You and your predecessors have been perennially unable to understand why the Irish are still not satisfied when some new 'benefit' such as the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland, or a Catholic Lord Lieutenant, or a squadron of foreign airmen, is conferred upon them. The Irish, I can assure you, will not be satisfied until their country is free and united, a republic of the 32 counties. You would not, I think, find such a demand strange in a case where Britain was not involved. If, for example, Russia were able to inspire the secession to the Soviet Union of areas of France in which the Communists had a majority and adjoining areas which they were able to dominate, you would probably not find it eccentric on the part of the majority of the French nation if they were to seek the reintegration of their country.

"That brings me to the main burden of your article, which is that, in the great crisis of the world today we should forget about a little thing like partition. We are 'in the presence of the Soviet power,' and as long as we are so—which may be a long time—we should subordinate everything to defense; in effect 'freeze' conditions as they are today, however unjust they may be. This was, if I remember rightly, the method by which the holy alliance sought to resist the ideas of the French Revolution. It was natural enough that the doomed aristocratic order should rely on such a system, and if I believed that our democratic civilization was doomed I would agree that the best thing to do was to fight a rear-guard action against a change of all kinds. I do not, however, believe that this is the case. I think that this is a time, as I said in Washington, for the 'free and voluntary' merging of national sovereignties. As you rather grudgingly admit, that has been the tendency of our efforts in the Council of Europe, and also, though this you do not mention, the OEEC. We are trying to move toward that end by all the means in our power, but the means in our power do not include the conclusion of a military alliance with the nation which partitions us, and the guaranteeing of that nation's territorial integrity within our own shores.

"OPEN AND CONSTRUCTIVE DISCUSSION

"The suggestion contained in your last sentence, that there is an opportunity for Ireland to exist as one unit within the framework of the western community, is one with which I am thoroughly in agreement. What I fail to see is how we should be moving to that end by accepting partition in order to enter a military alliance. When, as Minister for External Affairs of Ireland, I was obliged to refuse the invitation of the United States to enter the Atlantic Pact, I explained Ireland's reasons and suggested that a conference of the nations involved and of Irish representatives should be held to discuss methods of solving the problem. I think that you, sir, would be rendering a more real service to the unity of western civilization by influencing English public opinion toward an open and constructive discussion by way of such a conference than you are rendering by the admittedly easier and more habitual work of lecturing the Irish."

In the same issue of the Tablet, Mr. James Dillon, Minister for Agriculture, writes:

"Neither Mr. MacBride nor anyone in Ireland is thinking about the imperialism of Britain in the eighteenth or nineteenth century. They are thinking and feeling about what Great Britain is doing in 1950 and 1951, and what she claims the right to go on doing so long as she is physically able to do so—i. e., occupying the six northeastern counties of our country.

"This is not ancient history; this is not ancient wrongs nor injustice of long ago; it is going on now; and I sincerely hope it will stop, before history repeats itself again, in what, for me, would be the third generation."

Soil Conservation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, for a period of many years, Congress has encouraged soil-conservation practices by appropriating funds in order to provide expert advisers to farmers. These funds will be returned by increased value of our most important natural resource—fertile soil. It is very apparent that succeeding generations will inherit a huge national debt; but, at the same time, I sincerely hope they will become heir to land that has not been impoverished by time.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following letter from Mr. D. M. Ginn, a leading land conservationist, to Mr. D. W. Fortenberry, his district conservationist, which recently appeared in the Mississippi Conservation News:

STEP BY STEP

Present-day soil conservationists will be interested in the fact that its principals were recognized prior to the turn of the century. We reproduce for the benefit of our readers the following letter written by Mr. D. M. Ginn, of Walthall County, to Mr. D. W. Fortenberry, district conservationist, of Columbia, Miss.:

TYLERTOWN, MISS.

Mr. D. W. FORTENBERRY,
District Conservationist,
Columbia, Miss.

DEAR SIR: The first attempt at soil conservation that I can remember was about 1888 or 1890, but then we didn't know it as "soil conservation," as that word hadn't then been coined.

One T. D. Richmond, grandfather of Thomas and Ray Richmond, began a system of hillside ditches, on what was then known as Leatherwood Creek, using a rafter and plumb bob as an instrument. This method was continued into the early 1900's, and spread to only a very few farmers, until one of my neighbors secured a farm level. We, then, began the ridge-type terraces with a hillside ditch, with no particular rule or system, but every farmer had his own idea, all of which were from bad to worse.

In 1930 a few farmers had a fairly good system, but still carried the water around hills and over natural waterways to a road, land line, or other disposal place. Then, finally, came the wider and extremely high terraces, on which a few of us planted one row. Later a few were widened to three rows when we heard of the Copeland system as a better way of protecting our soil; and too, by that time we had heard of sheet erosion, and had begun to train our water into more natural waterways. However, we had to go from there because we have not conquered soil depletion or reached a state of perfection by any means.

About 1914, we had never thought of cover crops, but a county agent (then known as county demonstrator), G. C. Minges, persuaded me to try crimson clover as a winter cover crop. I secured 100 pounds of seed, which cost about $4, and planted 4 acres, without inoculation, as we had not then learned that there was such fertilizer as inoculation. However, after being red all winter, by March 20, 1915, that had given me a growth of about 6 inches which was turned under and followed with corn. That convinced me that we had found something worth holding to, and the following fall I planted 15 acres to crimson clover with seed costing $5.25 per hundred. Then came World War I, and we forgot cover crops but by that time a few of us were getting a little less shy of county agents. After 1920, we began to listen to them again but we still believed that we knew more about cropping than they.

In 1924, a county agent persuaded me to plant 500 pounds of hairy vetch, it being inoculated, and it did well. Since then I have not been without winter cover crops on row crop land. In 1930, I planted 100 pounds of Austrian winter peas, fertilized with 4–8–4, and planted in rows that gave me a wonderful growth. That same year I planted 100 acres of hairy vetch to be turned under in the spring, and 20 acres in vetch and oats. The oats crop gave a growth of 4 to 6 feet tall and the vetch, of course, reached a height of the oats. That 20 acres was harvested for feeding purposes. All of the new-known varieties of cover crops are good, but I prefer in most instances wild winter (Singletary) peas.

Finally, in late 1941 or 1942, we succeeded, under the leadership of County Agent O. B. Elliott, to organize the Walthall County Soil Conservation District, with you, D. W. Fortenberry, as conservationist. I remember that I met you on your first day in our town, and after exchanging greetings, you began to talk kudzu, and to my knowledge, you haven't let up until this good day, being 7 or 8 years. I finally agreed to put two acres of the abominable stuff in a section of the farm that could be given away or fenced off, if it proved as obnoxious as I believed it would. However, we finished that planting in the spring with about 5 acres in waterways of a 60-acre field, from which planting and later plantings, that field at this time is about covered. In further experiments, we planted wild winter peas in the kudzu, which combination gives us a very satisfactory and profitable grazing crop. On September 10, 1949, we turned 62 cattle to that kudzu field and they made a good growth, having all they needed until November 15. Then in 1950, we gathered from that field more than $300 of kudzu crowns that went to several neighboring counties.

After all, our county has been exceedingly fortunate in getting started in soil conservation fostered by Federal and State at the time we did. They have kept telling us, through you, that soil conservation and better land use must go hand in hand, if we expect to carry out the command to strive daily and continually, that we leave to our posterity a better world in which to live than we found.

I have been told that I am the first man that successfully grew any of the winter legumes in this section and if that is true, I am very proud of the fact that I was instrumental in beginning a program that has meant so much toward better land conservation.

Remembering our pleasant association in the past, and hoping that we, together, may continue to go forward in all phases of soil conservation, I am,

Yours very truly,

D. M. GINN.

Small Business and Inventive Genius Needs Protection

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, small business is the backbone of free enterprise and a fundamental pillar in the structure of our American form of democracy. Its preservation is essential to the free-enterprise system, and every effort must be made to recognize its needs, insure its survival, and encourage its development and expansion.

Today due to the critical shortage of many essential materials which are needed in the defense program, small business is faced with a famine of raw materials which may result in the failure of many small plants—plants which cannot be converted to the production of defense materials or cannot qualify for defense contracts—in the event some allocation of these materials is not specifically designated for the use of small business.

Many of the small-business concerns have long provided a proving ground for new ideas for labor saving devices, household utensils, and many other types of inventions. Many of these have later been utilized by the Nation's great manufacturing industry.

Mr. Don L. Davis, chairman of the Coordinating Council of the Gadget Industry, recently appeared before the House Small Business Committee during the committee's session at Los Angeles, Calif. The following is the statement of Mr. Davis and is an excellent exposition of the position of small business at the present time and the need for special consideration of the problem of material supply for small business:

Mr. Chairman and members of the House Committee on Small Business, first, may I as an American citizen and spokesman for the Invention Industry express my deep personal and professional appreciation and gratitude for the courtesy extended us in this invitation to appear before your committee. To my knowledge, this is the first time the Invention Industry officially has had an opportunity to have its views heard and recorded by a committee of Congress.

I appear before you today in my official capacity as chairman of the Coordinating Council of the Gadget Industry. The council is composed of the National Association of Inventors, Inc., a trade association of American inventors duly chartered as a nonprofit organization under the State laws of California; the National Gadget Manufacturers Association, a trade organization composed of manufacturers who make new products and registered and duly chartered as a nonprofit corporation under the State laws of California; the National Independent Distributors Association, Inc., a nonprofit corporation chartered under the State laws of Illinois; the Gadget-of-the-Month Club, Inc., an international sampling organization for new products; and Consumers Testing League, a new product research organization. These five organizations comprise the Coordinating Council of the Gadget Industry.

In my remarks, I will refer to the industry at various times both as the invention industry and/or the gadget industry. Both names are used interchangeably to refer to those millions of Americans engaged in the creation, discovery, development, and distribution of new products and/or gadgets.

The invention industry defines a gadget as "any product which is a labor-saving device of any nature, kind, or description." Webster's dictionary defines a gadget as "anything new for which a name cannot be thought of at the moment." In the invention industry, we contend and history has proved that everything new is first a gadget; when hundreds of thousands of people use it, it becomes a standard staple; and when millions of people can no longer live without it, it becomes a necessity. The progress pattern, therefore, of any new idea of merit is, first a gadget—then a staple—and then a necessity. We of the gadget industry contend, and as its spokesman if sufficient time were allotted we could prove, that the invention industry has mothered directly or indirectly every major industry in America today. And were it not for the invention industry, these United States, our country, would be a land of farmers. Our place in the world today, our position as a world power is due directly as we all I am sure must agree, to the ingenuity and industrialization of America, and we contend that this very great industrial development and almost limitless power of production is due to industry of all nature, kind, and description which has been conceived and mothered by American ingenuity, created by American inventors, aided and abetted by those fellow Americans who have had and still do have the courage, the foresight, and the vision to pioneer new ideas and new methods.

We of the invention industry contend that the only way for an average American and for an American businessman to make any real money is in discovery, development, and distribution of new products and services. Under our system, and only under our system, thank God, a man with an idea can still become a millionaire overnight.

We believe that it is elementary and fundamental to point out in passing that the giant American corporations today were small businesses yesterday and the future and security of our country lies in the perpetuation of that fundamental system, for example, the encouragement of small business. We all know that it was the horseless carriage that gave us the automotive industry, the inventors that gave us the flying machine which mothered the aircraft industry, the iceless icebox which became electric refrigeration, radio, television, and countless other illustrations.

We understand that the Congress defines small business as companies and organizations employing 500 persons or less. We believe that if that is the popular congressional conception and treatment, that the Congress must realize that the vast majority of small business in America today, and this is particularly true of the hundreds of thousands of persons engaged in or represented by the invention industry, employ an average of 10 or more people. Twenty-five or fifty would be a more realistic national average. Accordingly, the problems of a manufacturer employing 10 to 25 people are vastly different from those employing 100 to 500 people.

From all available statistics and estimates compiled over a period of the last 5 years, it appears that the gadget industry as such is a half-billion-dollar industry.

We do not think it necessary to prove to the committee that all Americans love gadgets, that gadgets are an American phenomena, and that the very word "gadget" is as American as apple pie. There is not an American home whose confines do not house countless numbers of these labor-saving devices, some good, some bad, some indifferent.

We think that it is significant to call to the committee's attention the fact that although our industry has done so much for our Nation, it has received so little attention, consideration, or even recognition as an industry whose activities are so integrally woven into and a part of the national character and lifeblood of America.

One popular fallacy that we would like to correct in the minds of our fellow Americans is that when most people think of invention and development of new products, invariably they visualize the universities' and corporations' labors and think only of scientists, engineers, and the like, working under corporation grants and benefactors' endowments. I do not represent them. The organized gadget industry knows that they represent a very minute percentage of the activities of our industry. When we refer to inventors, we mean the millions of average Americans in all walks of life who have an idea and who have got the guts to back that idea, often with all their resources. No long-haired inventors, no scatterbrains, but the average American citizen who creates an idea, this is what we mean when we refer to inventors and new products. We say "invention is inspired, not hired." We define invention as "man's rebellion against stupidity, against doing things the hard way." We contend that no man or woman can do a job day after day for a number of years without coming up with an individual trick, invention, gadget, or gimmick to do that job quicker and better, faster and cheaper. When that happens, we have invention and the approximately three million patents already issued by the United States Patent Office only represent a small percentage of the millions of ideas, many of them excellent, which have for one of a hundred reasons never had a final patent granted. It is from these sources and from simple American citizens that have come the greatest ideas which have helped make America great. For every Alexander Bell, every Fulton, every Kettering, every Orville Wright, who has received recognition, we know that there are thousands with equally great inventions and for various reasons too detailed to discuss, they haven't been heard from or recognized.

In peace, as in war, citizen lay inventors have made solid and substantial contributions to the national welfare, progress, and security. Proof of that is attested to by the fact that a National Inventors Council was established by a Presidential directive.

It may be curiously significant to the committee that the headquarters of the Coordinating Council of the Gadget Industry and other component members are located in California. For the record, I wish to point out this fact that 34 percent of all the patents issued by the United States Patent Office have been issued to residents of California. The explanation of that fact is that the invention industry has discovered that where there is a high rate of retired people in the area, there happens to be a correspondingly high ratio of invention. It appears that it takes a man almost a lifetime of experience and observation to be able to make things better, quicker, faster, and cheaper.

So much, gentlemen, for background of the invention industry. I hope I have established it in your minds, and now we come to the crux of the problem.

The President has declared an emergency. The National Production Authority have issued regulations, restriction orders, and directives. Steel, copper, aluminum, rubber, plating, nickel, chrome are all on the restricted or banned list. We find that the industry today faces virtual extinction unless we obtain relief. Imagine, if you will, a man with an idea. He gets a patent. He goes to a number of manufacturers and for any of a number of reasons, cannot get the item manufactured. However, he is a man of good judgment, a sound businessman. Maybe he has worked for someone for years, maybe he has retired. He feels his idea is sound. He takes his life savings, or he organizes a company and gets two or three partners or a dozen people interested. Investment may run from as little as two thousand to as high as seventy-five or one hundred thousand dollars. He begins to manufacture. Sometimes he does very well at first; sometimes it is a question of building slowly. Maybe he does the whole production job himself; maybe he has it subcontracted. And then comes the emergency. His subcontractors say they will do all they can for him and they give him only a few parts, or maybe they turn him down because they think they will get some defense orders, or maybe they are grateful to him because he has been a good customer, but they cannot help him very much because their supply of steel or aluminum is drastically reduced. What is this American to do? He has worked hard for the last 4 or 5 years to build his business. It has cost him thousands of dollars to break into the retail market. He has spent money on advertising and promotion, or sales efforts, and all of a sudden, he finds himself with little or no materials and he is stuck right halfway in the middle. Maybe the company has made money, but not enough money to amortize its tooling, its plates, its jigs, and its dies. Maybe they have just begun to show a profit. What are they supposed to do? Close down and go to work in a defense work? Or are they supposed to close up and, like an Arab, fold their tent and steal away. They have made money. They have paid their taxes. They have a set-up that has cost countless thousands, to say nothing of the blood, sweat, and tears that have gone into this business. If I were talking about 1 company, or 1 individual, or even 10 or 100, that would be a different story, but I am talking about thousands from coast to coast to whom these directives from Washington on drastic curtailments mean the end of everything just as though they were living in Russia or Argentina or some other dictator country. What are these people going to do? Gentlemen, they represent a real and very serious problem that I am sure, and I know that our representatives in Congress have too long overlooked. These people are too big and too many to be ignored and yet apparently, they are too small to be converted to defense activities, or at least that seems to be the impression they have received.

Every time a small group of Americans band themselves together to manufacture or sell a new item and they "go broke" because of circumstances beyond their control the personal loss and the individual loss is heartbreaking, but from where we stand we believe that the loss to the Nation is stunning and staggering because these little men, these little people, are the very backbone and the sinews of America. They are the living manifestation of free enterprise. It is from these people that tomorrow will come the General Motors and the General Electric and the other giants of industry. These giants of industry have helped make America great by their industrial production, by their employment to fellow citizens, by their tremendous tax payments. It is from these little people and these little corporations that come the additional pillars which keep this country great. Ignore them, break them, push them aside, and you have broken and forgotten and betrayed and repudiated every principle of American free enterprise. Don't you gentlemen realize that Henry Ford was just a little guy not many years ago, and there are a great many counterparts of Henry Ford here in our industry. As long as an American with an idea still thinks that he can become a millionaire, that's so long as free enterprise will have a deep-rooted, real, and personal meaning to every American working man and woman. In my humble opinion, that is the only American antidote for communism, because history has proved that the only time communism flourishes is when people are wage slaves and every hope for personal profit and personal progress has been dashed and is futile.

Those manufacturers who are larger and who have some equipment and who are in the position to convert to do some defense work are being beat down by the discouraging delays, the endless red tape. Not only that, but the larger organizations keep raiding our manufacturer's staffs by offering higher wages and more inducements.

Being "little people," we have no lobbies in Washington. We have no "ins" with the big boys, and we are too small for even the 5 percenters to be interested in us. Gentlemen, little people can be kicked around just so much. We can stomach just so much. Our patience can last just so much. And then we get mad. That time has now come for the invention industry, and my appearance before this committee today is proof positive that the time has come to quit "beefing" and try to get some consideration for our cause. All of us in our industry have worked too long and too hard, and we've got too much at stake to be put out of business with the stroke of a pen. We give no quarter, nor ask any quarter on our patriotism, but we just aren't going to sit still and see ourselves put out of business for the duration when nobody can tell us or seems to know how long that duration is going to be. If we've got to have a lobby in Washington, we'll get one. If we've got to do the things the way the big boys do it, we'll do it. True, we'll be fighting with pennies and not with dollars, but it is a question now, gentlemen, of survival. It is bread and butter that we want, not cake—just plain bread and butter, and I think you will agree that we've got a right to bread and butter.

Now what do we propose? What's the answer? What can you gentlemen do for us? Anything you do will be appreciated, but specifically we base our hopes upon this one major consideration. Allocate a percentage of materials earmarked exclusively for the development and manufacture on pilot-plant basis for new products. Let us have 10, 25, any percentage so that short of shooting war and an all-out state of emergency, the development and manufacture of new products can continue. Don't let our tools and dies and jigs rust. Let us have just enough material to keep going so when the crisis is over and peace comes again, the little man can still be there. We're not asking for any subsidies; we're not asking for any hand-outs; we're not asking for any grants; we're not asking for anything for nothing. Only for the right and the opportunity to make a living and to pay taxes so we can help in our own way. Let's not make American citizens displaced persons in their own country. Tomorrow always comes. Tomorrow always will come and it is for tomorrow that we all work and sacrifice. Gentlemen, if you could see the blueprints and the ideas that I have seen and that I see every day of my life, you would understand why we of the invention industry are making this plea for survival.

Our industry knows that while yesterday has been glorious and rich, tomorrow is even greater. We have no ceilings and we have many frontiers to pioneer. We want the opportunity and the promise and the tools to make a reality of the tomorrow that every American looks for, works for, fights for, and is willing to die for. Our industry is a real manifestation of free enterprise and our Nation's best barrier against communism.

The invention industry asks that the Congress of the United States give serious consideration to our plight and to enact such legislation or effect such remedial measures immediately so as to give the invention industry the opportunity to work for, serve, and help build a better America. Thank you.

Foreign and Domestic Policies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by me containing some comments on our foreign and domestic policies, delivered before the annual convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Department of New Mexico, at Hobbs, N. Mex., May 3, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR DENNIS CHAVEZ BEFORE THE ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS, DEPARTMENT OF NEW MEXICO, HELD AT HOBBS, N. MEX., MAY 3, 1951

SOME COMMENTS ON OUR FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC POLICIES

Recent experiences in the Far East have not been too reassuring as to the definiteness or certainty of our objectives. I will not comment on General MacArthur's being relieved of his command, except to say that in a Democratic State such as ours, the emphasis has always been on civilian control of the Armed Forces. Therefore, regardless of the merits of the case, the assertion of the preeminence of the civilian over the military must be definitely accepted. After all, it is one of the things that so distinguishes us from any of the military dictatorships we have seen rise and fall.

And yet, these differences should be debated in public so that our fellow citizens may know what is transpiring, what is causing the formulation of the policies that you have had to fight for, which others such as you are fighting for in Korea, and which still others will fight for in wars yet to come.

And here I pause to tell you that your organization and other veterans' organizations represent the backbone of America. By keeping before our fellow citizens the necessity of keeping America prepared for emergencies, you are educating our youth. You are directly representative of the American people, for you have demonstrated your patriotism by fighting overseas to protect the shores of our beloved land. If there is any place where no Communist or fellow travelers will be found, it is among groups such as this—a convention of Veterans of Foreign Wars of the State of New Mexico.

I am deeply complimented to have this opportunity of addressing you.

Our Korean adventure is not calculated to instill confidence in our Asiatic neighbors, neither as to our military prowess nor our lack of imperialistic designs. In the ultimate analysis Koreans are fighting Koreans and both the Chinese and ourselves must be regarded as intruders. We need but think of our own War Between the States and the assistance furnished by France and England to the Confederacy to appreciate the fact that only a bitter hatred and a deep resentment can result from this unfortunate intervention on a foreign soil so far distant from our own.

What do we seek to achieve by this foreign adventure? Are we permanently committed to fight the Chinese—all 500,000,000 of them, or as many of them as are Communists? And here let me pause a moment and analyze the significance of what is called communism as it pertains to China. To me it is a misnomer.

What is going on is a revolution of a poverty-stricken and starving people striving for a better way of life—in fact, for their very existence. Their hapless plight gives the Russian Communists the opportunity to exploit this human misery to their own selfish ends.

The ownership of the land is promised by the Communist Party in China.

If you will but realize that the vast majority of the Chinese are tenant farmers who are thoroughly squeezed and exploited by the absentee landlords, guerrilla bands, and war lords, you will understand the intense land hunger that permeates the vast mass of humanity concentrated in China, where floods and famines are regarded as blessings because they decimate the population.

There the theory of Malthus (in his essay on population) is carried into practice. This is his contention: That famines, wars, plagues, and pestilence were necessary afflictions, for otherwise all of humanity would suffer starvation. This he based on the fact that food supplies increases only by addition, whereas the population increases by multiplication. In other words, it is arithmetic progression versus geometric progression.

But what of the effect on us? The Chinese can afford to lose three for one of ours, and when the war is over they will still have many more people than we had at the outset. In the meantime the real enemy in the Kremlin has lost Koreans and Chinese but no Russians. What will we use as reserves should we be plunged in a war with the Soviet Union? Will we have any allies?

We will be far safer to count on ourselves alone and the people south of the Rio Grande, our neighbors who in the last war supplied us with men and so many essential materials of war.

The problem confronting the United States is to maintain satisfactory relations with its Latin-American neighbors and Canada. Long years of doubtful financial, commercial, and political dealings with us, the Colossus of the North, have left upon the Latin-American psychology an indelible imprint of suspicion and even cynicism with regard to any act or policy of ours, even though altruistic.

Beginning with the first Roosevelt to be President and his motto, "Walk softly and carry a big stick," and the imprudent ventures in the Dominican Republic, on down through the years of the development of the good-neighbor policy, the Latin-American people have had little reason to put away their fear and mistrust of us. But the strong efforts of President Franklin Roosevelt to adhere to the policy of nonintervention and to promote cultural understanding between all the peoples of the Americas have actually brought about a more sympathetic relationship.

With the attack upon the United States by Japan, and the subsequent extension of the war to Europe, popular opinion in Latin America, ever mindful of the struggle for liberation that occupied the Latin-American patriots in the early days of the last century, was substantially behind the United States as the champion of individual liberty, freedom of thought, and the right to pursue one's individual destiny with a minimum of governmental interference. Many of the Latin American Republic showed their profound sympathy for our stand by formal declarations of war upon the Axis Powers. Thus was established an identity of interest and a given purpose which brought our sister republics into a much closer bond than had ever been achieved before.

At the end of the Second World War, it seemed indeed, that the United States and Latin America were well on the way to translating the good-neighbor policy into an actual living friendship.

Somehow, however, our Government stumbled upon an unfortunate policy involving interference in the internal affairs of some of our more prominent Latin-American neighbors. Again, suspicion and distrust, doubts and fears beset our neighbors to the south. The good work of the previous decade was largely undone and again the atmosphere was permeated with hostility. Our unfortunate experiences in Argentina have borne bitter fruit and this at a time when we must rely on our neighbors—neighbors who share our hemisphere and who have similar problems, similar aims, and similar aspirations.

There is no blinking at the truth. Shorn of all hypocrisy, sugar-coating and double-talk, the real enemy is the Soviet Union and its evil genius, the Communist Party. Our quarrel is not with the Russian people, certainly not with the farmers or the workers who earn their living as you and I do by the sweat of their brow and their daily toil. Our quarrel is with those who seek to destroy us—those who would bore from within, who would undercut the ground we stand on, those who would foster disunity, promote dissension, make our people, class, race, and color conscious.

Our enemies are aware of the weaknesses that are inherent in our body politic. They strive also to prey upon the fear and distrust, and to exploit the suspicions of our neighbors to the south. They dwell upon these factors in their constant propaganda campaign, just as they incite the underprivileged and substandard humans to strive to improve their lot by force and violence (as at Bogotá) rather than by constitutional means. Their motto is: "Bullets, not ballots."

There has never been any doubt in my mind that our State Department officials have had the best of intentions, even when seeking to intervene in the internal affairs of Latin American and other countries. Nevertheless, however good these intentions may be our own history demonstrates that in our infancy we were quite indisposed to view such intervention with equanimity, nor would we brook it as we achieved maturity.

Our own Monroe Doctrine which had fallen into relative desuetude since our more recent European adventures, and more especially since the Korean incident, stated plainly to all and sundry that the Western Hemisphere was closed to monarchy and to colonization. And we made it plain that we wanted no part of Europe's many wars or the embroilments which follow in their wake.

Nonintervention in the internal affairs of our sister republics is a sine qua non—an absolute condition—to a sympathetic understanding between the northern and southern parts of our hemisphere.

Even though these good intentions have been proclaimed with obvious sincerity through the ages, it has been observed that all too often the altruistic ends and the avowed intent to help others are often but a thin disguise to exploit and use the resources of the state wherein the economic penetration is accomplished.

If we return to our own infancy, we may recall an episode wherein we were made the objects of a similar attempt by one Citizen Genet representing the newly created Republic of France. Upon arrival in the United States in 1793, Genet decided that the painstaking neutrality maintained by the Government of the United States as between the European belligerents was not in accord with the desires of the majority of the American people. Thereupon citizen Genet carried the issue to the people by a series of public speeches, meetings and assemblies. Our Government did not relish this type of internal intervention and promptly requested the recall of Genet. Upon his recall interference in matters of internal concern ceased abruptly.

Likewise, the United States has been quick to resent and in every way possible to prevent any European intervention in Latin-American affairs. Time and again we have taken action as was feasible and was practicable to maintain that territorial integrity and the political independence of our good neighbors.

The War Between the States was hardly over before our Secretary of State, William Seward, notified the French Government that its troops must be withdrawn from Mexico where they were maintaining Maximilian's empire at the point of the bayonet. In 1866 the last of the French troops departed, leaving the ill-advised emperor to face a firing squad at Queretaro.

When Great Britain and Venezuela had a dispute over a common boundary in 1895, President Cleveland, sensing that Britain intended to have recourse to force, announced that this matter should be decided by arbitration. He intimated quite plainly that if Britain used force, the United States would meet force with force.

The record of our protective efforts in Latin America reminds me somewhat of the man who assured the object of his affection that he would protect her against all comers. But when she asked him somewhat demurely, "And who will protect me from you?" he was at a loss for an answer. Actually, no one has protected the Latin-American countries from such intrusions as we consider necessary.

Dollar diplomacy has been so severely and so bitterly criticized that I hardly need dwell on it. One of the best examples is furnished by our immediate neighbor to the south—the Republic of Mexico. For years Mexico has been kept constantly aware of the existence and power of the great financial interests that could make or break a government; and after decades of living within the shadows of fear and economic want, Mexico now has a government representative of the people.

We have but two courses of action: (1) to be good neighbors in our deeds as well as by our words, and to impress upon our friends of the south our sincerity and earnestness of purpose; or (2) we can revert to the policy of intimidation and become again the colossus with the big stick, the policeman of the Americas. No compromise between these two policies appears possible.

Should we fall back into the latter role, we can be the self-appointed guardian of the peace. We can be a twentieth century suzerain surveying our feudal domain to the south, acting as overlord in settling the disputes of our vassals, by the sheer power and force of our economic and military strength. Thus, we will make and unmake governments, create or destroy prosperity, raise or lower the standard of living, establish and disestablish alliances among the various Latin-American Republics at will, and cast the votes of all of these Republics en bloc, in the councils of the United Nations and other world assemblies.

But there is another aspect. A determination to browbeat the Latin-American Republics will afford fuel for the sparks of communism that already exist south of the Rio Grande. That, coupled with the economic want, the submarginal standard of living which the majority of the people face daily, provide a fertile basis for Communist propaganda. Communists are quick to seize upon these misfortunes; and how are these people to know that the Communist promises of plenty, of total employment, of complete economic security, will never be fulfilled? If we do nothing to help these people, they may well try communism, for what have they to lose?

The billions we are spending in Europe and in the Far East will probably inure to the advantage of the Soviet Union, having as it does the tremendous advantage of geographic proximity. So we build an industrial potential and Russia will probably reap the industrial harvest and use our own machines in the endeavor to destroy us. Would it not be far preferable and infinitely more productive to invest in our good neighbors by raising their standard of living and thus to forestall the Communist promises by actual achievement? Why not make these human beings thankful that they are living under the principles of democracy and that they yearn not for a foreign ideology and a Communist Party line—a totalitarian state.

By developing the resources of Latin America, we are also improving our own economic conditions. Since the Latin-American countries are potentially our best customers, it is to our advantage to assist them to achieve a higher standard of living. The higher the standard the greater the demand for our goods and, therefore, the more profitable the trade. By supplying us with raw materials, which we need, these countries can establish credits which will pay for the manufactured goods exported to Latin America and required for the achievement of a higher standard of living.

With the Latin-American peoples on an economic par with Canada, then our neighbors south of the border would constitute an impressive market which would act as a stabilizing factor on our own economy and aid in preventing the recurrent depressions or economic crises which have been the bane of our people. Furthermore, with this economic development to strengthen them, they would constitute a far more powerful factor in world affairs.

Certainly we should promote a standard of living in Latin America comparable to that now existing in Canada.

By investing our money in the resources of Latin America, we will be creating an industrial reservoir of productive enterprise and of essential raw materials, which will be essential when the war with Russia comes. We will be taking advantage of our geographic proximity, and at the same time, by raising the standard of living prevent the spread of the Communist influence.

On the other hand, years of work will be undone and again the United States will be hated and feared throughout the Americas if the policy of imperialism prevails in place of genuine cooperation by our equals in the society of nations, we will only have a superficial, albeit obsequious subservience of our vassal states.

The pages of history furnish us with a parallel, an illustration worthy of note. During the Napoleonic era, of the grand army of France consisting of 600,000, only 60,000 French marched out of Russia. Where were the rest? Dead or deserted. As soon as it was apparent that victory would not attend the French armies, the Allies departed like the snow under the torrid rays of the noonday sun.

Have we any reason to believe that our Latin-American allies, united to us by fear, would react otherwise? Imperialism does not beget loyalty.

But if we adhere to our good-neighbor policy, we may make sacrifices and we may be called on for financial aid and we may not even be able to persuade our southern neighbors to accept our concepts of democracy, but over the years, we may build a strong and lasting friendship which may serve us well in our hour of need. Remember, a friend in need is a friend, indeed.

Furthermore, our Government will inevitably be subjected to pressure by financial and commercial interests adversely affected by the ever-growing and expanding economic nationalism of Latin America. The temptation will be strong to intervene just a little, or just this once, but intervention marks the end of the neighborly feeling.

Following a century and a quarter of confusion in its Latin-American policy, it is high time for the United States to decide upon a definite and continuing policy toward its sister republics of the hemisphere.

We must accept the fact that these are nations in a world community, entitled to equal treatment before the law. Pursuant to the convention in Montevideo in 1933, we must follow the doctrine that no nation has the right to intervene in the internal or external affairs of another.

Unless our good faith is shown in pursuing this policy, we cannot hope to count on the assistance of the Latin-American republics in our hour of danger, an hour which may be far closer and far more dangerous than my fellow countrymen care to believe.

Steel Mills Turn to Canada for Ore but Not to the Much-Touted Labrador-Quebec Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the following article taken from the New York Times, January 21, 1951, reveals that our steel mills are turning to Canada for ore but it is not to the much-touted Labrador-Quebec project.

Every Member of Congress should read the following article because it explodes the arguments of the advocates of the St. Lawrence seaway that the Labrador-Quebec project as a source of ore is indispensable:

STEEL MILLS TURN TO CANADA FOR ORE—BETHLEHEM, YOUNGSTOWN SHEET, INTERLAKE CORP. TO EXPLORE STEEP ROCK PROPERTIES

(By Thomas E. Mullaney)

In their quest for new sources of iron ore to replace the fast-dwindling prime deposits of the Mesabi Range in Minnesota, heretofore the supplier of about 85 percent of the ore consumed in this country, several leading American iron and steel companies are now manifesting great interest in the properties of Steep Rock Iron Mines, Ltd., in southwestern Ontario, Canada.

Last week Pickands, Mather & Co., a Cleveland management concern, announced that it was negotiating with Steep Rock for an agreement to explore and for a leasing option on 1,000 acres of its vast properties in behalf of Bethlehem Steel Corp., Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co., Interlake Iron Corp., and the Steel Co. of Canada, Ltd.

More than a year ago Inland Steel Co., of Chicago executed a similar agreement with Steep Rock covering another large tract on which it has already conducted some test drilling.

Inland Steel said it is too early yet to tell whether the properties will prove high in ore content. Since there is still some water above the indicated ore body in the Inland area, the company does its testing in winter when the water is frozen and expects to conduct its drilling operations over three winters.

However, Cyrus Eaton, Cleveland industrialist and chairman of the Steep Rock board, stated recently that the "Steep Rock reserves of high quality iron ore now are known to exceed those of any other range, old or new, on the continent."

Some ore has already come from the properties, but the volume is said to be only a fraction compared with the area's potentialities. The company, formed in 1939, uncovered its ore by draining off the 150-foot-deep Steep Rock Lake, about 140 miles from Port Arthur on Lake Superior. During the last shipping season, its sixth, the company mined about 1,215,000 tons of ore, said to be of very high quality.

Enthusiastic engineers have estimated that at least 1,000,000,000 tons of excellent quality hematite ore will eventually be proved on the Steep Rock properties, now divided into three large ore bodies. They believe annual production could soon be stepped up to 10,000,000 tons.

If this Canadian mine is as rich as its operators believe, it could become an important supplier of various Midwest steel mills, since it would require only a 140-mile railroad haul to available Great Lakes shipping facilities.

Republican Responsibility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRVING M. IVES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of an address on Republican responsibility, delivered by me last Thursday evening in New York City.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS ENTITLED "REPUBLICAN RESPONSIBILITY," BY UNITED STATES SENATOR IRVING M. IVES AT THE THIRD ANNUAL DINNER OF THE NEW YORK REPUBLICAN STATE COMMITTEE, MAY 10, 1951, WALDORF-ASTORIA HOTEL, NEW YORK CITY

"If the Republican Party will put duty to our country above party politics, I am sure the Republican Party will have the support of the people in the next election."

This is not my statement. It refers to the election of 1952. It comes from a woman who was born, brought up, and educated in the South, and who has an unusually pronounced Democrat Party background; her great-grandfather served in the Congress of the United States. Her statement is typical of many pronouncements I have been receiving in recent months from disillusioned Democrats and angry independents.

Sometimes, in a supreme desire to capitalize on the weaknesses, the incompetence, and the general rottenness, which pervade the Truman administration, we fail to recognize that there is a vast group of independent voters among the American electorate, who are looking anxiously to the Republican Party for something more than criticism and condemnation of the New Deal. The temptation to follow the line of least resistance is always strong.

Five percenters and deep freezers and Harry Vaughan; mink coats and the RFC scandals; red herrings and Alger Hiss and Dean Acheson; the President's inexcusably abominable treatment of General MacArthur—these are symbolic of an administration which has lost the confidence of the American people. They are evidences of Pendergastism saturating Washington. They provide an illusion of alluring political issues.

But millions of American citizens do not have to be convinced that these deplorable symbols of an administration, which has been derelict in its duty and has betrayed the trust imposed in it by the electorate, are a tragic reality. For many months the newspapers and the radio and television have portrayed vividly the sad estate to which the character of our National Government has sunk.

Millions of Americans have lost confidence in their Government. Among many of them there has been such a growing cynicism toward government itself that they no longer have faith in any of us who hold public office.

Merely to emphasize nowadays the failures and shortcomings of the party in power in Washington can only increase the cynicism and spread the growing lack of confidence in government. It can only aggravate a serious condition and trend which, unless soon reversed, may lead to the eventual disintegration of our American form of constitutional, representative government and to the decadence of our American society.

If I understand the American people, they are no longer in a state of mind to be lured by glittering promises and phony panaceas and the glib talk of demagogues. What they demand now is a political party and political leadership that are honest and forthright and possess common sense and realism.

The American people are fed up with the subsidies and with the extravagance and inefficiency which are part and parcel of the present National Government. As taxpayers they are revolting at the waste of money and manpower in our Federal establishment. As taxpayers and patriots they are willing to contribute whatever may be necessary to the adequate defense of our country and for the effective operation of governmental functions which the intricacies of modern-day society have forced upon us.

But as taxpayers the American people are demanding a dollar's return for every dollar spent. They are demanding that nondefense expenditures be cut to the bone and that every governmental service that is not truly essential to the welfare of the country be eliminated. They are demanding that there be frugality in defense expenditures, including expenditures for the armed services, just as far as the justifiable requirements of our preparedness program will permit.

In short, the American people demand, as well as deserve, a government which is honest and efficient. And they demand a major political party which will put these virtues into practice without turning to reaction in doing so. This is where the Republican Party has its greatest opportunity and faces its greatest challenge since 1860.

We Republicans, solely on the basis of the Truman record, can and should win in 1952. But we can afford to win in 1952 and the country can afford to have us win in 1952 only if subsequently our administration is to show a radical improvement over that which is now in power. Without such improvement victory for us would mean the end of the Republican Party and perhaps the destruction of the two-party system in the United States.

What we need in Washington is an administration possessing the vital qualities I have enumerated. What we need in Washington is an administration which will place the welfare of our country above politics and partisanship. What we need in Washington is an administration with vision and courage and integrity, such as are displayed in the great administration of Gov. Thomas E. Dewey in our own State of New York.

We Republicans know that our great party has met these tests of character and capacity in the past. We know that we can meet these tests again. We know that, meeting these tests, not only shall we be victorious in 1952 but our victory will be complete and the performance of our Republican administration will restore the faith of the American people in their Government.

It remains for us Republicans and Republicans everywhere who are active in politics to do the job that can and must be done for the sake of our party, and most of all, for the sake of our country.

Tribute to the Late Senator Vandenberg

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARGARET CHASE SMITH
OF MAINE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg was a great man. He showed his greatness in many ways. It is said that one trait of greatness is the ability to change one's opinions and views and to admit such changes. If that is a trait of greatness, then surely it was a mark of statesmanship on the part of Arthur Vandenberg, for he shed his deep isolationism to become the foremost architect of our bipartisan foreign policy.

I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article I recently wrote about Senator VANDENBERG.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Waterville (Maine) Morning Sentinel, April 25, 1951]

WASHINGTON AND YOU

(By United States Senator MARGARET CHASE SMITH)

WASHINGTON, D. C.—I shall always remember Senator Arthur Vandenberg. He was an outstanding statesman, a colleague, and a Republican whose views on foreign policy, I shared. But, more, I shall remember him because he was a good friend in whom I could place full confidence in judgment and in telling me the truth.

I vividly recall the day I was sworn into the Senate. Senator Vandenberg as the retiring President pro tempore of the Senate swore me in. His very first act after he relinquished the post to Senator MCKELLAR, the Democrats having taken over control of the Eighty-first Congress, was to walk directly to my seat in the Senate Chamber and offer his personal congratulations to me and welcome me into the "club."

Another occasion stands out in my mind. The Senate was voting on the military assistance program to Europe, a measure designed to send materials, equipment, and technical assistance to the member nations of the North Atlantic Pact. The legislation was to implement the North Atlantic Treaty and to start building real forces-in-being to back up the mutual defense provisions of the pact.

I had some reservations about the bill because the Members of the Senate who were not on the Foreign Relations Committee or the Armed Services Committee had not been fully informed on the world conditions that prompted the legislation. I went to Senator Vandenberg and told him of my reaction. In response he gave me a full briefing on the facts that had not been revealed outside the two committees. His briefing left no question in my mind as to the necessity for the legislation. I remarked that it was a shame that the Senate legislated so much in secrecy. He agreed.

Those of us who sat beside and talked with Senator Vandenberg during his last few months in Washington knew of the pain that he was enduring. We knew not because of what he said, because he never complained, but rather because of what we could read in his face and the way in which he walked to his seat. He could not conceal the strain.

He was silently carrying not only his own physical pain but the sadness of seeing his wife pass away last June. But his grief over his wife and his pain did not deter him. He saw the North Atlantic Treaty ratified and the military assistance program passed before he gave in to the doctors. He carried a tumor in his left lung for over a year before submitting to surgery. He just didn't have time to take care of himself. He couldn't take out time from his consecrated service to his country, to his people, and to the peace of the world.

We have often heard national leaders called war casualties in as full a sense of the word as soldiers who died on the battlefield.

Senator Arthur Vandenberg was a casualty of peace—not war—as he literally gave his life to his country on the floor of the United States Senate. To those who condemned him fuzzy-minded internationalist, I suggest that they now pause and ask themselves if they have done as much for their country and for peace as Arthur Vandenberg and if they are willing to give their lives as he did.

Television: How Can the Public Interest Best Be Served?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject Television: How Can the Public Interest Best Be Served? delivered by me at the opening session of the Twenty-first Institute for Education by Radio-Television, May 3, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TELEVISION: HOW CAN THE PUBLIC INTEREST BEST BE SERVED?

(Following is the text of the address delivered by Senator BENTON at the opening session of the Twenty-first Institute for Education by Radio-Television, May 3, 1951. Although the institute met in Columbus, Ohio, Senator BENTON spoke by closed-circuit wire from New York, where he stopped en route from Washington to New London, Conn., on his way to represent the Senate at the annual visitation day at thet U. S. Coast Guard Academy.)

Mr. Chairman and my friends in educational broadcasting, I want to congratulate Keith Tyler on the steady growth of this institute, which is almost as old as radio, and yet as young as television. I'm grateful to Keith for letting me talk to you out of a loudspeaker—though possibly you won't be—instead of face to face. I would be in Columbus tonight were it not that tomorrow is the annual Day of Visitation when I must represent the United States Senate at the Coast Guard Academy in New London, Conn.

I interrupted my journey from Washington to New London to tell you that today you can be one of the most important groups in the United States. Except for those who are responsible for the formulation of our foreign policy, I don't know any group which could have a greater impact on our country's future. You are tonight poised on the threshold of a great new mansion for the human mind. I want to encourage you to cross it boldly.

I don't need to tell this institute about the power of television, or about its potentialities for education. That would be carrying coals to Columbus—or perhaps I should say, carrying coaxial cables. I wish Congress understood it as well as you do.

The figures are startling—indeed, terrifying: TV receivers up from 7,000 on VJ-day to over 11,000,000 today; that total likely to be doubled in the next 5 years. The number of stations potentially multiplying tenfold by 1956. One hundred million man-hours a day—and woman-hours and boy-and-girl-hours—already devoted to the TV screen. Reading slumping in TV homes. A survey in Stamford, not far from where I live, showing that children spend as much time watching television as they spend in school.

For most of us, a single revealing experience often gives us greater insight than a deluge of figures and syllogisms. I had such an experience with radio in the spring of 1929 in Chicago. I had thought I knew something about radio. I had used radio in behalf of Palmolive and other advertising clients. Then one warm evening, as I walked home from work, I heard the full Amos 'n Andy program through open windows, as I paced block after block through the near north side. It was before the Hooper ratings, so I made my own rating: 13 homes out of 17 tuned to Amos 'n Andy. That was a revelation. I spent the next 8 years doing something about it, for my own profit and the profit of my clients.

My television revelation didn't come until March of this year—until Senator KEFAUVER'S committee hearings were televised.

As chairman of an educational-film company, Encyclopedia Britannica Films, I had, of course, been keeping a watchful eye on television's rise. But the full realization of what television might do as a servant of society came only with KEFAUVER. For me—and, indeed, for most Americans—the television age can henceforward be divided into two eras—BK and AK—before and after KEFAUVER.

Not long after those hearings closed, I was dining in Washington with Paul Hoffman and Robert Hutchins, of the Ford Foundation. We agreed that the greatest finding of the KEFAUVER committee was not that they exposed crime but that they revealed television. Out of that discussion came my decision to call for an immediate Senate study of the role the Federal Government ought to play in developing what Professor Siepmann calls this explosive new instrument—this instrument which can transform and uplift human relations.

Technically, the problem is a single problem. It is the theme of this year's institute: How Can the Public Interest Best Be Served? I shall discuss it in two major parts. Let me first discuss education's own TV stations.

In March the Federal Communications Commission made tentative channel allocations for 209 educational stations. These allocations represented about 17 percent of the hitherto unassigned VHF channels, and somewhat less than 10 percent of the more speculative UHF channels. It took both enlightenment and courage on the part of the FCC to make these educational assignments. The pressures on that agency are immense. But I want particularly to congratulate those of you in Columbus tonight, who, with no prospect of reward other than the satisfaction of doing an important job, banded together to make education's case before the FCC—those who took part in "operation education."

Many educators feel they didn't get all the channels they will need, and I'm not at all sure they asked for enough. In my State, for example, there is only one educational reservation—that one in the ultra-high-frequency range—assigned to Storrs, the seat of the University of Connecticut. I'm told that five of the eight counties in Connecticut will be unable to get the signal from that station, if the station materializes, and that not all parts of the other three counties will get it. Similarly our neighbor, Massachusetts—Massachusetts which is nearly as famous as Connecticut for its educational achievements—has only one educational reservation. We won't be able to elevate the level of Massachusetts, and they can't try to elevate us. New Jersey, the home of Princeton and Rutgers, has no educational reservations. There isn't going to be much ivy on those new transmitters.

Education is slow to adopt innovations. There's no profit-prod toward moving fast. Professor Thorndike once showed that 20 to 30 years elapse between the introduction of a new idea in education and its widespread adoption. Indeed, it has taken us a hundred years to reach our present percentage of secondary school enrollment. This time we aren't going to have a hundred years, or even 30 years. We must start now—this year—this month.

Two taunts are hurled today at the hopeful television educators. One is, "Look what happened to education's AM radio frequencies. Most of them were abandoned." The other is, "Where is the money coming from?"

I do not accept the analogy between radio and TV. Television isn't just a cousin of radio. It is sui generis—a new species. And it is uniquely adapted to education. It adds sight and motion to sound, but it does more than that. As John Crosby points out, television has five times the impact of radio—I believe he used the word "wallop"—but it also requires five times the attention. Attention is indispensable to education. Television can demand it, and grip it as radio never could.

And where is the money coming from? Here I must declare my faith in the American people. They believe in education. They have fought for it. They spend perhaps $5,000,000,000 a year for it today. Once they have been shown the power of educational television, I cannot believe they will deny it to themselves or to their children.

We can all of us be heartened by the fact that in the past several months three foundations have made grants for educational radio and television totaling over a million dollars. This, of course, is "seed-money."

Several State legislatures already have before them appropriation requests in support of educational TV stations. There will be more, as you here make your voices heard. And should not Congress now consider the idea of providing matching grants-in-aid for educational stations, since the national interest is so deeply involved?

I have myself been deeply interested in the idea of subscription radio and subscription television. This idea has tremendous promise, across the whole range of broadcasting. It could provide, within the American concept of broadcasting, an alternative to and a competitor with the system of exclusive reliance on advertising revenue. Whether the subscription technique could be developed as one means of financing educational stations I do not know. It is a possibility eminently worth exploring. One of my former associates at the University of Chicago has advanced the novel idea that colleges and universities might finance their TV stations by televising their football games on a subscription basis. That is a remarkable suggestion to emerge from the University of Chicago, where the football stadium has been converted into an atom laboratory. Imagine football profits being used to finance education rather than baseball, swimming, or track.

Let me turn now from education's own efforts in television to the second major issue: the educational and public service programing done by commercial stations. We don't have to dwell on the depressing history of radio. Let us look not at radio's past but at television's present. One of the most telling exhibits the educators presented to the FCC in January, in making their case for educational stations, was the monitoring study on New York's seven TV stations, covering 1 week earlier that month, made by Professors Horton and Smythe. They found that only 4 percent of the week's programs were what they called informational; of these only one was identified as a genuinely instructional program. As for the evening hours between 7 and 11, they found—and I like this language—that a "clear majority of the time was devoted to entertainment progroms with relatively low or perhaps negative survival value for the individual viewer or for society." Fifty-five percent of this evening time was devoted to wild West drama, crime, drama, sports, quizzes, stunts, and contests.

Professor Seipmann has written—foreboding ly—"We may now be witnessing a peak in television's service to a variety of tastes." I suggest that he get together and compare notes with Professors Smythe and Horton. I have great admiration for the creative talent of commercial broadcasters. But I fear that this talent may be channelled, in television as in radio, into a limited number of stereotyped but salable program formats. And I ask, are there any steps which the people of the United States, acting through the Congress, might now take to divert at least a fraction of that talent into the development of genuinely educational programs carried by the commercial system? Should the Congress now lay out clearer guide lines for the Federal Communications Commission? Can we afford to waste as much time and talent on trivia in television as we have in radio? Can we lay down new guide lines without limiting essential freedom? I pose these questions as worthy of the highest consideration by Congress in terms of the challenge of the television age.

I have framed my Senate resolution so that it invites study by the Senate of such specific issues as the following among others:

1. Should the Communications Act of 1934, which was drawn for radio and not for television, now be amended to spell out the meaning of the phrase, "public interest, convenience, and necessity," particularly with respect to education?

2. Under such a clarification should the act require licensees to devote a portion of their best hours to education?

3. Should the act require, rather than merely authorize, the FCC not to renew the licenses of those who fail to live up to the promises in their applications?

4. Should Congress create an education division within the FCC, or perhaps a national commission advisory to the FCC, to strengthen the hands of that agency and help it gage the educational promises and performance of licensees?

The FCC already has broad powers. But, in view of the pressures it must cope with daily, it cannot be expected to exercise those powers vigorously in behalf of education without renewed support and guidance by the Congress, whose instrumentality it is. The issues are too big, too important, to be left wholly in the hands of a single agency, no matter how competent it may be.

My message to this institute tonight is this: You here have taken the first step—the first of many steps—toward the realization of television's great educational mission. The leadership in the next step—and the next step after that—must continue to come from you. There is no one else who can give it. Only you—as you are inspired by what you are already doing—only you can lead. That means you must learn to be publicists, and promoters, and politicians, as well as educators. It means you must go to work on your trustees, and your school boards, on your State legislatures and your Congress. I and many others can and will help. I wish you would write me your views; or better yet, write to your own Senators, or to the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. But it is you who must lead.

Israel's Struggle: A World Example

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject Israel's Struggle: A World Example, delivered by me at a luncheon meeting of Hadassah, New Mexico Chapter, at Albuquerque, N. Mex., on May 6, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ISRAEL'S STRUGGLE: A WORLD EXAMPLE

(By Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ)

Before expressing myself on the subject for today's discussion, I should like to make a comment as your Senator about the work of Hadassah in relation to my work in Washington.

I am particularly and keenly aware of the work of your membership acting on its responsibilities as American citizens. It so happens that one of my major assignments in Washington concerns all matters relating to social-security and public-health appropriations. I have found Hadassah in the forefront supporting the extension of social-security benefits and in working for a public-health program. Your membership certainly did a great deal to obtain the passage of the Displaced Persons Act, and I, for one, am most grateful that your membership has always been alert and informed on all civil-rights legislation. Had other groups shown the same intelligent militancy as did Hadassah, back in the Seventy-ninth Congress, we would have had more liberal legislation and poll taxing and lynching would be violations of Federal statutes today.

It is important that Hadassah, no matter how demanding and absorbing the Israel problem is, never diminishes its ardent work in behalf of a better America. You are unique in the fact that you pursue this dual program of activity, and there is no group to take your place in either arena.

Volumes of statistics have been compiled to tell the astonishing progress of Israel in the past few years. Every fact and figure has been marshaled to show how much is being done, but I feel that all of these facts and figures fail to tell the real story. The engineering, the finance, the trade and housing, and agriculture don't explain what has happened nor why. The key to Israel's success—and it is a success—is the human element.

For 80 generations the children of Israel wandered in exile. For 80 generations the yearning and the hope refused to be extinguished. And for 80 generations these wanderers kept alive their quest for their homeland. The great urge to return and reclaim their country was not religious alone—it was a national urge, and it maintained itself in an organized, determined fashion. The orthodoxy of the Hebrew community was not only a way of worshiping God; it was also a discipline to retain political solidarity and preserve the identity of the Hebrew in exile. Always there were certain institutions and practices which were retained and resurrected wherever these people happened to wander.

In the long historic quest you ladies of Hadassah represent the final effort in a great chain of events which helped bring about the Israeli Republic of today. I feel that your work, particularly in the educational and welfare field, in the teaching of children and the support of hospitals, has been right in line with the effort which began 80 generations ago. The fact that you have acted as interpreter and bridge between the Zionist pioneers and the people of America has been your unique and special contribution. I feel that you richly deserve the rewards of being a contemporary of Israel, and I too am proud to have been able to help, in a small measure, to assist in that birth.

I say this to you as fellow Americans—members of a common team who battled for a free Israel for similar reasons. I do not believe in hyphenated Americans. On the other hand I do not believe in Americans without heritage. Every American has been able to claim a heritage, and point to the land of his ancestors. This has been the secret of the melting pot.

But the Jewish-American, rich though his heritage may be, was never able to point to one homeland, as could the Irish, Italian, Spanish, Chinese, and Slav. The Jew faced an international problem, he was identified with trouble, and his children were raised with a feeling of insecurity, that of being in some way identified with a pariah. And then, exactly 3 years ago next week, on the 14th of May 1948 came the declaration of a free Israel, and the Jews in this country and every other part of the world were no longer related to a problem, they were related to a land.

I feel that the establishment of a free Israel Republic was essential for several reasons:

First, it was absolutely necessary to solve the problem of world antisemitism. As long as there were Jews who were persecuted and degraded under law as Jews, it was essential that they have their own geographic homeland.

Second, it was essential for those of the Jewish faith, but who were personally and politically identified with the lands where they lived, such as the Jews of France, Brazil, and America, to be able to indicate that they are Americans, or Frenchmen, or Brazilians, not in exile but as a matter of clear choice. The relation of such Jews to Israel was something to be regarded with sentiment and mutual respect but not as a political or territorial relationship;

Third, there were the displaced persons, whose physical existence and mental health could only be succored by the immediate securing of a home—not a refuge, not a haven—but a permanent home where they could live in dignity.

Fourth, the world needed an example, a powerful and revealing demonstration in human relations. This Israel is giving us today.

Much has been said about what Israel means to the Jews. I shall discuss what Israel means to the world.

Israel is an example which we Americans must observe closely. There are lessons to be learned.

It is my prediction that the genius and energy of Israel will set the pattern for the development of backward and impoverished areas the world over. Israel is our pilot plant.

Since the establishment of the sovereign state of Israel, a scant 150 weeks ago, some three-quarters of a million people have been returned to the homeland, doubling the population. In Israel the land under cultivation has increased by 50 percent. Industry has increased by 40 percent. In 3 years over 18,000 new housing units and 20 agricultural settlements have been set up. Israel inaugurated an airline engaged in internal and international operations. Merchant ships flying the White Star of David are seen in all parts of the world. Israelis will soon be traveling around their country on domestically made motorcycles. The men will be shaving with home-produced razor blades. New methods of refrigeration, radio manufacturing, and even an iron lung will shortly carry the words "Made in Israel."

And to make the difficult task touch on the impossible, all this has taken place while Israel has been in a state of semisiege, surrounded as she is by hostile neighbors.

In this unprecedented development we have the perfect pattern for our own point 4 program. If Israel can go through a 30-years' development in 3, why can't a similar program be undertaken in other lands? I understand that a great deal of interest is being shown by Puerto Rico in Israel's development, since the problems of the two countries are not dissimilar.

Incidentally, the wife of the Governor of Puerto Rico, Senora Marin, is an honorary member of the Hadassah in San Juan.

We have heard Israel's development belittled because it depends on capital and equipment from other countries. If we try to concentrate the development of centuries into 3 years, then it is necessary that enough capital to finance the development be imported to make up for the fact that no new nation in all of history ever had savings to draw on.

The United States of America was a debtor country until 1914. It financed its development by borrowing. This is a simple principle of common sense, which applies to all walks of life. The Israelis are ready to lift themselves by their own bootstraps. The only thing that they ask us to do is to lend them the bootstraps.

For this reason, I wish every success to the half-billion-dollar-bond drive which the Israel Government launched in the United States on May 1. These bonds are an important investment from an international point of view, for on them will depend the strength of democracy's beachhead in the Middle East. It is obvious that a free, strong and prosperous Israel is the greatest bulwark we can have against communism in that most strategic area of the world.

In the great battle of today, the lines are drawn between the "haves" and "have-nots." Unless the free world finds a dynamic way of lifting the world from feudalism, the Communist will surely march forward, carried on the wave of their false ideology. This is why Israel's struggle is so important to us. If, there, in the land where the prophets once walked, a bulwark of democracy can be constructed, the cause of freedom and civilization will be furthered.

That this will be, I have no doubt.

The new Republic proclaimed to the world that the "State of Israel will be open to immigration of Jews from all the countries of their dispersion; will promote the development of the country for the benefit of all the inhabitants; will be based upon the principles of liberty, justice and peace; will uphold the social and political equality of all its citizens without distinction of religion, race or sex; will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience and culture; will safeguard the holy places of all religions and will loyally uphold the principles of the United Nations charter."

These principles can never perish.

Far Eastern Strategy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IRVING M. IVES
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of a letter entitled "Path to Victory," written to the editor of the Cornell Sun by a freshman at Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y.

I call this letter to the attention of Senators because of the great force of the truth and common sense which it contains.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PATH TO VICTORY

After reading the editorial in Friday's Sun on General MacArthur, I think it is time something sensible was said about his far-eastern strategy. Why do I think so? First, let me assure you that it is not because I follow the Republican Party. It is because, like every other American my age, I may find myself in Korea some day soon. And when I do, I don't want to be fighting the one-sided war that's being fought today.

I don't want to be fighting an enemy that is free at any time to step over an imaginary barrier into the untouchable zone of safety north of the thirty-eighth parallel. I don't want to sit there knowing that our supposed allies, especially Britain and France, are freely trading with our enemies, supplying them with the means and sinews of war while Washington kowtows to their wishes. I don't want to fight knowing that enemy factories and installations just to the north cannot even be looked at, and that the thousands of Nationalist Chinese troops ready to open a badly needed second front are unable to do so. Nor does enacting these policies mean total war as Mr. Truman claims, but rather a speedier and more decisive end to the present war.

The very fact that our casualties in Korea have been greater than they were during the first 14 months of World War II proves that this war is a real one, and not at all limited. Also while one rarely hears of any of our planes being shot down in Korea, we have nevertheless lost more planes to enemy fire in this so-called police action than we lost in a similar period at the start of World War II. And while everyone, even the Truman-Acheson contingent, would like to see the end of this war, I do not think it is in sight as long as our enemies receive aid from our allies while we erect neither an economic nor a naval blockade. I do not think an end is possible while our enemy is able to rain his hordes upon us unhindered by a second front undertaken by the Chinese Nationalists. Nor is it possible while our enemy remains invisible behind the thirty-eighth parallel.

There are only three alternatives open to us. The first is to remain in Korea, fighting as we are today. The second is to withdraw entirely. The third is to follow the advice of the world's foremost expert on far-eastern affairs, General MacArthur. To stay in Korea means to continue fighting an extremely costly war, with America obviously holding the short end of the stick. To withdraw is to leave the aggressor victorious. The path to victory lies in the adoption of MacArthur's four-point policy.

The United States Coast Guard Academy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I spent Friday, May 4, in New London, Conn., at the Coast Guard Academy on the official visitation day for Congress, as a representative of the United States Senate.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD copy of my letter to Secretary John Snyder expressing the appreciation of Representatives MCGUIRE, MORANO, and myself of the hospitality accorded us. It also contains some suggestions for review of academic policy affecting the Academy. A copy of this letter has been sent to General Marshall, because the same suggestions apply to the Military and Naval Academies.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY,
May 10, 1951.

The Honorable JOHN SNYDER,
Secretary of the Treasury,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JOHN: Last Friday I spent the day at the Coast Guard Academy in New London. This was official visitation day for the group selected by the Congress. I attended representing the Senate and Congressmen JOHN MCGUIRE and ALBERT MORANO attended representing the House of Representatives.

We had a most interesting day. Indeed I cannot remember a day that was personally more interesting to me since I entered the Senate. The three of us join in telling you what a creditable institution we feel the Coast Guard Academy to be, and what a great credit and asset it is to our State of Connecticut. Admiral Arthur B. Hall, Superintendent of the Academy, together with Captain Roland and other members of his staff in New London, gave us a warm welcome. The cadets put on a great show. Indeed, for me the day could be called a "dream day" of a retired private—a private of World War I—the dream day comes true in middle life, with the admirals in attendance and a parade in his honor.

This letter is to convey to you and your associates the appreciation of Congressmen MCGUIRE, MORANO, and myself, and our congratulations.

Speaking personally, and as a trustee of one of America's great universities, and one of America's leading colleges, I have the following comments which I have transmitted orally to Admiral Hall. I was not able to discuss these views with Congressman MCGUIRE and Congressman MORANO. These comments come out of my long and deep interest in education. Perhaps you know that I served for 9 years as a part time officer of the University of Chicago, which is 50 percent longer than I served as an officer of the advertising firm I founded in New York with Chester Bowles.

The service academies and notably West Point, are widely criticized among informed academic people for their low scholastic standards. They are accused of grevious inbreeding and of scholastic standards far, far below the college standards with which they ought to be compared.

I have no first-hand knowledge of the standards of the Coast Guard Academy, in comparison let me say with the California Institute of Technology or MIT—as technical schools—or with nearby Williams or Wesleyan in the fields of liberal arts. But at a glance I question whether the faculty is not overloaded with officers who are not trained as teachers, and whether the staff is not deficient in the number of teachers who have received the best available advance instruction at the leading universities of the country.

I personally would recommend that a special consulting committee of educators be set up to consult with the Academy on the improvement of its academic standards. With the deepening crisis, and the increasing need for the most highly trained technical personnel in the Coast Guard, as well as in every branch of military service, I would, of course, like to see the question of academic standards reviewed—not only for the Coast Guard Academy—but for West Point and Annapolis as well. This subject is a matter of highest national import. I am consequently sending a copy of this letter to General Marshall so that, through his aides, my suggestion may be reviewed, and, I hope, applied to the Military and Naval Academies.

May I also suggest that this would be an excellent time to review the methods and procedures of selection of the boys who apply for the Academy? One of the young men who is graduating, with whom I had lunch, told me that of his entering class of 150 only 57 were graduating. Later Captain Roland told me that over the years the average percentage of graduates, in contrast to the number entering, ran about 48 percent.

Captain Roland says that something like 10 percent of the entering class drop out in the first 90 days. I would gather that perhaps as many as 33⅓ percent are dropped out by the authorities because they fail to measure up to the high standards maintained by the Academy. Most of these failures seem to come in the second year, after considerable cost to the Academy and the taxpayers, and many failures are students who quit trying because they don't want to continue.

It is a costly as well as interesting fact that over half of the young men who are selected either discover that they do not like the service, and do not want to adjust themselves to the rigorous discipline and the life, or else are unable to do so.

Now, the 150 boys who entered the present graduating class of 57, were chosen from a group of applicants numbering 700. Yet for the coming year, when I understand that 200 are to be chosen, the applicants number almost 10 times as many—over 6,000. Surely when 200 boys are to be selected out of a group as large as 6,000—there must be techniques for selection which could increase, if not immediately, at least gradually over the years, as better and better te hniques evolve—which could increase the percentage of young men who prove satisfactory and who finish their 4-year course and then carve out their careers in the Coast Guard, careers in the Coast Guard, careers with which they are happy and of which they are proud.

At the University of Chicago and elsewhere many scholars have devoted their lives to the development of criteria for the selection of young men showing aptitude and promise for varying kinds of activities in adult life. I know that much is known about this by the armed services, and undoubtedly by the personnel division of the Coast Guard. I now suggest that this is an excellent time once more to review the matter. Surely there never was such an opportunity as now, with young men of great talent and promise eagerly seeking entance to our three Academies—in far greater numbers than ever before.

Again expressing the appreciation of Congressman McGuire, Congressman Morano, and myself for the splendid reception and hospitality shown us at the Coast Guard Academy, I am

Very sincerely yours,

William Benton,
United States Senate.

Public-Opinion Poll, First Congressional District, West Virginia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT L. RAMSAY

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, during the latter part of March, I conducted a public-opinion poll in the First Congressional District. When I was considering such a poll, I had my staff discuss technique and methods with officials of the Bureau of the Census, whom I consider very expert in sampling. We are all familiar with the accuracy with which the Bureau is able to predict population and retail sales trends through its periodic samplings.

I want to emphasize, however, that the discussions with Bureau officials were strictly informal. I merely sought guidance. I believe procedure recommended was followed to the letter. The poll, however, is my own.

Twenty-six hundred questionnaires were mailed out; one to each sixtieth name appearing on the voting list. Thus the sampling was confined to bona fide adult residents of the district. We made a special check, using Hancock County as a guinea pig, and found that by selecting every sixtieth name from each precinct list, we achieved the proper balance between Democrats and Republicans, according to the ratios in effect prior to last fall's election.

The response to the poll was excellent; far better than we expected. We had about 1 percent of the questionnaires returned by the postal service as not deliverable or forwardable. We enclosed self-addressed return envelopes to facilitate replies. We achieved approximately a three-fourths return.

Of the returns coming in, about three-fourths contained comment. This comment was extremely interesting and it varied. At one extreme was a blank questionnaire, upon which had been inscribed: "Anything you do is all right with me." At the other extreme was the comment: "If Francis Love had been elected everything would be all right."

Mr. Love, a former Member of the House in the Eightieth Congress, was my Republican opponent last fall.

Mr. Speaker, I am including the results of my poll as a part of these remarks. I hope my colleagues find these results as interesting and enlightening as I did. I called attention to early returns on universal military training and drafting of 18-year-olds when the military manpower bill was under consideration in the House last month. It will be noted that the trend has remained unchanged, now that we have completed final tabulations.

I am listing the results of the poll in terms of percentages, since I believe the value of such a poll is in establishing a trend, and for this purpose percentages are superior to mere enumeration.

Some of the trends require a word or two of explanation. For instance question 2 (B) shows 35 percent no comment. Many of those who answered question 2 (A), "Do you favor the drafting of 18-year-olds?" did not answer the question relating to draft of veterans and fathers. Since many constituents indicated either a "yes" or "no" to both, when an answer was not indicated for either, we tabulated it under "no opinion."

The vote on sending troops to Europe also requires explanation. On the questionnaire it is listed as "Send troops to Europe without congressional consent." A number of voters indicated "yes" but scratched "out," so the proposition would read "Send troops to Europe with congressional consent." Such answers were tabulated as "no" answers since I wanted to determine not only the thinking relative to sending troops to Europe, but also relative to the issue of congressional consent.

Actually, then, considerably more than 67 percent of the voters of the congressional district favor sending troops to Europe, but only 67 percent agree that congressional consent is either not required, under the constitution, or not advisable.

Question 7: "Do you favor a national health plan, under which the Federal Government would aid in building hospitals and educating an increased number of doctors" found favor with 57 percent of the voters of the First Congressional District. Admittedly, it was a question on only two phases of the administration's health program. The proposal for national health insurance was purposely omitted. This proposal was a major issue in my campaign for reelection. The Republican opposition, as well as segments of the medical profession, and some pharmacists hit—and hit hard—my support for national health insurance. I met the issue head-on; spoke in its favor on several occasions, and answered the last-minute, desperate arguments by newspaper advertising and radio broadcasts. I was reelected. Therefore, I feel that I know the trend on national health insurance. The other two phases were sidetracked during the campaign, and I took this opportunity to canvass sentiment.

Question 10: "Do you favor the use of the atomic bomb against the Chinese Communists?" Fifty-three percent of the voters say "Yes" and 38 percent say "No." This bare tabulation, however, is not a complete picture. About half those answering "Yes," qualified their answer with a notation "if absolutely necessary," or "if the military say so." On the other hand, about the same proportion of the "No" answers were also qualified, "unless absolutely necessary" or "unless the military say so." Some of the "if's" and "unlesses" left the decision up to General MacArthur.

I believe, therefore, that the true picture of thinking in the First Congressional District, is to use the atomic bomb against the Chinese Communists only as a last resort.

The question of repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act was added only to determine if there had been any change of opinion since the November elections as a result of the two stoppage of work in the railroad industry. Repeal of the Taft-Hartley was a part of my campaign platform in 1948 and 1950. This poll shows that the majority in the first district remain opposed to this law.

Mr. Speaker, this sampling of opinion is a new venture for me. Like my colleagues who have conducted polls in the past, I find it a refreshing experience. It met with favor. While tablulation of the individual comments was impossible, a very great many were prefaced with praise for the project as democracy in action. With the success of this effort, I intend to conduct other samplings as grave and important issues are presented. I feel, too, that the technique of using the voting lists presents a true cross section, with the sampling getting the proper ratio as to political affiliation, occupation, and economic status.

Regulation of Migratory Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ
OF NEW MEXICO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "CHAVEZ' Pounding Improves Senate Bill of Regulating Migratory Labor," by Thomas L. Stokes, published on May 9, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAVEZ' POUNDING IMPROVES SENATE'S BILL OF REGULATING MIGRATORY LABOR

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

WASHINGTON, May 9.—The Senate has made a start toward coping with a recently widely publicized human problem directly affecting the South, Southwest, and West, but also spreading its harmful effects into our whole economy since a cancerous condition in any area ramifies ultimately to others.

This is the problem of migratory farm labor, consisting of importees, legally and illegally coming in from Mexico, and native agricultural workers—"stoop labor"—who year after year follow the crops northward from the South with the seasons. These wanderers were portrayed graphically several years ago, in depression times, in "Grapes of Wrath," by John Steinbeck, who showed how they were exploited. They still are—Mexican and American.

The problem still exists. It is not solved by the bill sponsored by Senator ELLENDER, Democrat, Louisiana, and passed this week in the Upper House. That measure regularizes the traffic in farm workers; it does not tackle the underlying human, social, and economic evils involved, and is not the satisfactory answer.

However, it is much better than the original Ellender bill. That is due chiefly to Senator CHAVEZ, Democrat, New Mexico, who pounded away ceaselessly and got inserted some provisions from his more comprehensive measure drafted along lines recommended by the President's commission on migratory labor and against opposition of powerful big agricultural interests of his State. He had the assistance of a group, including Senators DOUGLAS, Democrat, Illinois; HUMPHREY, Democrat, Minnesota; and LEHMAN, Democrat, New York.

HOUSE BILL PENDS

The fight now moves to the House where there is pending before the Rules Committee, for the go-ahead signal for House action, a measure sponsored by Representative POAGE (Democrat, Texas), similar to the original Ellender bill. Any attempt to broaden it into a really effective measure will be stoutly resisted by the powerful southern bloc in the House which, like its counterpart in the Senate, is solicitous of big farming interests which utilize this labor and want it as cheap as possible.

The bill has been labeled the wetback bill, a handy designation because it seeks, among other aims, to stop illegal entry of Mexican farm workers who figuratively swim the Rio Grande. The bill gets at this problem by tightening enforcement machinery and imposing penalties on farmers who use illegal entrants. The penalty provisions, not included in the original Ellender bill though in a separate measure of his now before the Judiciary Committee, were added at the instance of Senator DOUGLAS.

The wetback tag is somewhat unfortunate. For the problem goes far beyond that. The competition of Mexican labor, both illegal and legal—the latter brought in under regulations—affects thousands and thousands of native farm workers. Because of the low-wage standard for the Mexican labor competitors, they roam far beyond their homes and travel to the North for months at a time to get better wages paid there.

AIMS OF CHAVEZ

It was the objective of the President's Commission, embodied in the Chavez bill, to provide means to study the whole problem, find out labor needs, determine how far they could be met by local native labor, reduce importations where possible, and stabilize employment by decent pay that would keep labor in its own home area. Another aim, too, would be to improve conditions, sometimes ghastly, under which some of the Mexican immigrants live. For these purposes Senator CHAVEZ proposed a national farm labor board, which, however, was rejected by the Senate.

The southern bloc was defeated in an effort to have labor recruitment under control of State directors—a State's right project obviously favoring local interests with large political influence. Instead it was put under the Secretary of Labor here in Washington. The Southerners, however, did succeed in restricting reception centers to the border and under such cost allowances as to favor southern farmers. Senator CORDON (Republican, Oregon) was defeated in an effort to provide reception centers in other areas to facilitate movement of labor to meet their needs.

The bill is limited to Mexican labor. Attempts failed to apply the standards prescribed to imported labor from other countries in the Western Hemisphere, now arranged by diplomatic agreements.

Contribution of the Farm Credit Administration to Land Tenure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject Contribution of the Farm Credit Administration to Land Tenure, by I. W. Duggan, Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, United States Department of Agriculture, at Tuskegee Institute, Alabama, on January 15, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONTRIBUTION OF THE FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION TO LAND TENURE

(By I. W. Duggan)

I think that it is well that you are, this week, taking a critical look at land tenure in the Southern States. The problems of land tenure are nothing new. In fact, they are of very long standing. I would like to quote from a paper I prepared in 1939. The title happens to be "Cotton, Land, and People: A Statement of the Problem." In fact, I stated the problem rather than trying to answer it.

"Probably one of the most discussed problems in the South is the high rate of farm tenancy. It seems to me, however, that the South's system of tenure, or cropping system, and the credit system have grown up together and are so closely entwined that it is difficult to deal with any one of these problems separately.

"Sharecropping dates back to the War Between the States and is an outgrowth of the conditions following the emancipation of the slaves. The planter had possession of the land, tools, and in many cases, equipment, but no money with which to employ labor. The laborer had no money with which to acquire land, tools, or equipment, or to finance his operations, and was unskilled in any occupation except agriculture. Out of this situation grew the sharecropper-tenant system as we have it today. The need for credit to finance crops made it essential that crops be grown for which there was a ready cash market. Cotton was a natural answer to the cash crop problem.

"The high rate of farm tenancy in the South is too well known to you to require much discussion. It will be sufficient to remind you that 60 percent of all the farmers in the 10 States are tenants or sharecroppers. The percentages range from 47 in North Carolina to 70 in Mississippi. Despite the heavy Negro farm population, there are 40 percent more white than Negro tenants in the South. Tenancy has shown a steady increase, even during the relatively prosperous years of the twenties. In the State of Oklahoma, for example, which started about 60 years ago as free land to all who would homestead it, we find today that 61 percent of the farmers are tenants. On the average, about 40 percent of the tenants in the South move every year, and over half move every 2 years.

"The credit system of the South with high interest rates has contributed to the tenancy problem. However, providing lower-interest credit alone will not solve this problem. If the income from the farm is not sufficient to pay back the principal, a low-interest rate in itself would not bring about farm ownership. The press of a dense farm population for land tends to lead to the overcapitalization of land values and retards operator ownership."

In dealing with land tenure in the Southern States, one of the first problems we must face is the question of a dense farm population pressing against limited resources. There just is not enough total farm income in the South to support its dense farm population. The average per capita earnings of rural people is unbelievably small. "There is no hope of correcting these ills through the redistribution of the available income, because that income is so small and so inadequate that even if it were redistributed there still would not be enough to go around. The first problem is to increase the total income going to the South so there will be more to divide among its dense farm population." Progress has been and is being made.

However, the cropland per capita of farm population in the South is far too small. In that same paper, back in 1939, I pointed out that in 5 of the 10 States, there were only about 6 acres of cropland per person on farms. The cropland was only about 80–85 percent as productive as the United States average. With that problem it is very difficult to move into a solution of the others.

While improving, the opportunities for farm people to find employment in industry are far too limited. Most of the South does not have industry or the opportunity for off-the-farm employment in proportion to the population equal to other areas. It is important to solve the off-the-farm employment problem in order to increase farm ownership. Two out three farm families who have gotten to own their land or farms have gotten some part of the money from savings they made from off-the-farm jobs. The problem that has to be recognized by this group and brought to the attention of the leaders in your community and State is the importance of having industries developed. And we can develop many industries in the South and raise the standard of living in the South without hurting any other area of the country because there is an opportunity to increase consumption of goods right here in the South if we can get production and distribution of all types.

We also have to recognize that farms change hands every generation. We find in farm credit that a large percentage of the original land-bank borrowers are not the ones who finally pay off the long-term-mortgage loans. This is because the farm frequently goes into other hands during the period of a 34-year-mortgage loan.

Our American family size farm is the cornerstone of democracy; in fact, of the free-enterprise system. It is on the family owned farm that our people develop initiative, self-reliance, and independence. Their habits of work have helped us immeasurably in the battle of production on the farm and in our factories as well. Their self-reliance developed on the farm has been important on the battlefield where our soldiers, sailors, and marines are having to fight so hard. As you know we are fighting a cold, and at times a hot war, to defend the right of individual ownership. The individual family farm is the mudsill of our democracy. If it rots, so does democracy. If we lose the mudsill—if it rots into communism or any other ism—then we lose democracy.

It is becoming, in some ways, much more difficult for young people to acquire farm ownership. To be economic units that will raise the standard of living, farms have to be larger. We are going into mechanization. It is well that we are making progress now throughout the South in increasing the size and efficiency of our farms. It is well that we are doing it more rapidly during the time when we have opportunities in industry for full employment. The increasing mechanization and increasing size of farms require larger capital investments. The average age at which farmers acquire ownership of farms is older than it was a few years ago even when there are mortgages on the farms. It takes much longer even with a few high-income years to accumulate adequate funds with which to make a big down payment.

In New York State a study was made of a group of farms in 1907, 1917, 1927, 1937, and 1947. The study started with approximately 200 farms and ended with about 70. The acres operated had gone from 132 to 191 acres; the number of cows from 11 up to 25. The study showed that the capital per family-size farm required in 1907 for land, buildings, livestock, and equipment $6,365. In 1947 the capital was $23,141. That's four times as much capital required in 1947 as in 1907. The study also showed that receipts from these farms had gone up nine time from $1,495 per farm to $12,722. Receipts have gone up faster than capital investment. Expenses for farms have gone up from $657 to $9,243—14 times. Yes; farming today is a bigger business and more profitable. Farming has always been a gamble and stakes are higher than they ever were 10 or 40 years ago. Money can be made faster on a farm today, and a farmer can lose his shirt faster. If these farmers lost their cash operating expenses every year, they could go 9.7 years in 1907 before they would lose all of their capital investment; in 1917, 7 years; in 1927, 5 years; in 1937, 4.1 years; and in 1947, 2.5 years. Total cash operating expenses are more important today in proportion to total investment than they have ever been. Higher operating costs have changed our whole credit picture for farm real estate. In 1907 if a man owned his farm debt free, he could get what little money he needed for operating expenses by borrowing against his land. A man may own his farm debt-free today and in 2½ years lose it by losing his cash operating expenses. This raises serious problems with respect to land tenure.

We are developing another period of land inflation. There is pressure from groups of people to buy farms around cities. Workers want to get away from the city to do part-time farming to supplement their incomes or lower their cost of living. And they're buying poor land at inflated prices. Then there's the group of people who'd like to get away from the congested cities to enjoy life, etc. They're buying the better farms at inflated prices. Another group wants to get away from the possibility of being bombed out. They're moving out of the cities and also buying the better farms at inflated prices. Then we have the group of people who have accumulated some funds and want to invest in real estate. They're interested in buying land for an investment. I was at Auburn sometime during last winter. The secretary of the farm loan association there reported that he'd had more inquiries from people wanting to buy land than he had had at any time since he has been secretary of the association. There were very few wanting to borrow money—most of them wanted to buy land as investment. As a result, we have land prices going up. In 1920 the index based on the 1912–14 average land values reached a postwar peak and was 177. It was 179 in November 1950.

Inflation and high prices increase the pressure on farmers to raise cotton. Farmers in the South didn't go into cotton originally because they necessarily wanted to. They had to have a cash crop in the beginning. Then with the dense farm population, more productive hours could be put on cotton, tobacco, and truck crops. To keep that population even partially employed they had to produce cotton. With livestock there would have to be larger units and fewer people on farms. It is a problem for other people, as well as agricultural people, to find off-the-farm employment for people who cannot be used on the farm efficiently. We don't want any able-bodied group condemned to a subsistence type of livelihood.

Looking back to farm credit and what we can do, I think you are more or less familiar with it. Farm Credit is composed of farmer-owned cooperative credit units and Government-owned institutions which are serving the cooperative institutions. We have the Federal land-bank system—the oldest unit in the Farm Credit system. There are roughly 13,000 farmers in Alabama who have Federal land-bank loans. Since its organization in 1916, 44,000 farmers in the State have borrowed from the land bank. Today there are 300,000 farmers in the entire United States who are using this system. This is not as many as there could be because many farmers now get credit from other sources such as commercial banks, insurance companies and individuals who almost or actually quit lending during the early 1930's and have now come back pretty heavily into the mortgage lending field.

The 12 land banks and the 1,200 national farm loan associations are wholly owned by farmers. There is not a penny of Government capital now in any of the land banks. All the Government capital has been repaid. It shows that farmers can manage and operate their own credit systems and make a success of them. All we do in Washington is to examine and supervise the land banks and farm loan associations. Our work is somewhat comparable to the work of the Comptroller of the Currency in supervising and examining national banks. The land bank system, of course, sets the pace in making 20- to 34-year loans, on normal agricultural values rather than speculative values. During the depression land bank loans frequently were higher than the actual market prices at that time. In fact in many cases there wasn't a market price. These loans were based on normal agricultural values. Loans are still based on normal agricultural values on the assumption that a loan which is not good for the bank is not good for the borrower; that a loan which is good for the borrower is good for the bank.

There's a field of work for the Farmers Home Administration for farmers who need a Government subsidy because they cannot or haven't reached the stage where they are able to use cooperative credit or other types of commercial credit. In many cases they do not have a large enough down payment to bring the loan down to 65 percent of the normal agricultural value which is the maximum the land banks can loan.

The history of the land banks and farm loan associations has demonstrated that these credit cooperatives are workable; that farmers can work them, manage them, operate them, and capitalize them. The land banks have $260,000,000 of capital and reserves. At the low ratio of 1 to 10 the associations could lend $2,600,000,000 without having to go back to the Government for additional capital. They are in good financial condition and are able to serve the farmers' needs if land prices can be kept from getting too high. So much for the land bank system.

Now for the production credit system. With 7,200 borrowers in Alabama last year, which is between 3 and 4 percent of the farmers in the State, $13,000,000 in loans were made by eight production credit associations in the State. I am sure you are familiar with this type of production loan. The farmer works out a budget at the beginning of the year in which he asks for the money as he needs it during the year and agrees to repay it as he sells his crops or livestock products. He pays interest on the loan only for the time he is actually using the money which is, on the average, about 6 months. He does not have to pay interest on money which he does not use. On the average, farmers get about four advances and make about four repayments a year on production credit loans. There is about $18,000,000 of Government capital now invested in the PCA's, compared to over $90,000,000 at the peak. So they are rapidly becoming farmer owned, cooperative credit institutions.

The funds production credit associations and the land banks lend are not Government funds at all. The funds they lend are gotten through the sale of bonds and debentures to investors by the intermediate credit banks and the land banks. These bonds and debentures are not guaranteed by the Government. If the issuing banks can't pay them off, the Government has no liability. These banks have always been able to get favorable rates—not as high as the best corporations pay, but not as low as the Government gets its money. Every farmer who gets a loan in Alabama is affected by the interest rates paid by the intermediate credit banks and the land banks.

Sound credit and low interest rates are not enough in themselves to increase farm ownership in the South. They are important and necessary and I think we should have them, but alone they are not going to insure farm ownership of family-size farms. When we have established a definition for an efficient, economic family-size farm, we'll have a better objective in farm credit. If a lender helps a man get located on an uneconomical farm unit, he is going to have to lower the living standards of himself and his family. Then when it comes to the time of recession he'll be disillusioned and the lender will not have done him a service. We must not overlook the fact, however, that the desire for farm ownership must be strong enough so that farm families are willing to cooperate in every way possible to achieve their goal. This cooperation calls for hard work on the part of every member of the family. It frequently means sacrificing the standard of living until the family has built up a farm business and paid off its debts. The need for that spirit of family cooperation holds true just as much today as it ever did, and it will continue to do so in the future. The women probably contribute more to the farm than the men. They are willing to sacrifice and contribute to the productivity of the farm.

Local, State, and Federal agencies can set the rules of the game and help make sure farm credit is available, but in a free democracy none of these agencies can give anyone a farm. The right to own property is the keystone of our democracy and of the free-enterprise system. So long as we have courts to protect this right, we shall always be a free and a great people. That's because the Government guarantees protection of the right to own property. Without this protection the strong and the cunning could take property away from the weak, and they would do it. This key to our democracy was not easily attained and we are not going to give it up easily. Our American family farm has grown and prospered from it. Our democratic system of free enterprise which made this possible is what our Nation is now called upon to defend and to protect.

Norway Gets Its (Home) Guard Up

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. THYE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Norway Gets Its (Home) Guard Up," written by Nat S. Finney, of the Minneapolis Star editorial-page staff, and published in the Minneapolis Star of recent date. It is an excellent report on the country of Norway. We have often heard the question asked: "Will the countries of Western Europe defend themselves?" The article affords a good answer to that question.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORWAY GETS ITS (HOME) GUARD UP

(By Nat S. Finney)

OSLO, NORWAY.—Norway has memories that burn, but none burns more painfully than the memory of what happened to the proud old Hansa city of Bergen on April 9, 1940.

On that day 1,500 German soldiers sneaked into Bergen from the sea and took a city of 165,000—a city that, if you go back far enough, had a Viking tradition of winning its fights.

It is difficult for a visitor from America, a country unfamiliar with the bitter taste of defeat, much less the ignominy of occupation, to grasp the tight-lipped resolve of a strong people who have failed themselves as Norwegians did at Bergen.

But sitting across a plain table at the Oslo home guard barracks from Col. Mons Haukeland, commander of the guard, you get the idea that Norway will fight another invader with the guile of a fox and the spirit of a hedgehog.

A discussion with Colonel Haukeland about the guard leads to the conclusion that Norway has learned how to make this northern country the thorniest rose a conqueror might try to pluck. If the Muscovite tries it he can expect to lose a few fingers in the attempt.

The guard, Colonel Haukeland quickly makes it clear, must not be confused with Norway's regular military forces. Norway has agreed to raise four divisions, to train them along American lines, and to have them ready under General Eisenhower's command. These and other units—sea, air, and land—are the regulars. They are drafted men.

Ranks of the guard—soon it will number 160,000—are filled by volunteers for what amounts to lifetime service.

A man or woman can enlist at 17 or 18 in his or her own community, and serves indefinitely. In quiet times resignation will be considered on 3 months' notice; now the notice time is 1 year. Resignations aren't accepted if the service requires any man who asks to be released.

Experience with enlistments to date is that everyone wants to get in and none wants to get out. The problem is to find more equipment to expand, not more volunteers.

But the differences, not the similarities, between Norway's guard and that of other countries make the organization striking. In many ways Norway has borrowed from the experience of guerrilla, underground, and paramilitary forces; and some of the security features of the guard make it seem a political organization.

For instance, members of the Norway guar have personal custody and care of their weapons and other equipment. They are responsible for showing up at secret assembly points within 3 hours, armed, provisioned for 3 days, and ready to move at once.

Colonel Haukeland says with a quiet smile that, so far, weapons have been excellently cared for.

Leaders of the guard have been selected mainly from men and women who served in the wartime underground, and whose reliability and guts are well known both to their neighbors, whom they command, and to the central government. Getting into the guard is a good deal like getting into a choosy private club—you don't make it unless your homefolk know and trust you.

Even so, nothing is written down about where stores of ammunition, heavy weapons, communications posts, etc., are cached; nor is the chain of command for emergencies known to more than a few in each guard area.

Home guard leaders have had experience with gestapo operations, and have no intention of letting their organization be penetrated and betrayed.

Guard members are free to suggest and criticize; they are in fact encouraged to do so by a system of awards for ideas that reaches to the bottom of the ranks.

The home guard is carefully nurturing an offensive spirit. (The word defense is in disrepute.) Exercises and training emphasize the quick, daring thrust at the enemy, and indoctrination preaches the futility of light infantry accepting pitched battles with regular forces and the virtues of chewing an enemy's flanks.

Very few bets have been overlooked by Norway where resisting an invader is involved. This country, where communications are difficult, is a "ham" radio operator's paradise, and some 90 percent of the amateur radio men are communications men in the home guard.

Colonel Haukeland is bothered because his guard is not trained and equipped with weapons that could handle light tanks—which he sagely figures is all an enemy could get ashore over what jetties his groups would leave an enemy.

He'd be a happier man if he had a few hundred superbazookas squirrelled away in Norway mountains, and four dozen batteries of new recoilless rifles cached away where they might do the most good.

But even as things stand Colonel Haukeland is confident Bergen will never fall again to a handful of invaders. He has a home guard outfit in that area—he prefers not to say how many—who'd make things rough for anyone who dared attempt its capture.

How Come, Comrades?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "How Come, Comrades?" published in the Washington Evening Star of May 13, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW COME, COMRADES?

Several Russian diplomats and their families have set out for home aboard the liner America without large part of the baggage they had planned to sail with. The baggage—which some capitalistic longshoremen refused to handle—has been put in a New York warehouse at the request of the Soviet Embassy. It consists of 17 big crates filled with television sets, washing machines, refrigerators, and similar hallmarks of our decadent, bourgeois, imperialistic, warmongering, worker-enslaved nation—a nation which the Moscow propagandists depict as a place where nothing is manufactured except guns and chewing gum and where millions and millions of people are unemployed and downtrodden and barely managing to exist while a few bloated billionaires get richer and richer.

How come, comrades? How come those diplomats wanted to sail away with that kind of baggage? Is not the Soviet Utopia supposed to be the land of peace and plenty, the land where there is no rearmament and where production is concentrated on the task of increasing the happiness, comfort, and living standards of everybody? Why therefore should a Russian have to buy a television set in America? Or a washing machine? Or a refrigerator? Is not there an abundance of such things in the stores of Moscow, or Minsk, Pinsk, Omsk, Tomsk, and Bomsk? A word of explanation, please. What is the meaning of this luggage incident?

Yes, indeed, comrades, how come? Anything to say, Pravda? Got an answer, Izvestia? A lot of us over here pause for reply.

The Washington Scene

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL CUNNINGHAM
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial by Mr. Arthur I. Boreman, publisher, Des Moines, Iowa:

[From the Merchants Trade Journal, May 1951]

THE PUBLISHER'S PAGE

(By Arthur I. Boreman)

During recent months I have made a thorough study of statistical and historical data, and other information regarding Russia's ability or inability to successfully engage in a prolonged, highly mechanized war. I think the information that follows will give you the answer. Because of its importance, I am devoting the entire space to this one subject.

Stalin, himself, explodes State Department and U. N.'s major argument for present appeasement policy of fear and defeatism. Known facts completely refute the claim of the U. N., State Department and Defense Department and White House, that bombing bases in Manchuria, blockade of China, use of Chinese Nationalists and aerial reconnaissance would risk direct intervention by Russia and world war III.

We are told that Europe is Stalin's major objective and our major defense objective. Here are known facts that simply cannot be disputed. Russia flatly and repeatedly refused to declare war (or join in the war) against Japan until Germany was defeated. Stalin said Hitler (and others he named) had made the fatal mistake of battle on two fronts. Stalin repeatedly stated he would never be dumb enough to risk involvement on two fronts. In spite of the fact that his two powerful allies (United States and Britain) were obviously winning the war. Is Red China any such powerful ally? Would Russia risk two-front involvement by direct intervention in Manchuria or China? In spite of any so-called pledge of aid has Stalin hesitated to violate and repudiate solemn written agreements? Anyway, doesn't that pledge of aid apply only to attack by Japan, etc.?

In view of those facts, doesn't it seem as though the U. N., State Department, Defense Department, and the White House should either give to Congress and the public evidence that contradicts and outweighs those known facts, or recognize those facts and accept MacArthur's advice as to what should be done in Korea?

1. It is a known fact that those countries closest to Russia have the least fear of Russia or a major war.

2. Tito: Tito has not only defied, but actually ridiculed Stalin and the Politburo. He has gotten away with it. Russia could easily have taken over that country. Russia did not strike.

3. Oil: No prolonged mechanized war can be successful without oil (and gasoline) and lots of it. Russia controls less than 20 percent of the world's oil supply. The United States and Great Britain control 80 to 90 percent of the world's oil supply. Russia's oil fields that were destroyed in World War II have not yet been completely restored to prewar production. Our available oil supplies have been greatly increased. The Middle East oil fields could and would be quickly destroyed if Russia made a move to get them.

4. Steel: About the same situation exists in steel as in oil. We can expand our steel production immeasurably faster than Russia.

5. Satellites: Russia cannot trust her satellite countries. These satellites would turn on her and tear her apart once the tide turned against her and Russia's rulers know this. Already, sabotage, resistance, and revolt are widespread in satellite countries. In East Germany, for example, five new blast furnaces were started. All of them are now closed down. Obviously sabotage. Miners stage slow-downs. Farmers hide grain and livestock. There is resistance to Russia in every satellite.

6. Internal unrest: No major war can succeed without unity and safety at home. Russian police are completely disarmed when they go off duty. When Stalin reviews the troops, all ammunition is removed from the guns. No member of the Politburo dares go unprotected.

7. Navy: Russia has practically no navy and could not fuel her submarines for very long without control of a much greater oil supply than she has now.

8. Air power: Russia has a lot of fighter planes and they are very good. Here again shortage of oil and steel would be a serious handicap and Russia's rulers know that regardless of the number of planes she may have, she could not successfully wage a prolonged major, mechanized war. Russia has comparatively few long-range bombing planes. She is immeasurably weaker than we are with reference to strategic bombing. This indicates that she has no intention of risking world war III or our atomic-bombing attacks.

9. Soldiers: Russian soldiers fight well on their home soil, but not well away from home. Remember how long it took them to whip little Finland?

10. Autos and trucks: Without our trucks, tanks, etc., Russia would have had great difficulty stopping the Germans. Our productive capacity so greatly exceeds hers that there just isn't any comparison.

11. Geography: Individual initiative, cohesion, coordination, cooperation, and unity are vital factors in a major war—especially one of aggression and away from the home land. What we call Russia is a conglomeration of various parts of Europe and Asia. A many-languaged federation of states with 180 languages and dialects in daily use. There is very little intercommunication or traffic between the different communities and their different traditions, customs, etc., are a terrific handicap in the event of all-out war. A strong country is one welded together with a common language, common customs, and habits. Most of Russia lies north of 45 north latitude. It is a confirmable, historical fact that little wealth or progress is ever made in agriculture or industry that far north. Twenty-three percent of Russia's land is in the Arctic Circle. Her southern border faces mountain ranges and high land which prevent tropical, moisture-laden winds from reaching her soil. Russia's eastern border lies on the Pacific Ocean. Westerly moisture-laden winds blow away and not onto her soil there. Her western border faces open country, but too far from the Atlantic Ocean to receive great benefit from westerly moisture-laden winds. The fact that her western border is so vulnerable to land attack explains her huge land army and emphasis on fighter planes for tactical rather than strategic use. All of this explains why less than 25 percent of Russia's land is arable in the first place and only 25 percent of that arable land can be successfully cultivated and made productive. All of this has a powerful bearing on her ability to successfully wage a long mechanized war away from home and her rulers are certainly well aware of the fact.

12. Research and invention: In all her history, I have been unable to find a single important scientific invention ever to come out of Russia.

13. Greece: We gave heavy military aid to Greece. Russia could have occupied Greece any time she wished. Why did she not intervene? Wasn't the most logical reason for no intervention her fear of world war III and our A-bombs?

14. Berlin airlift: When Russia slapped her blockade on in the hope of driving us out of Berlin, we established our airlift, yet Russia did not dare shoot down those airlift planes or take any action in connection therewith that might involve her in world war III.

15. In spite of Russia's alleged common defense pact with Red China, I am unable to find a scintilla of evidence to support the fear that bombing Manchurian bases would bring one iota more help than she will give Red China without such bombing. On the contrary, Russia has repeatedly broken written pledges, and evidence clearly indicates Russia will not risk any chance of world war III (and our A-bombs) if we bomb those Manchurian bases.

16. All evidence seems to indicate that the Kremlin will continue to use satellites to wear down our manpower and materials; to weaken us economically, if possible. (Long ago Lenin said, "Whoever controls Asia controls the world.") Evidence mounts showing Asia, not Europe, to be Stalin's major objective. President Truman, unintentionally, confirmed this.

17. There seems to be a fear that Russia may make a sneak atomic bombing attack on our cities. The evidence presented here clearly indicates the Kremlin will not do any such thing.

18. It seems obvious Britain doesn't care how many Americans must be killed or maimed so long as her trade with the Reds is not affected.

From the evidence presented here (and much additional available information), it seems clear to me (I believe you will agree) that—

(a) Stalin is pulling the most colossal bluff in world history.

(b) The Kremlin will continue to use satellites to bleed us until their bluff is recognized and called.

(c) Bombing bases in Manchuria will not bring any more Kremlin aid to Red China than they will give anyway and that the Kremlin will not risk world war III and our A-bombs by direct intervention.

(d) Russia is in much greater fear of world war III (and our A-bombs) than even the appeasers in the State Department and/or the Pentagon.

(e) Russia would not intervene if Chinese Nationalists were told to go ahead; if China is blockaded.

(f) The United States can safely act alone without the U. N. approval.

(g) That Asia, not Europe, is the Kremlin's major objective.

What action should be taken now? To me (and I believe you will agree) this and other available evidence clearly indicates that the war in Korea can be quickly ended with unconditional surrender of the present Peiping regime; a complete new Republic of China can be created—a potentially powerful and friendly ally. That this would make world war III impossible.

Here's how it might be done. Fortunately, we now have the most competent, conscientious, patriotic, courageous, and bipartisan Congress in my memory. Otherwise we might be in an even more dangerous position.

It is my belief that—

1. Congress should reopen the investigation of the Amerasia case and the State Department. Examine closely the possible influence on our present appeasement policy because of the long time, very close, and very intimate association between Alger Hiss and Secretary Acheson.

2. Congress can and should force the administration to immediately advise Britain and the U. N. that we intend to give General Ridgway both authority and instructions to bomb Manchuria (using A-bombs if necessary); use Chinese Nationalist troops and do whatever is necessary to bring about the unconditional surrender of the Chinese Reds, at once, either with or without U. N. approval. That appeasement is out of the window.

3. Following the Peiping regime's surrender, General MacArthur (or some one equally competent) should be placed in charge of helping the Chinese people establish a representative and free republic. Do the same kind of job in China that MacArthur has so ably done in Japan.

Before starting the bombing (etc.) of Manchuria, Russia could be warned that any intervention by her would at once bring atomic destruction of her cities. (This warning probably would be unnecessary because it would actually be obvious to her. It is her fear of world war III and our A-bombs that has kept her from action up to now, anyway.)

Immediately following surrender of the Chinese Reds, Congress should demand (and force, as it can through appropriations) that Russia be told (either by the U. N. or the United States, acting alone if the cowardly U. N. appeasers are too frightened to act) to sit down to work out a real world-wide program of disarmament, free international trade, removal of the iron curtain, etc., etc.

Russia would not then dare refuse.

In conclusion, I believe this evidence does clearly indicate that: (1) Russia won't start world war III; (2) we can end the Korean war very quickly; (3) a real start can then be made toward many years of world peace; (4) it seems that only Congress can force the changes in our foreign (and military) policies that will produce these results.

The Wetback Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Senator CHAVEZ' Battle Over Wetbacks," published in the Parkersburg News on May 4, 1951, discussing the fight I made in the Senate on the so-called wetback issue in connection with the farm labor bill.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR CHAVEZ' BATTLE OVER WETBACKS

Little known to the public, and scarcely making a ripple in the headlines—as yet—Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ, of New Mexico, is waging a brilliant and courageous battle on the so-called wetback issue, a battle which in reality is to destroy a mushrooming peonage system in the United States.

A wetback is an illegal Mexican immigrant who crosses the Rio Grande to take employment at substandard wages on United States industrialized farms, thus destroying the job opportunities of American citizens, including American Indians of such tribes as the Navajos, the storied Apaches, and the Pueblos, not to mention many of Anglo-Saxon lineage.

Senator CHAVEZ compared the situation to that of the Okies, made famous by John Steinbeck in his book, Grapes of Wrath. The Senator first pointed out that while there are 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 farms in the United States, there are only 125,000 large corporate farms, or "factories of the field," where the imported workers could possibly find employment. "Those who operate the 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 family-size farms," said Senator CHAVEZ, "do not want to take advantage of human misery. On the other hand these vast corporate farms are owned by less than 2 percent of the Nation's farm operators, and produce only 7 percent of the food and fiber products sold on the American market."

The bill now before the Senate, said Senator CHAVEZ, if enacted without saving amendments, would bring back in my State the return of peonage which was outlawed in 1868.

The illegal immigrants, said the Senator, "want to get something to eat, and that is why they are willing to work at stoop labor for 60 or 70 cents a day. It is a pernicious system. But we cannot blame them. They are hungry."

The President's Commission on Migratory Labor recently brought in this report:

"We have long wavered and compromised on the issue of migratory labor in agriculture. We have failed to adopt policies designed to insure an adequate supply of such labor at decent standards of employment. * * * We have impaired the economic and social position of the family-farm operator."

We are strongly inclined to side with Senator CHAVEZ in this matter. We believe him far-sighted and just and striving to right a grievous social wrong. It is difficult to see how any Senator of the United States, gazing about him over the world and noting how the flames of communism blaze up in just such instances of exploitation of the ignorant and the wretched, would want to ignite what could become a prairie-fire in the United States. Therefore we believe Senator CHAVEZ will prevail ultimately, if not now. He will prevail because he is right. American jobs ought to go to Americans first.

Preparations for Civil Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a timely and challenging column on civil defense, written by Mr. Philip Wylie as guest columnist for Mr. Walter Winchell, and published in the New York Daily Mirror of May 11, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WALTER WINCHELL IN NEW YORK

Mr. and Mrs. United States:

(Today's column is by Philip Wylie, the bookwriter, whose best sellers include A Generation of Vipers and the Disappearance. You've probably met Wylie in the Satevepost (and other mags) via his delightly essays about deep-sea fishing, etc. Readers who still miss Heywood Broun's common sense and word magic appreciate Wylie's. Don't skip through this one, please. Clip and file it away in your pocket or desk—after your neighbors borrow it. Remember Pearl Harbor, Hiroshima, and Nagasaki.)

DEAR W. W.: In the spring days of 1951 I have begun to wonder if the American people have lost their minds. Maybe you can ask them. Any maybe I'm the nutty one—though people like you and me were called nutty before the Second World War and it proved we were right then, while the public was day dreaming, in the main. Here are some questions I wish I could answer.

Since the American people now know that the Soviet has a stockpile of plutonium bombs, why don't they react like people in a dreadful danger—people whose peril will grow less only after they act by the millions in a thousand ways?

The people have been told exactly what atomic bombs are like. They've been told that if they get set to be slugged in their cities they can "take it' 'and cut casualties to one-fifth of what they'd be now.

Getting set for that means a lot. It means 20,000,000 volunteer workers. It means spending billions of bucks to stockpile medicines and drugs, and to reinforce buildings and to arrange and rehearse systems of priority evacuation—beginning with children—and it means preparing the whole landscape around every big industrial city to receive, temporarily, city refugees. It means new fire-fighting equipment, mass produced. It means all sorts of electronic equipment and people trained to run it.

Getting set means more. It means basic training for every man and woman and child in a possible target area. It means bracing the nerves and minds of people likely to be in an A-bomb-hit area for the terrible sights bound to ensue—the burned, the wounded, the fire storms, the naked, the hysterical, and so on.

Getting set means having the stuff and the know-how to save the injured, to rescue the trapped, to douse the gigantic fires. It means, also, being ready to bear the terrible (but not dangerous) after-show of atomic bombs. It means having the guts to go about your business, after a hit, though you know there may be another.

Getting set, moreover, may well mean that no enemy will try to use atomic bombs on city populations. Because a city that's set is a poor target; you can't hurt it badly enough to be worth the try.

But the people I meet in big cities, Walter, aren't doing these things. They don't seem to realize all civil-defense problems differ from city to city and have to be solved locally and, in the event of a hit or hits, dealt with by local people—themselves.

The people I meet are fatalistic. They hope if a bomb comes they'll be the first killed. Some are just going ahead as if nothing were different—which is like letting yourself drown. And others are having a last fling—which, in my book, is damn near treason.

For a time is coming, perhaps is very near, Walter, when we could knock off all the Russian cities—and yet not knock out Russia. We can't reach the vast majority of Russians with atomic bombs—or the Red army—or the Government. Slave state people haven't the communications and transport that lead to national panic. We have.

The Soviets, with far fewer bombs, might quite conceivably so shock and horrify an unready United States of America that our folks would abandon our cities and refuse to go back. Then we'd have to surrender. We can be sure we are strong enough to face those birds on a city-trading basis only if and when the whole 150,000,000 of us are all set and prepared and briefed and rehearsed for the evil show—the show they could start tomorrow.

But what, Walter? A congressional committee puts the nix on the civil defense appropriation bill. In the Senate, a bill to disperse Washington is dropped. Are all those people insane?

They know Russia has the bomb. They know we could get in a war with Russia. MacArthur admits it—even accuses Truman of increasing the danger. The Congressmen smilingly tell you that in the first hours of any war Moscow would vanish. Well, so would Washington, just as sure as the Lord made little apples. So would New York, perhaps; so, surely, would a whole lot of other places. That's what the Soviet A-bomb means.

I remember writing a poem about waking up America in the days when the Nazis were eating a new country a month and you printed the verse. Now the danger is, say, 1,000 times as great, as savage, as terrible. It can be met only by facing the facts and getting braced in all the ways I've mentioned and many more. For if there's a next time, Walter, we're "for it"—and nobody I know is even 1 percent ready to face and to do what he must—to win.

The Japs, used to air raids but unprepared for atomic bombs, couldn't stand them. The Germans were knocked flat by fire storms—a mere side-effect of plutonium bombs. They weren't ready, either. And the British darn near lost their part of the war three different times, owing to air assault. We know we are a gritty people. And if we put our backs in it, we can do anything. But the massive atomic bombing of United States of America without preparation—immense, costly preparation—might be curtains for the land of liberty.

The home front, Walter, is the naked flank of American defenses today. Protecting it is not a Pentagon problem but everybody's business. So why don't we all catch on and pitch in? And why doesn't Congress begin to realize that unless it, too, acts sensibly, there may sooner or later come an instant when the Capitol and the monuments, the Pentagon and the White House just won't be there any more?

This time, civil defense is no clambake; it's the front-line trenches and we're all in them and we better learn how to fight an atomic war or we may one day be looking up our flagpoles at a hammer and sickle—those of us willing to live like that, I mean.

As ever, for freedom,

PHIL WYLIE.

What Allies Are We Afraid of Losing?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Democrat, Johnstown, Pa., of Saturday, May 5, 1951:

WHAT ALLIES ARE WE AFRAID OF LOSING?

General MacArthur, in suggesting we ought to go it alone, if necessary, in order to knock Red China out of the Korean war in a hurry, appears to have astonished some of Washington's too-too liberal internationalists.

And yet his suggestion makes a lot of sense.

To date in this Korean affair, the United Nations boys have been strictly fair-weather friends. As long as things were going well, they stood up to the Commies and resoluted to beat all get-out.

That was when we were fighting the North Koreans alone. But as soon as the Chinese Reds got into the scrap, the United Nations started to drag its feet. And the U. N. has been dragging its feet ever since.

Let's face it. If Great Britain and France hadn't been hanging about our necks, isn't it possible that this MacArthur controversy never would have come up?

It's been pretty definitely established, by this time, that as late as January 12 the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff and General MacArthur were in virtual agreement about how the military phase of the Korean affair should be conducted.

Who blocked that program? Obviously, the diplomats—not our own, exclusively, but the foreign offices of our so-called allies.

Our difficulties to date in Korea—and a large part of those difficulties are reflected in the 60,000-plus casualties the United States has suffered—have come as a result of putting our field commanders under wraps.

General MacArthur has testified that when the Chinese Reds started to pour across the Yalu in force, they should have been served with an ultimatum to get the hell back where they belonged, or get the very bedevil kicked out of them.

That's in the American military tradition. Our history books are filled with such classic wartime rejoinders as "Don't give up the ship," "Damn the torpedoes, full speed ahead," "We'll fight it out on this line if it takes all summer," "Surrender? Never," and "Nuts." To recall only a few.

If General MacArthur had been permitted to reply in kind to the Reds when they crossed the Yalu, and to have plastered them with everything we had from the air, the sea, and by means of diversionary raids on the mainland of China, chances are this war now would be over.

But for seven long month's we've been pulling our punches. Why our Air Force isn't even permitted to bomb certain places in North Korea itself. Meantime, our boys have been going through what General MacArthur calls an accordion action, up and down, up and down, up and down the narrow Korean peninsula. We've been waiting for the dust to settle—and meantime have soaked that dust with blood, American blood.

Why? Because we've been yellow? Because we don't know how to fight? No. Because the United Nations and the principal allies with whom we're associated in this police action are thinking of Hong Kong and other interests in the Far East.

It's nothing short of criminal that our delegate to the United Nations, 7 months after the Chinese Reds entered the war, is only now pleading with our so-called allies to stop shipping critical matériel of war to the very enemy that is killing our sons—and their own.

These fair-weather allies of ours—who've got their hands out for military and economic aid from us in Europe—have only token forces in Korea. Yet they have just as loud a voice—louder, collectively—as we do in calling the military shots in Korea.

Meantime, Harry Truman and Dean Acheson are willing to doom thousands of American boys to a senseless meat-grinder operation in which we trade one American life for 20 Chinese lives in an indeterminable limited war—in the pious hope that some day the Reds will get tired of it all and will consent to talk cease-fire with us.

United States would be a lot better off in Asia today if we'd never heard of the United Nations. The city slickers hoaxed us into a diplomatic poker game and they've been taking the shirt off our back in Korea ever since.

We go all the way with General MacArthur on that score. Why worry about losing our allies in Korea? We never had any to speak of.

Isn't it about time we showed a few characteristic American feathers? Isn't it about time we said to these so-called allies, in effect:

"Look, brother, we've had enough of this fiddle-faddle. This is the way it's going to be. Are you with us? If not, get out of our way. We've got a job to do."

And we'd like to lay a little bet—2 to 1. Those fellows would go along. Because they need us a lot worse than we need them. Lose our allies? Why we couldn't beat them off with a club. (And sometimes, we think, more's the pity.)

"Do as I Say, Not as I Do"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDMUND P. RADWAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. RADWAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Buffalo (N. Y.) Evening News:

"DO AS I SAY, NOT AS I DO"

Defense Mobilizer Charles E. Wilson, who had long since put a crimp in local public-works projects by clamping down on scarce materials, now asks all States, cities, and counties to "postpone borrowing no matter how worthy the purpose, if the project is postponable."

The new edict seeks not only to curtail those projects that consume priority materials, but all those that create credit and thus feed inflation—including borrowing for soldiers' bonus payments, for sites and rights-of-way for future projects, for funds with which to purchase privately owned utilities, etc.

As anti-inflation medicine, this Spartan prescription makes obvious sense. But it would make a good deal more sense—and be better heeded—if Uncle Sam were leading the way instead of merely issuing the commands.

So far, the Federal Administration itself has not shown the slightest disposition to practice any of the belt-tightening or credit-husbanding virtues about which it economic stabilizers preach.

The President's budget for the year beginning July 1—a budget which he has repeatedly dared Congress to cut—shows most of the Federal credit and public-works programs running in high gear. Many adjustments have been made to give a defense label to programs that were advocated under other guises before the Korean War, but the totals, in most cases, are higher than ever.

Take, for example, the total for civil public works. Actual spending for all these programs was less than $1,700,000,000 in fiscal 1948 and again in 1949. Last year, it came to $2,053,000,000. But the President's 1952 budget asks $3,353,000,000 for these purposes.

Or take the total of Federal credit programs. Last year's new commitments for all types of Federal loans and guarantees came to $11,967,000,000. For next year, the President has asked a total of $13,340,000,000. Some of these loan-expansion programs, to be sure, carry a defense tag. For instance, $90,000,000 for civil defense, and $1,950,000,000 for expansion of defense production. But the biggest items represent continuance of regular peacetime programs. The scandal-ridden RFC is down for $308,000,000 in new lending authority for ordinary loans to business—this at a time when the economic-stabilization officials are pleading with private lenders to cut down on business credit. The Veterans' Administration is down for $3,055,000,000 in new commitments for veterans' housing (compared with $2,518,000,000 in the 1950 fiscal year)—at a time when Mr. Wilson is urging the States to postpone veterans' bonus payments.

The worst thing about this contrast between what Uncle Sam practices and what he preaches, of course, is that it is all too typical of the let's-everybody-else-sacrifice approach to mobilization. As long as the Federal Government carries the big club, the States and cities will probably do what they're told—at least so far as the timing of their public-works programs is concerned. But they would do it a lot more willingly, and with a lot more of the feeling that we're all in this thing together, if the Federal Government showed any disposition to lead by example instead of by command.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the remarks in the RECORD. I wish to call to the attention of the Congress the 37 years service of a distinguished journalist, originally from my district in Louisiana, Paul Wooton, who was honored by the Washington newspaper correspondents on the occasion of Mr. Wooton's seventieth birthday.

The people of my district and Louisiana are proud of the service and stature attained by this fine and able man who through the 37 years of his assignment in Washington has exemplified the highest principles in journalism and has contributed so unselfishly to the success of many a new and young reporter who came to Washington from all sections of the country and who through his solicitious guidance became some of our foremost national newspaper columnists and publishers.

Mr. Speaker, I include in these remarks a copy of an editorial from the Washington Star of May 10, 1951, entitled "Paul Wooton at 70," as follows:

PAUL WOOTON AT 70

The Washington press corps did honor yesterday to "the indispenable man." Paul Wooton, whose 70 years sit lightly on him, had a brithday party.

For 37 years, while the world has passed through one of its most tumultuous periods, Paul Wooton has built a distinguished career in journalism in the Nation's Capital. Friend to Presidents and to statesmen in general, he has most of all been a friend to other newspapermen. With devotion to his profession and a kindness of heart well known to all his colleagues, Paul Wooton has been the wheelhorse in virtually every newspapermen's organization in Washington. It was not inappropriate that one of those who spoke at the luncheon honoring Paul yesterday referred to his "benevolent despotism" and suggested that many of the world's problems could be resolved by adoption of his high principles of human relations.

It is a safe guess that American newspapermen now scattered all over the world were present in spirit at yesterday's party to wish "happy birthday" to one of their best friends and most beloved colleagues.

Cordell Hull Foundation for International Education Established as Tribute to Statesman and Promoter of World Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOE L. EVINS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last the State of Tennessee granted the charter for the Cordell Hull Foundation for International Education. This was a most historic action and was the culmination of many months of endeavor by friends and associates of that great Tennessean, Cordell Hull, to create a suitable monument to the decades of public service and untiring efforts for world peace and accord which this great American has rendered to all mankind.

Formal announcement of the formation of a multi-million-dollar fund for the granting of scholarships to students of other nationalities for study in the United States was announced on the same day by Dr. Harvie Branscomb, chancellor of Vanderbilt University at Nashville, Tennessee. Most regrettably the announcement of the formation of this great foundation has come at a time when the revered statesman continues ill at the Naval Medical Center at Bethesda and as his multitude of friends in Tennessee and throughout the world earnestly hope and pray for the restoration of his health.

The Cordell Hull Foundation for International Education will encompass the ideals for which Judge Hull has dedicated his long and useful life—that is, the attainment of international harmony through the practice of good will and neighborliness among nations. Through the granting of these scholarships, students of other lands may come to our great country to pursue their studies and learn about us at first hand. By the same token we of this country may become better acquainted with our international friends through association with these unofficial ambassadors of good will. No more fitting tribute to the great Cordell Hull, promoter of peace and good will, could be conceived. The Cordell Hull Foundation will take its place as an instrument of peace along the United Nations and the Pan-American Union whose formation Mr. Hull inspired.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I desire to have included with my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the New York Times and an editorial from the Nashville Banner, May 10, 1951, on the creation of the Cordell Hull Foundation. The article is as follows:

Friends and admirers of Cordell Hull, former Secretary of State, have established in his name an educational foundation to promote world peace and good will through an international scholarship program.

Formation of the Cordell Hull Foundation for International Education was announced here yesterday by Dr. Harvie Branscomb, chancelor of Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn. He said it was expected that several million dollars would be provided for the project.

Dr. Branscomb, who made the announcement at the Roosevelt Hotel, also made public a letter from the 79-year-old former statesman, who is critically ill in the Naval Medical Center at Bethesda, Md. Mr. Hull, a native of Tennessee, endorsed the program and observed that better understanding and cooperation between nations was desperately needed in the present world situation.

FOUNDATION'S TENTATIVE PLANS

The foundation's program, still in the formative stage, envisions the setting up of scholarships and fellowships that will enable students from the 20 Latin-American countries to study in the United States, Dr. Branscomb explained.

He said that, beginning in 1952, 40 students a year would be brought here—2 from each of the 20 countries. Later it is hoped to offer similar opportunities for European students.

The foundation also plans to carry on studies in international relations at the university center in Nashville, which embraces the schools and colleges of Vanderbilt University, and to send faculty members abroad to study and teach.

Dr. Branscomb made public an incomplete list of trustees of the new foundation, explaining that it would be expanded later. The list included Sam Rayburn, Speaker of the House of Representatives; Associate Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas; James A. Farley, former Postmaster General; Warren R. Austin, chief United States delegate to the United Nations; Myron C. Taylor, retired industrialist and diplomat.

Will L. Clayton, Under Secretary of State in Charge of Economic Affairs and Under Secretary of State during Mr. Hull's administration; George A. Sloan, president of the Metropolitan Opera Association; Leo Pasvolsky, director of international studies for the Brookings Institute; Frank Houston of the Chemical Bank & Trust Co.; Henry C. Alexander, president of J. P. Morgan & Co.; Jesse H. Jones, former Secretary of Commerce; and Chief Justice A. B. Neil, of the Tennessee Supreme Court.

Winston S. Dustin, southern radio executive, is executive secretary.

Mr. Hull's letter to Dr. Branscomb was dated April 4 and was in reply to a memorandum from the college chancelor outlining the purposes of the foundation. The former Secretary of State emphasized the need to elevate the standards of political morality and action on the part of our citizens and the citizens of all countries, and added:

"Only through such activities can we hope that men and women everywhere will keep alive and constantly renew faith in the dignity of the individual, in institutions of government founded upon the concept of the governed, and in enduring peace based on freedom and justice.

"These are the abiding values of a truly Christian civilization, and their presentation requires faith in their eternal worth, and stanch determination to uphold them and willingness to make whatever sacrifices may be needed to that end.

"I think it is wise, as you plan, to begin your endeavors in the realm of inter-American problems and relations. The nations of this hemisphere have in common many traditions and aspirations. All of them were born of a passionate desire for liberty and freedom, and all of them face today the fateful challenge presented to mankind by the unspeakable doctrines of communism and of other similar movements directed toward enslavement of the individual by the soulless state."

Mr. Hull also declared that no country or region could be secure in freedom unless an overwhelming majority of mankind move forward together toward the attainment of the noble purposes and principles that are enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations.

Dr. Branscomb, who is chairman of the United States Advisory Commission for Educational Exchange, said it was intended that the foundation would perform a comparable service to the Rhodes scholarships. He is a Rhodes scholar.

He explained that the idea for the foundation grew spontaneously from a number of Mr. Hull's friends and colleagues and that the plan had been discussed with both Mr. Hull and Mrs. Hull. He said that eventually a headquarters building, to be known as Hull Hall, would be erected in Nashville.

In his memorandum to Mr. Hull outlining the project, Dr. Branscomb declared that the former diplomat belonged not only to the United States but also to other countries of the free democratic world which his statesmanship has served.

"Your friends, and others joining with them, believe," the communication added, "that the most appropriate monument we could establish in your honor would be a program of international education which would bring together promising young men and women from many countries in a common educational experience."

Dr. Branscomb said the charter for the new foundation had been formally granted yesterday in Tennessee.

The editorial is as follows:

THE CORDELL HULL FOUNDATION

The announcement by Chancellor Harvie Branscomb of Vanderbilt University that the newly established Cordell Hull Foundation will have its headquarters at the University Center here should be a source of pride and gratification to every Nashvillian.

Already the site of numerous educational and religious institutions, Nashville now will have the opportunity to expand further its reputation as an international center of learning. The new multimillion-dollar foundation initially will focus its attention on the education of students from Latin-American countries but later it is expected to broaden its scope and include other countries in its program.

The announcement occurs at a time when the people of this State, the Nation and the entire world are hoping and praying for the recovery of the former Secretary of State, now critically ill.

The project's stated purpose of promoting, by educational activities, better understanding and good will among the peoples of the world and especially between the peoples of the Western Hemisphere is a just tribute to the "father of the United Nations" who contributed so greatly to a better understanding between this Nation and those of South America.

The people of Tennessee have long remarked with pride the skill and vision of statesmanship marking this illustrious career, and the inspiration and influence of his gracious wife upon that career. Their name, their influence, their generosity on behalf of humanity's uplift are perpetuated in this great new enterprise—shared by those having a part in its establishment.

The Cordell Hull Foundation can and will make a major contribution toward strengthening the bonds that already exist between the continents of North and South America. Through its contemplated program of exchange students at Vanderbilt and other schools, it will foster and encourage personal friendships among the students of the various countries and when the students return to their homes, these friendships will go a long way toward increasing understanding and cooperation on the international level.

Nashvillians, especially, are indebted to Chancellor Branscomb and to the other men of vision who conceived this memorial and who played a part in having its headquarters located here. They should be grateful for the opportunity ot take part in its program and should feel an obligation to support the foundation and to share in its work.

Public Power—The Preference Clause

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, one of the cornerstones of the Government's so-called power policy is that preference in power sales from Federal multiple-purpose projects shall be given to public agencies, cooperatives, and the like.

During debate in the House on the recently passed Interior Department Appropriation Act for 1952, public power supporters declared that the preference provision reflected a philosophy laid down by Congress in 1906 in making it essential for the Congress to build transmission lines to serve preference customers and, in effect, ignore anyone else who might have need for power.

In 1906 the Congress passed the first act which contained a preference provision—the Reclamation Act of April 16, 1906. Section 5 of this act stated that the Secretary of the Interior may lease surplus power from irrigation projects "giving preference to municipal purposes."

This law has been cherished and cited by public power supporters as if it were on a par with the Constitution or the Bill of Rights. Whenever the wisdom of preference provisions is questioned, we are always referred in voices filled with awe back to this law of 1906. It is from this one piece of legislation that all of the subsequent preference provisions have flowed, and today preference has become the hub of the public power wheel.

What was the intent of the legislators who framed the original preference clause? What were the circumstances that surrounded its inception? The 1906 bill, which originated in the Senate, did not primarily concern power. It provided for the withdrawal from public entry any lands needed for town-site purposes as provided for under the Reclamation Act of 1902.

Apparently the Senate held no hearings on this bill as no transcript can be found. There was little debate on the Senate floor before the bill was passed. It should be noted that neither the bill as proposed or as passed by the Senate contained any preference provision at all. This provision appeared in the bill as reported by the House Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands. However, no House hearings have been located either, so we must assume that no hearings were held by that body. The House report offered no hint either as to the origin or purpose of the preference clause.

This is the law that those who would nationalize our electric industry point to as the basis for preference, the cornerstone of their so-called public power policy. The preference section was only one clause in one section of a five-section bill which in itself did not concern power. This provision was included in a piece of legislation before the Federal Government had an appreciable amount of surplus power available from irrigation or other projects. In 1912, 6 years after the passage of the 1906 act, a report of the Commissioners of Corporation on the subject of Water Power Development in the United States, stated that "a considerable portion of power developed at irrigation projects is utilized for the operation of pumps, and power for commercial use is of comparatively little importance."

During the recent debate on the Interior Department bill the statement was made that Federal power legislation had been approved by the Congress for the purpose of helping all kinds of people. Such legislation should help, not all kinds of people, but all people. In fact I challenge that, with preference as a cornerstone, Federal power legislation does not even help all kinds of people, but only certain people. That this is true can be shown in my own State of Michigan.

It has been estimated that 11 percent of all the power customers in Michigan could be classified as preference customers. If the Bureau of Reclamation built a huge multiple-purpose project in Michigan, only 11 percent of Michigan's customers would be entitled to this power. Although 89 percent of the customers had, through their taxes, contributed to the building of this project, they would be denied any benefit from the project because they happened to patronize the wrong power distributing concern.

This reasoning is all based on a law passed back in 1906 that did not involve power, and on which no hearings were held.

This is the history of the act that first offered the preference idea which in turn has been used ever since as a beacon by public power advocates to light their way toward nationalization of the electric industry.

Editorial Re Rumely Jury Conviction and Freedom of Press

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished chairman of the Select Committee on Lobbying during the last session of Congress, the Hon. Frank Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, in his lifetime made request that the following editorial in the Denver Post for Saturday, April 21, 1951, be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the information of all who might read.

I had the responsibility and privilege of serving as a member of the Select Committee on Lobbying. There is no question in the minds of those who had the honor of working with him that the heavy and diligent work he did on that committee during those months was the cause of hastening his untimely demise.

So now that he has passed on and is unable to personally ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks and include therein the following editorial, it is my privilege and pleasure to do it at the request of his able assistants in his congressional office.

Representative Buchanan sat next to me on the floor of the House of Representatives on the occasion when the distinguished American, General MacArthur, spoke to us at the joint session. It was his last presence on the floor of the House.

At that time he knew of the verdict of the court jury holding Dr. E. A. Rumely guilty of contempt of Congress and spoke to me about it. Even though the jury took only 20 minutes to arrive at its verdict of guilty for Dr. Rumely, Representative Buchanan told me he was awfully sorry to see any American citizen in a legal position where he was found guilty by an American jury of violating American statutes and ordinances. He did not gloat over the fact that Dr. Rumely had been convicted. He did, however, tell me that he felt that a verdict of guilty, arrived at after only 20 minutes' consideration by the jury, justified the vote of the majority of members of the Select Lobbying Committee to recommend to the House of Representatives that he be cited for contempt.

The following editorial speaks for itself:

NO RIGHT TO SECRECY

The jury which convicted Dr. Edward A. Rumely of contempt of Congress reached its verdict in only 20 minutes. The facts in the case were uncontroverted. Dr. Rumely, executive secretary of the Committee for Constitutional Government, admitted he had refused to give a lobby investigating committee full information on persons who made quantity purchases of books published by the Committee on Constitutional Government.

Dr. Rumely's only defense was based on constitutional legalistic grounds which Federal District Judge Keech found to be invalid. Those grounds will now be tested further in the course of appeals to higher courts.

That the Committee for Constitutional Government is one of the major lobbying organizations of the country seems plain to us. For years it has sought to influence public opinion on matters relating to legislation. It has been on such friendly terms with some Congressmen that it has been able to send out large quantities of literature under free postal franking privileges.

One of the ways of Committee on Constitutional Government finances its activities is through the sale of books. Under existing lobbying laws, the organization cannot accept donations of $500 or more from anyone without disclosing to Congress the source of the donation. The Committee on Constitutional Government has taken the position, however, that if it sells $500 or $1,000 worth of its books to one of its supporters it does not have to reveal the identity of the purchaser.

Whether the book-selling business of the Committee on Constitutional Government—or any similar group—provides a loophole in the lobbying law which should be closed is a question which the congressional committee has been studying.

The powers granted to the congressional committee were broad enough to cover a full investigation of book-selling activities. But, when Dr. Rumely was ordered to produce records of bulk purchases by publicity-shunning supporters of the Committee on Constitutional Government, he refused and sought to invoke the constitutional protection of freedom of the press.

We cannot agree with Dr. Rumely's interpretation of what press freedom means. The right of the Committee on Constitutional Government to publish any books that it may wish to put in print is not questioned in any way. The right of freedom of the press does not carry with it any right to keep secret the names of those who give financial support to publications seeking to influence public opinion.

Postal laws very properly require newspapers to disclose the names of their principal stockholders from time to time. Anonymity in any publishing business could be a dangerous thing. Those who object to Government by unseen forces will approve the action of the court in Dr. Rumely's case.

The Pinkest Cheeks in Town

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, who advised the President last year that the Chinese Communists were too intelligent to get into the Korean war? Bless his heart, it was Secretary Acheson who told the world that this would never happen, and he put it on television so all could hear and see him.

Ruth Montgomery, in her column D. C. Wash, cites a very interesting, yet embarrassing, situation within the spats and cane division. I include part of her article at this point in the RECORD:

[From the Chicago Tribune of May 12, 1951]

D. C. WASH

(By Ruth Montgomery)

WASHINGTON, May 11.—The pinkest cheeks in town this week belong to our State Department boys. They've pulled another bloomer, bless 'em. The spats and cane division was holding one of a series of indoctrination classes for new Foreign Service personnel. To vary the usual lectures about what a wonderful job the Department is doing [hear, hear], the institute officials decided to show a kinescope of a television interview with Secretary Acheson. This was in order to demonstrate what a warm and human fellow the outwardly frosty Secretary really is.

It proved he was human all right, to the blushing consternation of the officials. The kinescope, which had apparently not been previewed by the Department since the dismissal of General MacArthur, represented a television interview with Acheson last fall by three CBS correspondents. In it Griffing Bancroft asked the Secretary whether he thought the Chinese Communists would come into the Korean war. The Cabinet officer emphatically reassured Bancroft against such a possibility, because the Chinese Reds were too "intelligent" to take such a risk.

It's human to err. Practically everybody admits to pulling a few—except President Truman, that is. A handful of the fledgling Foreign Service officers, too new to have been properly indoctrinated, suggested that the embarrassing kinescope ought to be dispatched to the White House. After all, our Chief Executive at the recent Jefferson-Jackson Day political rally shrugged off all blame for the Korean war tragedy by complaining petulantly that MacArthur had predicted the Chinese Reds wouldn't come in.

A General Far Eastern War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to include in the RECORD the following comments by Walter Lippmann. They are taken from today's Washington Post:

TODAY AND TOMORROW

(By Walter Lippmann)

A GENERAL FAR EASTERN WAR?

It is, I think, clear that one of the determining factors in General MacArthur's mind is that in the Far East the Soviet Union can exert only a small part of its military power. From the main Russian centers of population and of industry the distance to the Soviet Far East is great and the communications are poor.

Russia, seen from Japan, looks and indeed, is, a far less formidable power than Russia seen from, let us say, Paris or Bonn or Trieste or Ankara. The Red army can march against Europe and the Middle East and pick up war industries and supplies as it advances. But in the Far East there are only the comparatively limited forces east of Lake Baikal with their limited local war industries, dependent in case of war upon the vulnerable and inadequate Trans-Siberian Railway.

Moreover, it might even be easier for the United States with its command of the sea and air to build up power based on Japan than it would be for Russia to build up power based on the Soviet Far East and Manchuria.

Thus, a war in the Far East, even against Russia and China combined, would be—provided it was confined to the Far East—a war in which neither side could bring all its military forces—nor even its main military force—into the fighting. The Russians could not bring in their immense army. We, for lack of decisive targets and essential bases, could use only a fraction—and not the most effective fraction—of our sea and air power. A far-eastern war, confined to the Far East, would be a big war. But it would be a limited war. Since neither side could use its whole power, there could be no decisive victory for which it has been said, there is in war no substitute.

But, seen from Japan and Formosa, an interesting case can be made for that sort of far-eastern war. It would commit great American forces to the Far East. They would have priority. Since the war would have to be indecisive, it could not be terminated by the kind of victory without which all is now appeasement. Therefore great American forces would be committed indefinitely in the Far East and a condition of permanent hostilities, without the danger of a truce or a negotiated settlement or any kind of modus vivendi, would be guaranteed to Joe Stalin.

The administration's argument against General MacArthur has been that such a general war against China would almost certainly bring in Russia and that this would mean that the third world war with the atom bombs and the overrunning of Europe and the rest would follow. General MacArthur's comment on this argument was to say that: "The Soviet will not necessarily mesh its actions with our moves."

The general meant, of course, that the Soviet might not go openly to war if we bombed the Manchurian bases of the Chinese army in Korea but that even if they did, the Far East is the most important place to fight the war and that this is as good a time as any to have a war with the Soviet Union.

I wonder whether Stalin and Molotov and the rest of them may not be of the same opinion. We cannot know for sure what they think—not at least until the Politburo holds its next public debate on Soviet strategy and high policy—with stenographic reports, only slightly censored, every hour on the hour at 12 cents a page.

One thing I would bet on. The Kremlin has before it a comprehensive report which we are providing for them of what we know and of what we don't know and of what we are thinking and hoping and wishing and worrying about. There is no doubt, I think, that the Kremlin will mesh their actions with ours. The Russians are chess players. As we are now informing them that we shall use either the queen's pawn opening or the Ruy Lopez, they will certainly be fully prepared to mesh their moves with ours when we make our moves.

There are, I believe, a great many bits and pieces of evidence—including Mr. Gromyko's behavior in Paris—which indicate that the Soviet Union may also have come to think that the Far East is the best theater in which to have war break out. For the Soviets the Far East is the safest and the most advantageous place to have a world war break out. In the Far East they have their most powerful ally. In the Far East we have no alliances. The Atlantic Pact does not operate outside the region defined in the pact, and while the British would no doubt join us in a far-eastern war, they are not any longer capable of important military action in the Far East.

In a far-eastern war the Soviet Union cannot be defeated. It cannot even be deeply injured. Thus a war which broke out in the Far East would engage great American forces in a struggle that was certain to be indecisive and interminable. The war would strain, and almost certainly disrupt the Atlantic alliance because France and the Low Countries and the Scandinavian countries cannot be expected to declare war on Russia for the sake of Korea when that means inviting the Red Army to invade them. If the Atlantic alliance is disrupted, if we are at war with Russia without the active support of most of western and southern Europe, we shall fight without being able to use our right arm. American atomic power would be not entirely but in very large measure neutralized.

Therefore it might well be that the Russians may decide that a war in the Far East, and really confined to the Far East, would be the one of all the kinds of wars they could engage in that promises them the biggest advantages at the least cost.

The University of Arkansas and the Arts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter giving a factual account of recent developments at the University of Arkansas. The letter was written by Harry S. Ashmore, of Fayetteville, Ark., and was published recently on the editorial page of the Arkansas Gazette. So many people of the eastern and northern parts of the United States are so ignorant of the developments in the Southwest that I believe it may be helpful to bring these facts to their attention.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE UNIVERSITY OF ARKANSAS AND THE ARTS

FAYETTEVILLE.—Over the years the ancient trade-out by which the city of Fayetteville obtained the University of Arkansas has proved to have both advantages and disadvantages. It would be hard to imagine a lovelier site for a university than this high valley in the Ozarks, and as every scholar knows isolation can be an academic blessing in seasons of political stress and strain. On the other hand, the fact that the university is tucked away in the remote northwest corner of the State, and is not even on the road to anywhere, has kept most of the citizens of Arkansas from realizing how wisely they have been investing their money in recent years.

The latest physical manifestation of growth and change was dedicated this week end as a high point in the Rites of Spring which celebrate the annual burgeoning of academic degrees. It is a fine arts center which is by all odds the most handsome public building in Arkansas, and which has already elicited admiring comment from architects all over the world. A few traditionalists, it is true, have expressed dismay over the contrast between the list, airy structure, sprawling with conscious grace, and the high-shouldered bulk of Old Main across the campus. But they are few, and even the hardiest of them subside when it is pointed out that the fine arts center cost, on a square foot basis, a little less than half the conventional wing which is under construction at the engineering building.

The center is actually two buildings. The larger houses classrooms, lecture halls, music and art studios, and a music hall complete with pipe organ. The smaller is perhaps the only theater in the world in which more space is devoted to the actors than to the audience. Connecting the two is a glassed-in exhibition hall which is currently housing the finest collection of contemporary art ever shown in Arkansas. An extensive terrace and a small outdoor amphitheater flank the S-shaped main structure.

The genius who created the design for the center is a Fayetteville boy whose class at the university unanimously voted him the least likely to succeed. In the course of confounding that prophecy Edward D. Stone has pursued a career that led him to study at Harvard, won him traveling fellowships abroad, took him to Yale as a professor of architecture, and produced such monuments as the Museum of Modern Art in New York, a Long Island house for Henry R. Luce, and a hotel in Panama. While Mr. Stone has grown both famous and rich (or would have if he didn't have the whimsical habit of spending more than he is paid on such labors of love as the fine arts center) he had somehow failed to acquire an academic degree along the way. The university corrected that yesterday when it made him a doctor of fine arts, a rare degree which a research committee found had once been given to Frank Lloyd Wright, the architect with whom Mr. Stone is usually compared in the professional journals these days.

In the Fine Arts Center Mr. Stone made bold and effective use of common and inexpensive materials like cinder blocks, and laid in glass with a lavish hand. He built, as he always does, from the inside out, starting with the function each square foot of space was expected to serve. This was no mean task, since he had to build around such complex mechanical marvels as the fully equipped experimental stage in the theater, provide on a limited budget perfect acoustics in those portions of the building devoted to music, and see that the painters had plenty of light. His success has earned him not only a degree, but the gratitude of all those who work, study, or visit in the building, and of those who only walk by it, for from any angle it displays an eminently satisfying purity of line and of proportion.

While the university only got around to dedicating it this week end, the center has been in service for several months now. At the moment a student production of The Marriage of Figaro is running at one end of the art exhibit, and The Guardsman is playing a repeat performance in the theater. Attractions of this sort, plus the lure of the building itself, have kept a steady stream of students passing through the great glass doors. The university's president, Lewis Webster Jones, is particularly pleased that many of these are intensely practical people from the schools of commerce, engineering, agriculture, law, and the like who in the past have been given to curling their lips at the arts.

Indeed, President Jones sees the Arts Center as the partial fulfillment of a goal he set for himself when he came to the university 4 years ago. Of necessity he had to devote his first efforts to shoring up those schools and departments which meet Arkansas' immediate need for specialized services and trained personnel. One of his first creations was an Institute of Scientific Research, which has launched into a dozen fields and which, happily, has been able to attract a good deal of private capital to underwrite its activities. He has concentrated much effort on Agricultural Extension Service. He has also labored long and hard over the medical school at Little Rock, and he succeeded in salvaging out of the fiscal wreckage of the last legislative session enough money to finance a new teaching hospital, which Mr. Stone has also designed. But, willing as he is to turn out scientists, technicians, farmers, doctors, lawyers, and businessmen in the largest practicable quantity, Dr. Jones is also determined to see that they receive a general as well as an applied education. The world, he believes, is getting cluttered up with what he calls educated illiterates, people who know all about the cultivation of lespedeza or the most practicable method for removing an appendix, but who have no real understanding of the awful complexities of the age they live in, or the demands it makes upon them as citizens. An educated man, he argues, does not have to be a creative man, but he has to have some understanding of, or at least tolerance for, those who wrestle with the verities.

The Jones influence is visible to even the most casual visitor to the campus. Even with the financial uncertainties that now beset the institution—everybody knows that the faculty is going to have to be cut back next term and some projects abandoned in the wake of the legislature's failure to meet the projected budget—there is the feeling of optimism and excitement common to people who are convinced that they are taking part in something important. Fayetteville has become the sort of place where, on last week end, you could find Erwin Edman, the Columbia University philosopher, sitting under a tree, sans necktie, at the annual Agri Day Barbecue. Professor Edman made a neat symbol; it was obvious that this native of New York and citizen of the world of ideas liked being there, and it was equally obvious that the students and teachers of agriculture who sat with him were enjoying his company.

The university, like the rest of Arkansas, is in a state of transition. There is a good institution of higher education up here in the hills, and with the help of God and the general assembly, there may soon be a great one.

Senator Kem's Attitude on Sale of Arms and Strategic Materials to Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial on the subject Aiding the Enemy, which appeared in the Washington Sunday Star. This is a very fine tribute to our able and courageous colleague, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM].

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AIDING THE ENEMY

Those Senators who insist that any ban on economic aid to countries which sell arms or strategic materials to Russia and its satellites must be mandatory, and not permissive, are entirely correct.

The Senate adopted a similar mandatory provision last year. But in conference with the House it was watered down to a permissive ban. In other words, the administration was authorized, but not required, to withhold ECA aid from countries that were trading with the enemy. The results were nil.

Senator KEM told the Senate on Thursday that he had tried to find out what the National Security Council had done under the permissive arrangement. "So far as my information goes," he said, "it has done nothing but negotiate and consider. Not one gun, not one barrel of gasoline, not one ton of rubber has been withheld from the Marshall plan countries which were shipping materials of that kind to Russia and her satellite nations including Communist China. What the Senate wants, I think, is a definite, mandatory law, with no ground for horsetrading, no ground for discretion, but a definite direction to ECA not to send any materials to Marshall plan countries or any financial assistance if they are shipping materials of war to Russia or her satellites."

The best evidence that Senator KEM is right consists of the fact that last year's discretionary power was never used in any effective way. Other nations, supposedly associated with us in the Korean war, have been doing a lively business with the enemy. This country did the same until last December. The whole record is shameful and disgraceful. It is nothing less than criminal to send boys into a war and then to sell to the enemy any material which can be used, directly or indirectly, to kill them. It can be stopped to a very large extent if the ban, which the Senate has approved unanimously, is adopted. Under no circumstances should there be any retreat from it this time.

Marshall Can't Duck His Responsibility for China Policy—He Was One of Its Architects

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Gen. George Marshall had the opportunity to be recorded as one of the great soldiers of the Nation. Those who will write the history will hesitate to so record Mr. Marshall, I am sure. Perhaps his ability and capacity as a military man in the field will not be questioned, but certainly considerable doubt will arise as to his veracity.

Mr. Speaker, to this day, Mr. Marshall would have us believe that he did not remember where he was the night before the bombing at Pearl Harbor. No man in his position, if he was conscious, could have such a lapse of memory. Some day the facts will be known—the truth will out eventually.

When Secretary Marshall was before a Senate committee for confirmation as Secretary of Defense, he testified that he was not a party to writing China policy before he went on an ill-fated mission to China in 1945. On last Thursday, May 10, he again gave the same impression when testifying before a joint Senate committee in the MacArthur matter.

Mr. Speaker, for the second time the Washington Post has called the turn on Marshall's testimony in well-reasoned editorials. I include as part of my remarks in this connection the one that appeared today. George Marshall should learn to tell the truth or retire from public life.

CHINA DIRECTIVE

Secretary Marshall has again left the impression with the people of America that he was not party to the instructions which he bore to China for his mediation mission of 1945–7. He did the same thing during a Senate interrogation when he was appointed Secretary of Defense. On Thursday he said he presumed Secretary Byrnes and Under Secretary Acheson had a hand in his directive; he was certain that John Carter Vincent had. It seems incredible to us that a man of General Marshall's stature was only an errand boy to China, yet this is the impression he leaves.

Nor does the story as we gathered it at the time bear out this odd construction. It was necessary in late 1945 to hammer out a new policy toward China because of two circumstances. Civil war was on the brink of breaking out, and there was a holler in the country to bring home the 50,000 marines stationed in China. Working papers were prepared in the State Department covering all courses of possible action. These formed the basis of a discussion with General Marshall as the new special Ambassador to China. Secretary Byrnes in Speaking Frankly says this of that conference:

"The Sunday before I left for Moscow, Under Secretary Acheson, General Marshall, and members of his staff met in my office. By the end of the morning's discussion, we had agreed upon the statement of policy that subsequently was approved by the President and released to the public on December 15. Thereafter the President made no change in that policy except upon the recommendation of General Marshall or with his approval."

This statement of policy was the directive about which Secretary Marshall was questioned up till Saturday at the MacArthur hearings.

The directive conveyed through General Marshall an offer of assistance to the national government under Chiang Kai-shek in bringing about a cessation of internal strife and the establishment of a government representative of the contending factions (mainly Nationalist and Communist) in which the Nationalists would predominate. The mission failed. The idea of popular-front governments has since been proved to be a favored ruse of the Communists to capture control. Nevertheless there is no reason to botch history because of either circumstance. This, however, is what has hitherto been happening—in the administration's denial till the present hearings that there was ever any intention of encouraging a coalition in China containing the Communists and in Secretary's Marshall's implication that he had virtually nothing to do with his own instructions.

At the time General Marshall was not only privy to and a coinspirer of his directive; he was enthusiastic about the mission. This was very noticeable midway through his mission when he paid a flying visit to America and addressed the National Press Club. It was equally obvious from the way the mission was handled. Apparently General Marshall insisted upon keeping a kind of state department within the State Department. His own appointee, General Carter, was brought in, and all the Marshall reports came to him, and were then transmitted direct to the President. Thus, whatever the exact truth about the original instructions, the policy for China from the day the general received his terms of reference until he left China was as much the policy of General Marshall as of anyone else.

Fulbright Exchange-of-Students Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, as an example of what is being done under the exchange-of-students program, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter, dated May 7, 1951, from R. Douglas Archer, a participant in the program, who came from Australia to the University of Minnesota, where he is taking postgraduate work in aeronautical engineering.

I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, in this connection, an editorial entitled "Fulbright Scholars," published in the New Orleans States on May 8, 1951.

There being no objection, the letter and the editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA,
INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY,
Minneapolis, Minn., May 7, 1951.

Hon. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT,
United States Senator,
Capitol Hill, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is nearly 8 months since I left Australia to go to the University of Minnesota for postgraduate study in aeronautical engineering. My journey, which covered nearly 10,000 miles, was free. It was a gift made possible by your inspiration and leadership and by the generosity of America.

For me this journey was the opportunity of a lifetime. At the magnificent Minnesota campus I have received very valuable advanced academic training. In addition, I have had time to travel at will within the United States, to wonder at the manifestations of technological progress, to observe for myself habits and customs, the very high standard of living and extensive distribution of wealth, to admire the American sense of moral values and of freedom, and, above all, to see the forms and operation of the institutions of self-government.

I am constantly amazed by the favorable difference between the facts and the impressions of America which I previously had, and what others would have one believe. It has been a refreshing and invigorating experience to say the least. You and your student exchange programme has brought great benefit to me and, as we know, to many thousands of students both foreign and American. I am certain that this is a tremendous force against ignorance, skepticism, and cynicism, and an immense power for extending understanding, hope, and faith in the future. May it continue to do so. May it embrace more young men around the world.

Please accept my sincere thanks.

Very truly yours,
R. DOUGLAS ARCHER,
Teaching Assistant.

[From the New Orleans States of May 8, 1951]

FULBRIGHT SCHOLARS

However much they are obscured by clouds from the battlefield, legislative assemblies, and international tribunals, forces for peace are at work today. These are the long-range forces to which civilization must tie its hopes.

In mind, immediately, is the Fulbright scholarship program now in its fifth year. What it does is to make possible on a scale hitherto inachievable international exchange of students. A basic cause of war is lack of international understanding between races and nationalities. Fulbright scholarships strike at this root of the trouble.

This coming year some 3,300 students of 20 countries will receive financial help in their postgraduate work at home and abroad. Seven hundred of those will be Americans who will go overseas to conduct research, lecture, study, or teach.

Money for the scholarships came from the sales of United States surplus war property left overseas after World War II. Part of the proceeds, in foreign currencies, was bartered for tuition and living expenses for students. All told, the funds were about $140,000,000 and earmarked to be spent over a 20-year period.

Connivance and crookery in the handling of some of the Nation's vast store of war surplus should not be allowed to hide the good to which much surplus was turned under the guidance of neighbor Arkansas' wise Senator J. W. FULBRIGHT.

The MacArthur Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a most thought-provoking statement entitled "My Stand." It was written by Mr. E. S. Weed, of the Marblehead (Mass.) Messenger, and I hope that my colleagues will take time to read it.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MY STAND

For my own part General MacArthur is the true American. I doubt if there has been more considered, more thoughtful, and more honest testimony given before any Senate committee in our history. I wish to say this, that if we are going to divert from the aims and hopes and purposes, as they have been expressed in all the testimony of General MacArthur, for an uncertain peace, then I for one believe we are moving in the wrong direction.

There is only one answer to all of what the general says, and that is the answer which General Marshall and President Truman have given, that they are buying time in order to save the peace, well knowing the destructive results of a third world war. Both Truman and Marshall believe that time can be bought, while MacArthur believes that it cannot be bought at a social profit.

I have said several times that I am unable to see any difference between the situation which we face now with respect to communism and that which England and France faced in the thirties with respect to Hitlerism. At that time, when Hitler was raging, Churchill said that the issue should be met squarely, that there should be no appeasing and that every minute which passed was a minute added to the assets of the enemy. Chamberlain said then what Truman and Marshall have said. All three have striven for peace fearing a breakdown of civilization in the event of war. The destructive use of gas in those days was thought to be such as would destroy civilization. And now are there similar thoughts with respect to the atom bomb?

Chamberlain certainly exchanged time for the sake of peace.

I should like to suggest some differences in the picture had Chamberlain continued to buy time for the sake of peace, let us say for 12 months longer than he did. This assumption being a fact, the Second World War would have run its course a year later than it did.

In the winter of 1945, in fact 6 months before the end of the German war the snorkel submarine was put into use, and the speed of the submarine under water, run up to 30 knots. During the month of December 1944, 32 vessels of 10,000 tons or more were sunk in the English Channel within a 10-mile area between Cherbourg and Southampton. I spent the entire evening, the night before Christmas, shuffling the dead from ship to shore, the result of a transport sinking 2 miles from the Cherbourg breakwater. More than 8,000 bodies passed over our decks between 6 o'clock and 1 o'clock in the evening. These submarines would have roamed over the ocean for somewhat more than 18 months. We had no defense except to keep out of sight. What effect would that have had upon the war?

It was in the fall of 1944 when the American armies were on German territory when the first German jet planes with rockets were used. Our armies would have had to face those jet and rocket planes, infinitely superior to our own in the Normandy landing. Would the results have been different?

V1 and V2 were born in July of 1944 and turned against England. Instead of a few months nearly 2 years of V1 and V2 bombings would have been turned on England. Only a fluke stopping of the bombing in 1941 saved the English nation from surrender. Any honest Englishman will tell you that. What would have been the result had V1 and V2 been used in England for 24 months.

I have read thoroughly the writings of Churchill, and of Eisenhower and Bradley. I saw some of the activities myself. Had Chamberlain tried to buy peace for another 12 months there would have been no England and no France and the Power of Hitler would have been far greater than that which the Russians now possess.

As MacArthur has said and as Marshall has said, and as anyone with sense should know, nothing but life can be gained from war. Only a fool would advocate it as an instrument of policy.

The goal of peace should be sought wherever all men know that war is futile. But peace cannot be sought where there are men who do not know or do not care of or about the futility of war.

During the last 20 years there have come into this world groups of people who do not seem to understand that war is futile. Mussolini was one. Hitler was another. And the Russian dictatorship is made up of others. The proof of this is that, well knowing the horrors and the costs of war, they have in fact started a war, and a war in proportion as damaging as the First World War. As long as these kind of leaders are in control anywhere on earth the survival of other people will have to be fought for and should be fought for at whatever cost.

The time we are buying now is as much of an asset to the communistic world as it was to the German world. The Russian nation is in the formative stage, industrially and scientifically. At maturity and lacking the moral values which are held dear by civilized people the communistic program as it is being carried out by the Russian people can and will destroy the civilized world.

The time to act is now.

The Oil Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the Petroleum Engineer Publishing Co. entitled "What's Wrong With Being an Oil Company?"

I have received this through the courtesy of Hon. Walter S. Hallanan. The principle expounded in the article could apply to steel, textiles, mining, agriculture, transportation, and many other industries in our country.

The heads of oil companies have also done much for the advancement of culture and religion in our country. In Pennsylvania, the Mellons, as head of Gulf Oil; the Pews, as head of Sun Oil; and the Benedums, as head of a group of companies, have made large contributions for the promotion of health, welfare, good government, and the work of religion.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT'S WRONG WITH BEING AN OIL COMPANY?

(By Ernestine Adams)

(We have reached a point where we are fed up with this papa-knows-best attitude of a group that tries to be the advance agent for national socialism. This clique seems particularly to desire a devitalized, clinging oil industry that will put its faith in a bureau and maybe end up with a subsidy. If United States citizens realized the spectacular contributions to the Nation of the oil industry under its own initiative, they would beware of trading it off for the supine, controlled ghost of an industry that the conspiracy of socialism would have them accept. The oil industry has been a silent whipping boy for imagined ills long enough. It's time to look at the record—and what a record.)

I'm getting tired of hearing about those "rich oil companies." I'm getting tired of hearing former Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes talk about rich oil companies growing "merrily wealthier out of oil belonging to the whole people," and tired of Columnist Drew Pearson shuddering piously every time he mentions an oil company or an oilman. I'm getting tired of the implication that for an oil company to exist is an affront, and for one to be rich is sinful.

Will someone tell me what is wrong with being an oil company or with an oil company's being rich? How long do you think an oil company would last if it didn't handle a lot of money? It takes barrels of the stuff just to keep a company going.

And who is going to find and produce and process oil if not the oil companies? The Socialist answer is—the Government, but no government yet has been able to build a successful oil industry, although lots of them have tried. The Soviet Government, for instance, has the greatest potential oil resources in the world, and it runs its own industry as you have probably heard. Do you know how much gasoline you would get for your car if all our cars were in Russia and you got a full share of all that was made? You would get less than 5 gallons a year. That's a year—not a week or a month. Now how would you like that? Actually you wouldn't get a gallon because it is all reserved for government and the war machine. In the United States you buy on the average nearly 700 gallons of gas a year for your car and there is no shortage to stop you.

Where do the oil companies get their money? Out of the earth? Oh, no. That's where a lot of people make a mistake. Oil brings wealth only as it is transformed into useful goods. The oil companies get their money right out of your pockets. They coax it out of you with the biggest bargains on the face of the earth. You can have all the gasoline you want and at the world's lowest prices. You can have varnish and insect spray, synthetic rubber and machine oil, nail polish and floor wax. You can have gas in your house and your factory, and if the pipeline doesn't connect, you can have liquid gas in tins to hook on your stove or refrigerator.

You get some products you didn't even know had petroleum in them. It is in your soap and detergents—oh, wonderful oil companies that thought up detergents. It is in your nylons to prevent runs, in your lipstick to keep it moist, in covers of your books to prevent cracking, in your raincoat, your shoes, your medicine, your paper lamp shade, your roof—on and on and on you can go.

In fact, let's face it—you pay the oil companies billions of dollars a year—about $7,000,000,000 last year—for all kinds of things that make it easier to live.

And what do these bloated capitalist do with those buckets of greenbacks, you'd like to know. First they have almost 2,000,000 employees who get the biggest dip into the kitty. Employees get paid better than most, which is as it should be because a lot of them have to have a technical or scientific education and years of specialized training. There aren't many strikes, you'll notice, and the rare ones they have are in the refining industry. In the drilling end things are free and easy. If you go broke drilling dry holes, you may be working for your driller next year. Plenty of roughnecks or roustabouts think they'll have a right of their own one day, and a good many of the high moguls in the industry who look as though they never saw a shovel have dug many a slush pit in their day.

These big wheels get big pay—about on the level with other industries, except that there are more of them. There aren't many automobiles companies, for instance, but there are a bunch of big oil companies and thousands of little ones. The Oil Information Committee says there are 36,000 companies in the industry.

Well, to get on with it, they've got some billions left after paying the help, so they give Uncle Sam his—which means a few more billions. The oil industy pays the biggest tax bill of any industry. In fact, some $3,500,000,000 a year goes for Federal, State, and local taxes levied on the oil industry and its products. This is about 7 percent of all taxes paid.

Yet President Truman calls this gross undertaxation and all the "gimme" boys chime in. What do they want? A crippled industry that has to be propped up by Government subsidies?

If a profit is made—it isn't always—the stockholders get theirs. Since you customers are so steady now, the dividends over the years average up about like preferred bonds. This takes care of several millions more people who have their hands—or money, that is—in the oil business.

THEY DRILL ANY PLACE

With the billions that are left the oil company does as fast a job of getting ahead as you're likely to find. The companies drill holes any place that looks as if it might have oil. They drill as deep as 4 miles, they drill in the desert, in the jungle, in the ocean; the derrick may be standing in sticky waves of heat or may be covered with thick ice. They drill where savage tribes have wrecked the rig, and where a plane has to bring in the machinery. They got no sense at all. Oil is where you find it, they say. They spend buckets of money. They spend a million and a half sometimes for one hole and get no oil, either. They spend millions just to find out where to put the drill down. They pay some more millions to a million or so other people for the privilege of using their land to drill on. If the drill hits an oil sand, they give the owner of the land a proportionate share of the oil they find.

And what if the oil is next door to the end of the world with no customers in sight? They build a pipeline to the sea or to a refinery, which they also have to build, then build a harbor so the tankers they build or buy can take the oil to you customers. They have to put up a lot of cash before you drive into a filling station and say "Fill 'er up." It may be a year or two before the money begins coming back. It may be 10 years. It may be never.

THEY MAKE ANYTHING

Of course, you have no use for that black crude oil, and so the refining comes in. This process takes tons of crude oil and separates the molecules, then pieces them together to give them a new look. There are plants that do one thing—like separate gasoline from gas, and plants that do dozens of things. There are plants that make powdered sulfur out of gas and plants that only process materials for other plants that make dyes, plastics, explosives, or drugs. There are plants that take out certain wanted hydrocarbons and put the dry gas back in the oil formation to bring up more hydrocarbons, like a dumb-waiter.

A refinery is always expanding, renovating, adding, experimenting, and revising. It has to keep ahead of you customers—it has to provide more gasoline in the summer and more fuel in winter from the same spot and with the same crude oil. The inventions in this line come so fast and furious that you stay in there pitching or go broke. So the oil companies part with a few more billions because they have to keep up. They have to make the best petroleum products possible and make them at such low cost that you can't resist putting out your money.

The companies also hire some of the top scientists to study how methods in the industry can be improved and how better products can be made. They have to have big laboratories and smart technical staffs. They have laboratories that work only on agricultural uses of petroleum and laboratories that test a hundred uses of petroleum in everything from paints to pavements. They spend about one-fourth what all United States industry spends on research.

Since the war, the oil industry has spent $12,000,000,000 making improvements and expanding facilities. In the United States, the oil industry now has an investment of $32,000,000,000, or $200 for each man, woman, and child in the Nation.

Do they expect to make this towering investment pay? In time, yes. And then what will they do with the buckets of dough they will make, these rich oil companies?

WHAT THEY'LL DO

What they have been doing all along.

Drill more wells and find more oil so we won't run short in peace or war.

Build bigger and longer pipelines from fields to refineries and from refineries to customers so the supply is always available.

Construct better refineries to make fancier products that will fill more needs in your life.

So you see why I am tired of hearing about rich oil companies. The people are getting the people's oil and gas resources—more people are getting more than under any other plan ever devised. Several millions of persons are getting benefits from oil and gas operations in wages and salaries, dividends and royalties, pensions and contracts, profits on sales and commissions.

Everyone in the United States benefits from the use of low-cost petroleum products—a use that has launched and shaped our modern life.

The whole world benefits from the fact that oil resources grow in the hands of free enterprise and stagnate under the thumb of government monopoly. The whole huge Communist world has about 9 percent of the world's production of oil—the free world has 91 percent, all developed by individual capitalist oil companies, which spend to good effect the riches we pay them for their goods.

So let us give the oil companies their due and admit they provide us the best service ever given on developing oil and gas reserves and transforming them into useful and vital products. Their service cost is low, too, come to think of it.

Why Farmers Will Stop Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. SMITH

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include the following article from the Progressive Farmer, by Charles Morrow Wilson, together with an introduction by Dr. Clarence Poe:

[From the Progressive Farmer of May 1951]

We are here printing the second half of one of the most important articles we have published in recent years—Farmers Will Stop Communism, by Charles Morrow Wilson. Mr. Wilson, a native of Arkansas, whose business in managing large tropical plantations has taken him all over the world, makes this plain—that communism was made especially for city wage earners and hence never can fit the desires of farmers whose highest ambition is to own and love some bit of land as their very own.

Instead of freeing the peasant farmer from slavery to the landlord, communism merely makes him an equally hopeless slave of the state. Senator Borah once said, "Three basic needs of every man are: something to own, something to love, something to worship." Atheistic communism's disbelief in God, in family ties, and in land ownership repudiates all this. Hence I believe farmers the world over will indeed stop communism. But to make sure of this, all America must try to encourage more home ownership, fairer rents, and better farm methods among the poverty-cursed millions we discussed on this page last month. At no great cost farmers cooperative demonstration work such as Dr. Seaman Knapp used to revolutionize southern farming methods could bring new hope and better living for those 1,000,000,000 underprivileged folk in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. I commend to all readers Mr. Wilson's second chapter.

CLARENCE POE,
President and Editor.

WHY FARMERS WILL STOP COMMUNISM

(By Charles Morrow Wilson)

I believe what I see. Early in 1938 I went to Cuba to learn about sugarcane farming. In Cuba I began to see and learn about what was (and still is) there called communism. It is basically different from the Kremlin line, however much Moscow tries to influence it.

Promptly I heard of Communist headquarters in principal cities in Central and South America—Habana, Mexico City, Kingston (Jamaica), Bogota, and elsewhere. But like so many other newcomers, I observed that the hired help of what was then called the third international was firmly attached to the cities, within easy walking distances of the better barrooms. I learned, too, and at close range, that the overwhelming majority of the Latin Americans who were being called Communists are not that at all.

My first lesson in Cuba was particularly revealing. There had been a great deal of labor strife in the sugar-milling districts back of Santiago. Faced with badly sagged markets, the Cuban Government had dropped sugar quotas to the very floor. The big cane-grinding mills were running only 6 weeks a year. But an attempted Communist seizure of one of the great sugar strongholds of Cuba resulted in a complete flop.

After Cuba I went to Central America, to a succession of banana farms in the hot, green valleys of Guatemala and Honduras, west Costa Rica, and south-coast Panama. Those were the closing 1930's and the beginning 1940's when there were deluges of talk about the Caribbean and South America going Red. The Kremlin branch offices were springing up like ragweeds in April. The radical Toledano labor unions were seeping across many boundaries south of the Rio Grande. Soviet Russia had assigned to the area Comrade Oumanski, an exceptionally able propagandist whom the Kremlin made U. S. S. R. Ambassador to Mexico and Costa Rica. Throughout the entire area, depression, joblessness, and political unrest were altogether too plentiful. The times were distinctly ripe for the Commies, and from their standpoint taking over was a now-or-never proposition.

The Reds failed much more decisively than was generally reported. There are many reasons why they failed. One was that the Communist Party employees were preponderantly incompetent. The U. S. S. R. had some brilliant men; but not enough to go around. Furthermore, Soviet know-how regarding the needs and viewpoints of the tropics is far under par. Marxism, and all the Kremlin gang leaders have been able to do to and with it, which is a great deal, is still an industrial credo for industrial places and cold places. It has never taken real account of the generosity of nature and producing earth.

Soviet brain-trusters have never understood the farmer and his viewpoint either at home or abroad. This preeminent weakness grows more apparent as and where the ratio of farmers to the total population keeps rising.

The United States, like most of West Europe, has become a majority industrial and city-or-town Nation. But as one goes south in either hemisphere, the percentage of farm people keeps rising. About two-thirds of all the Caribbean peoples are farmers. In many parts of South America this ratio rises to 80 percent or higher. About the same holds true for most of Africa and most of the great fertile areas of Southeast Asia.

Josef Stalin has defined communism as a "man-made way of thinking." But farming is the most literal, the most demandingly factual of all the great professions. Throughout most of the world, as in the United States, a farmer remains a very distinctive combination of worker, property owner, executive, and planner. It is impossible, at least up to date, to hatch out any ideology or "ism" which takes care of all these activities in one breath or dose.

I have learned this in many different countries. In my early farming days in Central America, I worked with a farm foreman named Juan Ramirez, who made an exceptionally accurate diagnosis of the way the great majority of our southern neighbors think about communism. "Here we live in our own world," he said. "Communism like the other foreign "isms" calls to us from another world. * * * As we use it in these countries 'Communist' is mainly a word in politics—what men in office call those who want to be—between elections. But communism, the kind the Russians preach, does not belong in lands such as ours. It is dreamed up for the big cold cities where many poor people can easily starve and where men must work close together in factories and walk on pavements where corn and beans will not grow."

This point of view, as I have learned during nine busy years among farmers from the Rio Grande to Cape Horn, represents one of the toughest challenges that Stalin & Co. have to face and answer.

But this very basic viewpoint is by no means limited to the Western Hemisphere. It is a world institution. Quite personally I have followed farmers' viewpoints in an even dozen American nations. In general it is remarkably like our own, and it is overwhelmingly against communism. In general, these Latin-Americans are good neighbors and good and honorable Christian people who truly love the land. Accordingly they have the makings of great farmers. Farming in Central and South America has a long way to go before it overtakes or even approaches ours. But on the whole its gains during the past dozen years have set a world record.

It is well, therefore, for us in North America to look south again. Also southwest and southeast, where at present about half the human race lives. The fact is being pointed out that the peoples of lower Asia, numbering about three-quarter billion, and in Africa, numbering about 160,000,000, have never yet lived well enough to understand what democracy can mean, and that we have not told them effectively what it does mean.

As a firsthand student of farming in many lands I have yet to meet one farmer in any land who is at heart a Communist. In the middle 1940's I went to equatorial West Africa to work on and learn about rubber plantations, coco, oil palm, and tribe farming in darkest Africa where I met and talked with some of the greatest farmers I have ever known anywhere. Some of them are tribal chiefs; the majority are commoners. Some were scholars, graduates of renowned universities of England, the United States, and Europe. Many of them work lands that are owned by the community or tribe. But throughout all my African roamings I never met a farmer yet who is a Soviet-style Communist, or even a reasonable copy thereof.

Three years ago, when the Kremlin was opening its momentously busy propagandizing in Southeast Asia, I made a trip to lower India, Siam, Singapore, and Malaya and briefly into Java and some fringes of Sumatra. In ports and other cities, I heard a great deal about the wonders of communism and the windness of the "comrades" in the cold and distant Kremlin. Here again the propagandists were city slickers bound to the street lights and fashionable bars, but very evidently not inclined to swinging on plowshares or bumping along on tractor seats or viewing and caring about what grows from the good earth. There is great poverty and much human desperation in Southeast Asia, in fact in most of Asia. There are tremendous problems and tremendous faults about lower Asia. There are none that communism has solved or can solve. Ten years ago Communist China was in desperate straits agriculturally. Its farm quandaries are worse today and they are going to be worse tomorrow.

The iron curtain has shut off all dependable news from Russia. But we know that Soviet agriculture, practically speaking, has a truly dismal record.

The important truth stands that the Kremlin gang has not been able to get along with Russian farmers. Also that they have made less than no progress at all in getting along with farmers beyond Soviet boundaries. This reporter has heard and seen a great many things during a busy, far-traveled lifetime. But as yet I have never seen a good farmer anywhere in the world who is actually a Communist. After 45 years of being a farmer, and living and working among farmers, I don't expect to. But I am entirely convinced that what real farmers think and feel will win the world for democracy.

Inland Waterways Face New Demands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to submit an article by Mr. John L. Springer, published in the Washington Sunday Star of date May 13, 1951, as follows:

INLAND WATERWAYS FACE NEW DEMANDS
(By John L. Springer)

Once again the national defense effort is putting pressure on the Nation's transport facilities. And once again a heavy burden is falling on the unsung branch of transportation—the inland waterways.

In World War I the railroads were overwhelmed with shipments. So much war material piled up in freight yards that the success of the war effort itself was jeopardized. In desperation Army engineers began to exploit the almost forgotten inland rivers and canals. The freight bottleneck was broken.

In the early days of World War II Nazi submarines lurking off the Atlantic coast sank so much allied seagoing shipping that desperate measures again had to be taken. Once more shippers turned to the inland waterways and another crisis was averted.

America's watery roads now face new demands. There are 27,500 miles of them—equivalent in length to seven coast-to-coast railroads. Slightly less than half of this total is taken up by the vast Mississippi system, with the 30 navigable rivers and canals which flow into it. The Atlantic coast and Gulf of Mexico coast rivers make up much of the remainder and the Pacific coast rivers are also a factor. The Great Lakes are not included.

In 1949 these waterways carried an estimated 170,000,000 tons of freight.

Often barges are wired together to form a floating freight train. These barges may carry as much as 3,000 tons of freight each—coal and oil barges, carriers with tier after tier of new automobiles en route to showrooms, ore barges heading for steel mills, barges with assorted cargoes like sand, chemicals, and sugar. Twenty of these barges in a train will measure more than a thousand feet long—longer than the Queen Elizabeth.

Paradoxically, shipping by inland waterway is one of the oldest ways of delivering freight in the United States and also one of the newest. In pioneer days, before the days of railroads and trucks, most freight went by water. Those were the days when the Mississippi was jam-packed with traffic.

Then in the case of most of them, weeds sprang high along their banks and silt settled on their bottoms. Almost nobody cared. When the World War I crisis came, however, Army engineers dredged and widened the channels. Since then the inland waterways have increased in their importance to the national economy.

Stop the Shipment of Strategic Materials and War Goods to the Chinese Reds by Our European Allies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it is time drastic action was taken by our Nation to stop the shipment of strategic war material to the Red Chinese by our so-called European allies. Already we have supplied the fighting forces in the Korean war. Little or no help has come from the United Nations. This situation is bad enough, but, it is made even worse by the help that is given our enemies by shipping strategic war material either direct to the Red Chinese, or, indirectly through Russia and its satellites. This situation was brought to the attention of our State Department in the summer of 1950, shortly after the Korean war started, but it has been permitted to continue all of the intervening months. In the meantime we have suffered 60,000 or more casualties. Our first duty is to our American boys. If European nations cannot be depended upon to help us they should at least be required to stop helping our enemies.

I have included as part of my remarks, in accordance with the consent granted, paragraphs 7, 8, and 9 of the Foreign Letter, No. 1673, of the Whaley-Eaton Service, dated May 8, 1951. It reads as follows:

7. Only now are the European allies getting around to banning the sale of strategic, as well as direct war goods, to the Chinese Reds. No successful effort has been made anywhere to halt the smuggling of all manner of critical materials and specialized machine tools behind the iron curtain. Britain has reversed her position in the U. N. on a strategic blockade of China. This is, in part, due to the internal outcry over heavy British casualties in the recent counter-offensive in Korea. The Grenadiers reportedly have suffered 1,000 casualties.

8. A complete and successful embargo on the movement on only a few items into Russia could cripple the Communist war effort. Best information available is that the Soviet does not have sufficient domestic supplies of tantalum, molybdenum, chromium, tungsten, cobalt, or nickel. Without these commodities she cannot produce armor plate, high-temperature steels needed in jet engines, cutting tools, gun barrels, armor-piercing projectiles, much essential electronics gear—in fact, most of the weapons of war. These are the things Russia will pay any amount for in any quantity from whatever source, as well as ball bearings, industrial diamonds, specialized machinery and plans and specifications of the West's newest industrial machinery and techniques.

9. Throughout much of Europe, smuggling is on such a scale as to have the appearance of legality. Even through legitimate trade channels there are still many serious leaks. Both Switzerland and Sweden, of course, are neutral. Many exports, banned to Red communities by the United States, are not banned by other Pact countries. For instance, Russia has on order more than 80 merchant vessels, including oil tankers. Most of them are being built in ECA countries—Allied—shipyards.

Appeasement of Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, there have been many loose charges of appeasement during the course of recent discussion of foreign policy. In a recent editorial the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, a great newspaper, marshaled a very compact set of pertinent facts which merit attention in this respect. Because of the particular enlightenment it affords at this time I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SO MUCH NONSENSE

Commonest of the charges against the Truman administration from the minority party orators these days is that the Government's policy is one of "appeasement of communism."

This complaint is repeated and repeated by opposition speakers who have their eyes on 1952. It is echoed so often that some people may be coming to believe it solely because of the frequent reiteration.

For example, Senator TAFT made it a major part of his theme when he debated foreign policy with Senator DOUGLAS, of Illinois, before the American Society of Newspaper Editors. In view of the record, the Ohio Republican said that he was afraid the administration was getting ready to "appease" the Reds in the Pacific.

Since there is so much talk of appeasers, appeasing, and appeasement, why not have a look at the facts and see how well—or how poorly—founded the charges are?

After a careful check of the record since Harry S. Truman entered the White House 6 years ago, we conclude that there are five American entries of transcendent importance in the field of foreign affairs. These are the Truman doctrine, the Marshall plan, the Berlin airlift, the Atlantic pact and the stand to stop military aggression in Korea.

Let us examine each briefly and see how it fits in with the charge that the United States Government now is engaged in a policy of appeasement of communism.

1. Truman doctrine: Announced March 12, 1947, by the Executive in a historic address to Congress, it called for $400,000,000 in aid and American military and economic advisers to stop the spread of militant communism in Europe. Particularly Mr. Truman proposed immediate help for Greece and Turkey, then under heavy Soviet pressure. By this doctrine it became the policy of the United States "to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or outside pressure."

Just where is the appeasement in that?

2. Marshall plan: Proposed June 5, 1947, at Harvard by George C. Marshall, then Secretary of State, the European Recovery Act became law December 17 the same year. The enacting session of Congress was one which Mr. Truman called October 23, expressly to consider and pass legislation to help European nations build up their economy so as to resist Communist infiltration and propaganda. The first ECA appropriation was for $540,000,000 to shore up China, France, Italy, and Austria, all then under heavy pressure from the Kremlin and its agents.

Senator TAFT, in the Senate Friday, admitted that the State Department has stood firm against communism in Europe, but argued that "appeasement" has been the policy in Asia. The fact is that our Government in the 4 years after VJ-day gave Chiang Kai-shek loans and grants totaling more than $2,000,000,000. In addition we turned over to Chiang for his fight against the Communists arms that originally cost us more than a billion dollars. As Senator MCMAHON said, we gave Chiang enough arms to equip 89 divisions, and artillery and planes besides.

Just how was that the work of appeasers?

3. Berlin airlift: When the Communists threw a land blockade around Berlin, the Truman administration surmounted it by building an air bridge from West Germany to the American, British, and French sectors of the beleaguered city. Begun June 26, 1948, the airlift of more than 275,000 flights cost the United States some $300,000,000 and the British about $40,000,000. Seventy airmen lost their lives in accidents incident to the heroic efforts to keep the Allied parts of Berlin supplied with wood and fuel. When the airlift was completed, September 30, 1949, it had been in operation for 15 months.

Just how was that a demonstration of appeasement?

4. Atlantic Pact: Made public March 18, 1949, this treaty joined the signatory Atlantic area nations in a common security agreement to last at least 20 years. Members pledged themselves that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all. The parties also declared that they will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack. In the event of such attack, all member nations pledged to assist the party or parties attacked forthwith, with armed force.

Just how did that take on the color of appeasement?

5. Korean defense: When the Korean Communists crossed the thirty-eighth parallel, June 25, 1950, the United States took the lead at the U. N. in gathering the strength of free nations against the naked Red aggression. Almost at once American air and naval forces were put on the side of the South Korean defenders. In a few days, American ground troops were sent in. For 9 months the war has raged and more than 50,000 casualties have been suffered by the United States. Only the two World Wars and the Civil War have brought this Nation more battle losses. And tragically, more are still to come.

Just in what way is this appeasement?

These questions, of course, require no answers. This record speaks for itself. Let Senator TAFT and the other 1952 political hopefuls shout "appeasement" all they like. They only measure themselves when they do it.

The Truman administration has its faults—all too many faults. But appeasing communism is not one of them.

To say so is to prate so much political nonsense.

The Foreign Policy Dispute

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT S. KERR
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from a very interesting and instructive interview on foreign policy given by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], and broadcast over 10 West Virginia radio stations on May 13, 1951.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT ON FOREIGN POLICY FROM RADIO INTERVIEW WITH SENATOR HARLEY M. KILGORE OVER 10 WEST VIRGINIA STATIONS ON MAY 13, 1951

ANNOUNCER. Now, Senator KILGORE, what about the foreign-policy debate?

Senator KILGORE. My firm belief is that the main issue in the foreign-policy dispute is simply this: Can we afford at this time to follow Gen. Douglas MacArthur's military recommendations regarding our policy in Asia or should we continue to pursue our present global strategy? From all of the facts I have been able to obtain—and I might say they come from supporters of both policies—I have reached the conclusion that we should take every honorable step to avoid an all-out war with Red China at this time. This is not an easy course of action. It is one that requires clear thinking, patience, and courage. Gen. George Marshall, Secretary of Defense, set forth his views on this great issue in clear, concise terms. Testifying before the joint meeting of the Senate Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committees, he emphasized, and I quote:

"This fundamental divergence is one of judgment as to the proper course of action to be followed by the United States." Then he said: "This divergence arises from the inherent difference between the position of a field commander, whose mission is limited to a particular area and a particular antagonist, and the position of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Secretary of Defense, and the President, who are responsible for the total security of the United States, and who, to achieve and maintain this security, must weigh our interests and objectives in one part of the globe with those in other areas of the world so as to attain the best over-all balance."

ANNOUNCER. Senator, I do not wish to interrupt, but judging from the letters from many people throughout the Nation, there is a great question as to where this global policy will lead us in terms of the Korean war.

Senator KILGORE. Yes; I know that some people in and out of the Congress are saying that the administration is following an appeasement policy in Asia. I wish to emphasize in the strongest manner I know how that I disagree completely with that view. By and large this charge comes from officials who have opposed our foreign policy since the end of World War II. The late Senator Arthur Vandenberg, a truly great statesman, was bitterly opposed by many of these same people. In recent days both President Truman and General Marshall have emphasized that "our objective in Korea continues to be the defeat of the aggression and the restoration of peace." In his testimony, General Marshall pointed out that in our efforts to confine the conflict to Korea and to prevent its spreading into a third world war, we stand allied with a great majority of the members of the United Nations. He reviewed the Korean situation in these words:

"Our efforts have succeeded in thwarting the aggressors in Korea, and in stemming the tide of aggression in southeast Asia and elsewhere throughout the world. Our efforts in Korea have given us some sorely needed time and impetus to accelerate the building of our defenses and those of our allies against the threatened onslaught of Soviet imperialism."

ANNOUNCER. Senator, from all indications, that last statement will be debated vigorously in Congress. What do you think will be the outcome?

Senator KILGORE. First, let me explain that I have always said that I thought a vigorous foreign policy debate—conducted on a basis of issues rather than passions and personalities—would be a fine thing for the country.

I hope that every American will carefully weigh the possible consequences of General MacArthur's policies before reaching a decision on this vital issue. Certainly every American should consider very carefully these words of General Marshall. He said:

"General MacArthur would have us, on our own initiative, carry the conflict beyond Korea against the mainland of Communist China, both from the sea and from the air. He would have us accept the risk involved not only in an extension of the war with Red China, but in all-out war with the Soviet Union. He would have us do this even at the expense of losing our allies and wrecking the coalition of free peoples throughout the world. He would have us do this even though the effect of such action might expose Western Europe to attack by the millions of Soviet troops poised in Middle and Eastern Europe."

In a time of crisis there is a natural tendency on the part of some people to seek some easy way out. All too often we have followed such a course prior to World War II, and I think the consequences of those actions should be clear by now. I pray that we will not get ourselves into the position of going it alone in Asia. I am afraid that if our Nation should decide to adopt that type of program, we would suffer terrible consequences. Let me quote briefly from a recent speech of President Truman on that score. He said: "If we go it alone in Asia, we may destroy the unity of the free nations against aggression. Our European allies are nearer to Russia than we are. They are in far greater danger. If we act without regard to the danger that faces them, they may act without regard to the dangers that we face. Going it alone brought the world to the disaster of World War II. We cannot go it alone in Asia and go it in company of Europe. The whole idea of going it alone is the opposite of everything we have stood for and worked for since World War II. In this way, going it alone in Asia might wreck the United Nations, the North Atlantic Treaty and the whole system of collective security we are helping to set up."

ANNOUNCER. But, Senator, there is another school of thought—judging by many of the letters to Congress—that charges the administration with bungling and failure in the whole field of foreign policy. Basically, this belief is that we have spent a great deal of money in Europe with little or nothing to show for it.

Senator KILGORE. I disagree completely. I well remember the great cry that the United Nations could not succeed. I well remember the great cry against the Marshall plan, the Truman doctrine of aid to Greece and Turkey, and the lesser cry against the North Atlantic Pact.

Since the end of World War II our national policy, shaped by those who have the responsibility for our national survival, with little help from those who sit back waiting for a chance to criticize, our national policy has been shaped in terms of two long-range objectives. These objectives are, in brief, the containment and eventual suppression of Communist aggression, and the prevention, if possible, of a third world war. This has been, of necessity, a global policy. It has had to take into consideration our total resources and what we are able to do on a world-wide scale. It has been a policy which had to be shaped and carried out with cool determination, and with intelligent and informed realism. The first great step was the application of the Truman doctrine in Greece and Turkey. This policy prevented the Communists from engulfing those two countries. The second great step was the development and application of the Marshall plan.

This program has been very successful. It enabled the democratic nations of Western Europe to thwart strong Communist movements that threatened to take over—not through external aggression—but through internal weakness that grew out of the war. The third great step has been our effort to stem Communist aggression in Korea.

ANNOUNCER. Senator, many letters to Congress ask, Can we afford to continue such a policy? Can we afford to continue pouring out our national resources? Can we continue to build up our Armed Forces without wrecking our economy?

Senator KILGORE. My personal view is that we must not relax. The consequences would be very dangerous. We must continue to build up our defenses; we must continue to strengthen our allies. If we had followed the policies of those who have opposed these great measures, we would today—this very day—be without allies of any strength. We would be living in a world in which the iron curtain had moved ever closer to us, taking over nation after nation.

The MacArthur Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, for further clarification of one phase of the controversy over General MacArthur, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Not My Responsibility," which appeared in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch on May 5.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOT MY RESPONSIBILITY

Senator BRIEN MCMAHON brought out perhaps the most telling point of the MacArthur hearings. When General MacArthur was explaining his view that the Korean war can be expanded without provoking direct Soviet intervention, Senator MCMAHON asked him how he proposed to defend the Nation if his hunch should turn out to be mistaken. General MacArthur replied.

"That doesn't happen to be my responsibility, Senator. My responsibilities were in the Pacific, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the various agencies of this Government are working day and night for an over-all solution to the global problem."

Later Senator MCMAHON, pursuing the idea that an expansion of the war in Asia might lead to a further expansion of it into Europe, asked the general if he considered the Allies ready today to withstand an attack in Western Europe. General MacArthur replied:

"Senator, I have asked you several times not to involve me in anything except my own area. My concepts on global defense are not what I am here to testify on. I do not pretend to be the authority now on those things. When I was the Chief of Staff 20 years ago, that was my problem and I would have answered it. The Chief of Staff or others here are the ones to answer that query, not me."

There is the controversy in a nutshell. A decision to expand the Korean war cannot possibly be taken solely as a Pacific theater decision. Its implications are global in scope, yet General MacArthur is not willing to assume responsibility for the global consequences which might flow from the decision he advocates.

As we have often said, General MacArthur had every right to present privately to his superiors his own views on global as well as theater strategy. He was grievously mistaken in carrying the controversy into the political arena when he was overruled. He displays a heedless lack of restraint when he describes as "all tommyrot" President Truman's statement that the general prevented Central Intelligence Agency from operating in his theater until last January. This report has come not only from President Truman but from other well-informed sources, and the country is entitled to a better answer from General MacArthur than an expletive.

Apart from the methods he has chosen to use, General MacArthur must be judged on the merits of the course he advocates. It is a course of expanded Asian war regardless of the consequences. General MacArthur regards anything else—even the limited war we are now fighting—as appeasement. He believes that war must be total, that war is the ultimate process of politics, and he says plainly that once a nation has gone to war, "you must trust the military" to make the vital decisions.

This is a concept so foreign to the whole American tradition that General MacArthur has done the country a service by explaining so frankly the philosophic background of his views.

Victory in the War in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial A Will To Win, which appeared in the May 14 edition of Life magazine.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A WILL TO WIN

A will to win is a wonderful thing to have in a fight. If you don't have it, as everyone knows from common experience, you are likely to get your ears beat off.

As everyone also knows or ought to know, a will to win is precisely what has been lacking lately in this country. The fashion is to say that it has been lacking in Washington, in the State Department, in the Pentagon, at the White House—and among the other countries of the free alliance. But the lack goes a lot deeper and has been a lot closer to home than that. Right down to the roots of our country, among the people of the United States, there has been a prevailing lack of a will to win the biggest fight that has ever engaged mankind.

Americans and their Government have had the will to do many things. To fight communism. To resist aggression. To prevent war. To join with other nations in what the President recently called the "high principle" of collective security. But the actions, policies, and purposes expressed in these and similar phrases have not added up to a will to win the struggle with the Communist enemy, whether in Korea or in the world at large. On the contrary they more often than not have been avenues of escape from the very thought of having to win.

Now all that is changing. A will to win—to win the battle in Korea; and to win the world struggle, in its several forms—is unmistakably shaping up in this country. It is shaping up slowly, with all the thought, the care, the hesitations called for by the burdens and the risks involved. But the time is near when a will to overcome the Communist enemy and win the world struggle may fairly be said to be the manifest will of America.

OUR MAIN ENEMY

This growth of national purpose is occurring in a very American way. A vast amount of noise accompanies it, causing some concern at home and much trepidation around the world. At such times faith and perception are needed—the kind of faith that assumes a healthy and fruitful outcome; and the perception to note and heed certain signs and characteristics of American debate which in the current instance point to a beneficial outcome.

One such sign is the emergence of individuals who have come to be symbols of a particular idea. Hitherto incoherent and perhaps unvoiced needs and purposes crystallize around them. Opposing views and instincts crystallize against them. The result, for a time, is violent and seemingly destructive controversy. Pundits and kindred sophisticates deplore the whole process, forgetting that the symbols can be effective only if they represent some trend that is real and strong in the country.

The foremost symbol of a will to win is General MacArthur. At the moment, and by his own doing, he is especially the symbol of a will to win the shooting wars. When he testified in Washington last week the shooting war on his mind was the one in Korea. With brilliance and passion he insisted that this war can be won and must be won. He chose to duck some other points in a fashion which at times seemed very weak and unconvincing, and his enemies no doubt will make the most of the defects. But he carried the day on many, many other points. His biggest point of all—his inclusive point was that "communism throughout the world" is "our main enemy"; that "the total power of communism throughout the world" must be diminished and eventually defeated; and that any objective short of the decisive defeat of the present enemy in Korea can mean nothing but a victory and an increase of strength for "communism throughout the world."

General MacArthur showed, among other things, what a will to win can do for clarity of mind. Billed as a man of inclusive and dangerous certainty about everything under the sun, he turned out to have only two certainties—that world communism is the main enemy, and that the United States ought to win its fights once it gets into them. He refused to be certain that the Soviet Union is the main enemy ("I said that communism throughout the world was our main enemy"). He refused to be certain that the Soviet Union is hell-bent on a general war (so far as he could see, the Soviet Union's own forces are mainly on the defensive). He refused to be certain that the Kremlin is the seat and center of enemy power ("How would I know?"). He refused to be certain that facing the fact of war with Communist China necessarily entails the overthrow of the Chinese Communist Government ("Our purpose * * * is to force China to * * * stop killing our boys in Korea"). He refused to be certain that after a year or two of building up our forces we will be better able to deal with Soviet power than we are now (How can we know, he asked with the wallop of common sense, that the Soviet Union isn't building up faster than we are?).

A VISION OF VICTORY

He refused, above all, to be certain that some of the most respected clichés of the day mean anything.

"Resisting aggression," for instance. General MacArthur said right out that he did not know what it meant, and abruptly suggested that "resisting aggression" means nothing unless the purpose is to defeat the aggressor.

Asked whether he believed in "collective security," he did not reply with automatic piety that he did. Instead he twice asked his badgering questioner, Senator McMAHON, "What do you mean by collective security?" Senator McMAHON meant "a military alliance to keep the peace." Merely by raising the question, General MacArthur left the revolutionary impression that "collective security" may just possibly mean nothing at all—until and unless it means a collective effort to overcome the common enemy.

As General MacArthur knows better than most, the decisive conflict and the decisive victory may be won by the side which is at its best in the nonshooting, or cold war. So far he has chosen to let others bespeak and symbolize the will to win that kind of war. In this respect, a perfect counterpoint to General MacArthur is provided by Paul Hoffman. His war—the war he understands, prefers, and hopes to make the only war—is the cold war. He has just written a book about it, wishfully mistitling it Peace Can Be Won (Doubleday, New York; $2.50). More than any other American in public life, Paul Hoffman typifies the will to win his kind of war and the United States is lucky to have him around. The country would be fortunate if more Americans really understood his vision of victory.

A sign of the times is that President Truman is at last constrained to say that he, too, wants to win. For the very first time in his painful progression from a fixed belief in "no war" to the reluctant recognition of "some war," the President last week used the verb "to win" in connection with the contest for freedom. Referring to recommended measures of military, economic, and political warfare, he said, "All these elements are essential to enable us to win the kind of struggle that the Kremlin has brought about."

In the same document—a letter explaining his latest defense budget—the President nevertheless held forth the same old balderdash of limited necessity and limited national effort. So long as the President and those around him deal in such inadequacies, he cannot expect to have the belief and confidence of the country when he speaks of winning. For leadership, and for the expression of what is right and needful, the country must continue to look instead to the MacArthurs, to the Hoffmans, and to the brave men who are dying without reward in Korea.

Seventy Years Young

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HALE BOGGS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 10, 1951

Mr. BOGGS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, several days ago Paul Wooton celebrated his seventieth birthday.

Paul Wooton is universally loved in our Nation's Capital.

As the Washington Post pointed out in an editorial, he is indeed a newspaperman's newspaperman. Throughout his long service he has subscribed to the code of honesty and fairness. I have never heard a person question the accuracy of a Paul Wooton story. He has never been too busy to lend a helping hand, to give a word of advice, or to write a line of praise.

When Mrs. Boggs and I first came to Washington, 11 years ago, he and his lovely wife, who has since passed to her reward, helped us find a place to live. His life epitomizes the noble thought that "it is better to give than to receive."

Not only has he brought honor and credit to himself, but he has also added tremendously to the prestige of the great newspaper he so ably represents, the New Orleans Times-Picayune.

Mr. Speaker, several days ago my colleague, Hon. FRANK SMITH, incorporated in the RECORD the Post editorial entitled "Seventy Years Young." It was a beautiful tribute.

Hoover Commission Recommendations for the Post Office Department

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, healthy criticism is a good thing for individuals and for Government agencies. It is in this spirit, that we constantly try to improve the various departments of Government, that I call attention to the following newsletter written by Mr. Louis F. Fowler, director of the United Business Service, recommending adoption of the Hoover Commission recommendations for the Post Office Department:

APRIL 7, 1951.

Here's your first quarter index and a visit over mail service.

I guess this is the first letter I've ever written to you, our clients, where I griped about anything, but when it comes to the present mail service, what else can one do?

Many of you have written me about the poor delivery service of our reports. We use first-class mail, and it is metered to expedite post-office handling.

It has been my privilege to serve off and on on the Postal Facilities Committee of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, twice as chairman. This, plus the fact that I have kept in close contact with postal affairs for the past 27 years, as we of the United Business Service are among Boston's largest mail users. In fact, the local post office has told us that we rank No. 1 as far as the volume of air mail going out of Boston is concerned.

We have written our Congressmen to get back of the nonpartisan report of the Hoover Commission, which would result in higher efficiency, lower costs, and service to the American public to which they are entitled from their post office. I am sure you will not accuse me of playing politics when I urge you to do the same.

We do not go to press until after the close of the New York stock market on Friday in order to give you up-to-the-minute information. Our presses run at least until midnight Friday, we begin inserting the reports in their envelopes at 7 a. m. on Saturday, and start delivering them to the post office within an hour. This should insure every client receiving their reports the first delivery Monday morning, which is the same time that clients located right here in Boston get theirs; no one can, therefore, under any conditions receive them before the close of the market on Saturday.

In contrast to deliveries here in the United States—we have clients throughout the world—we just received a letter from a client in Switzerland telling us that by air mail he receives the reports on Monday.

We do know, however, because of our close contact with the Boston post office, that our weekly reports are promptly dispatched by them to the airlines and the railway mail each Saturday. We tie them in bundles and deliver them ourselves in regular mail bags to the post office.

We certainly do everything we can to start the reports promptly on their way, so if you don't receive them promptly, I hope you will complain to your local post office. With enough complaints, this present unsatisfactory postal situation should, at least, improve somewhat.

Cordially,

LOUIS F. FOWLER,
Director of Service.

State of Israel: Anniversary Statement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, today is the third anniversary of the State of Israel. Wherever the ideas of independence, liberty, freedom are held as cherished human possessions, Israel's independence day is an event of importance. It is especially significant for us in this country because we had a great deal to do with the creation of Israel. Israeli leaders had not only our sympathy and support but they also had material and financial aid from this country.

This assistance was extended willingly and generously in the knowledge that it was for a good cause—the rescue of a victimized and distressed people and the restoration of their homeland.

In terms of years the history of the Republic of Israel is short indeed, but in terms of sheer accomplishments that brief history is extraordinary. Three years ago, at the time of the Israeli declaration of independence, the area of the country was circumscribed, having only 5,000 square miles with some 600,000 inhabitants. Today its area is more than 8,000 square miles and the population exceeds 1,250,000. The annual rate of immigrants exceeds 200,000. In this task of repatriation and settlement, the Government of Israel has worked most conscientiously. Every effort has been made and is being made to rescue suffering and destitute Jews from European and middle eastern countries. Of the immigrants totaling more than 500,000, about half have come—or fled—from the iron-curtain countries. More than 100,000 were brought in from Arab countries. Out of the "blood, sweat, and tears" the new Republic of Israel is being built as a model of progress and democracy in the Middle East. Let us hope that they will have the peace which is so necessary to the accomplishment of this purpose. Jews have always looked forward to the regaining of their historic homeland. During their centuries-long life in Diaspora they have devoutly cherished this deep-seated hope. Through their persevering efforts and their sacrifices, they have at last attained their goal. Let us hope, on this third anniversary of independence, the Republic of Israel will grow strong and prosperous and become a powerful factor for peace and progress in the Near East.

Teaching the American Way of Life

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I desire to call to the attention of the Congress and the country an editorial written by Robert D. Lynn, editor of the Shield and Diamond, the official publication of the Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity. In my opinion, it provides some food for thought for all those connected with the great profession of education—whether it be as educators; as school, college, or university administrators; as members of boards of education, or trustees and regents of higher institutions of learning; or as members of parent-teacher associations. It might also be read reflectively by those whose financial contributions comprise the great endowments which enable public institutions to serve a noble purpose. In brief, this editorial points up the fact that it is essential to follow through on the business of education in order to make certain that what is taught is designed to preserve and protect America, and to enrich its blessings, rather than to destroy the faith of our fathers and the capacity to appreciate those things about this country which are fundamentally sound and right.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROFESSOR, ARE YOU TEACHING THE AMERICAN WAY OF LIFE?

(By Robert D. Lynn)

Many fine youths have entered our institutions of higher learning expecting our democratic way of life as the routine way and the benefits of our democracy as fruits to be expected and enjoyed without thanks. During their university years they progress a step forward and become vocally critical of various democratic institutions and practices under the learned proddings and cynicisms of many professors who spend the major part of their time destroying rather than strengthening our great democracy.

This is no idle generalization. The results of the general trend in higher education in recent years toward such cynical criticism is graphically illustrated in statements made by several highly intelligent American citizens who have professed to following the Communist Party line. In his profound address before the All American Conference to Combat Communism, United States Senator KARL E. MUNDT, urged that every school in American include in its curriculum one course in "What's Right With America." He graphically indicated the need for such a course by reporting the testimony of Miss Elizabeth Bentley before the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

Senator MUNDT stated:

"I never want to have to listen again to what I heard from the lips of Miss Elizabeth Bentley, when our House Committee on Un-American Activities was conducting the investigation and I serving as chairman. J. Edgar Hoover says that she is the smartest woman spy ever to work in our country. She had under her domination a young man in the Commerce Department who was passing on the strategic aspect of our export of arms to Russia. One of Miss Bentley's boy friends confessed to the committee that he was giving her money but that it was not for Communist dues; that he was simply subscribing to the Communist Daily Worker for himself and some of the lads over at his rooming house. That was his defense; that is, if such an admission can be called a defense.

"So I asked Miss Bentley one day:

" 'Tell me, Miss Bentley, how in the world did you become an American spy working for the Communist government?'

"Pulchritudinous, pleasant, personable, from a fine old Republican, New England banking family, she had all the advantages of a public school education, a graduate of Vassar and of Columbia—how did she become a Communist?

"She said:

" 'Senator, let me tell you that in all my educational career, grade school, high school, college, and graduate school, I never had a single professor or teacher ever talk to me with enthusiasm about the virtues and values of the American system and without some kind of carping criticism that destroyed the glamor of the whole thing. Each of my teachers had a "yes-but" approach to our American virtues and each found as much to criticize or condemn in our environment as he found to praise. So when a Columbia University professor of mine took me to a Communist cell meeting, I heard a man for the first time in my life talking about politics, about economics, and about government with a gleam in his eye, with enthusiasm in his voice and with the force of a person who is convinced his way is right. Thus I was an easy push-over and I joined up with the Communists.'

"Whittaker Chambers and others have told us similar stories of how early school training had failed to impress upon them the virtues and values of our American success formula of freedom. As you all know, Alger Hiss was convicted by a jury of his peers here in New York City of perjuring himself by lying about his faithfulness to America and his fidelity to communism which led him to steal secret State Department papers and deliver them to a Communist espionage apparatus of which Chambers was one of the main operatives.

"The question is, who is responsible for Alger Hiss? I don't believe Harvard University can escape all responsibility. I don't believe his mentor there escaped by securing high judicial position either. Columbia University cannot escape all responsibility for Henry Julian Wadleigh. Hiss and Wadleigh were smart young men whose minds became perverted some place in the educational mill. It seems to me that in a college or university there is a responsibility to turn out citizens who are sound and who are right and who are patriots."

This is a serious charge, Professor. Is your teaching today responsible for some future Bentley or Hiss? Do you teach your students to became "citizens who are sound and who are right and who are patriots?"

Gromyko's Behavior

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from a recent issue of the Evening Star:

GROMYKO'S BEHAVIOR

For more than a month now, in a dreary grind of dreary sessions, the deputies of the Big Four Foreign Ministers have been meeting in Paris to work out an agenda for a full-dress Anglo-French-American-Russian conference to ease international tensions. But the net result of their efforts to date is nothing, or worse than nothing. Andrei Gromyko, the Soviet delegate, has seen to that. He has been at his ugly best in putting on an act that seems to make such a gathering virtually impossible.

At any rate, it is difficult to see how anything short of a complete change in Gromyko's behavior can save the Paris meeting from blowing up in a way that will end whatever hope may still exist for a big four conference. His threats, his insults, his insolence, his unparalleled invective, and especially his contemptible remarks about our American and allied United Nations forces in Korea have done such violence to the rules of diplomacy and simple, human decency that the western representatives can hardly put up with much more of the same without practicing the virtue of patience to the point of downright silliness. It is all well and good to make allowances for certain types of boors, but when they display their boorishness as if it were a mark of statesmanship, they have no right to be heard with forbearance.

There is no doubt, of course, that Gromyko's snarling conduct conforms with orders he has received from Moscow. He has made himself deliberately obnoxious (he has a personality naturally well suited to the role) because that is the way the men of the Kremlin want him to be. Their exact reason for this is anybody's guess, but the indications are that if they were sincere last November when they first proposed the big four conference, something has since happened to make them change their minds. Quite obviously their Deputy Foreign Minister in Paris is not behaving as if they really wished to hold one. Unless he puts an end soon to his insufferable nastiness, the western delegates ought to pack up their bags and head for home.

The International Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACK Z. ANDERSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I am including with my remarks one of the most thoughtfully written communications I have received from my constituency. I believe that Mr. and Mrs. Taylor have expressed the views of the average American citizen clearly and concisely. Their summary of the current international situation is similar to many others that I am receiving daily, and I commend their communication to the attention of my colleagues:

MENLO PARK, CALIF., May 2, 1951.
Representative JACK Z. ANDERSON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ANDERSON: Your form letter in reply to our telegram re MacArthur has just been received. We appreciate that in your press of business you found time to send even that acknowledgment.

We realize that you may never have the time to read this letter, but since we will probably never have the opportunity to talk with you personally, it was felt that one of us should try to put our collective thoughts into words. This is the first time we have ever written our Representatives in Congress and tried to put our political ideas on paper, so we hope you will find the time to read it—just so you will know that some of us try to think—even in our limited way.

We have talked much pro and con since this furor has arisen, among our family and friends. Our immediate family (both sides) number some thirty men and women. We are the middle groups, in age; in income; old enough to have served in World War II and still young enough to be called for any all-out military action now. Our sons, nephews and some brothers are now in Korea. We will pay for this action both in blood and taxes for years to come, so we naturally give it thought.

First, let us say we realize that any thought of impeachment is out of the question; there are insufficient grounds, and it would be poor statesmanship at this time, even though many hotheads advocate this.

Second, we do not question the President's right to remove General MacArthur—we have all been in one branch of the service or another, and understand very well the rules of military conduct—provided, of course—that a definite breach of such conduct actually occurred. What we do question is the humiliating manner in which this was done—a very poor reward for so many years of gallant and excelling military service.

Third, Democrat or Republican, we feel that this is a time when partisanship should be forgotten, for the good of our country should come before any thought of party politics.

Fourth, we feel our present foreign policy as carried out by our Secretary of State Acheson is definitely not to the good of the country. We do not, and never will believe in any form of appeasement—we question the right of the State Department to cater to the selfish desires of any foreign allied governments, when such desires are obviously motivated by a wish to gather the remnants of an already moth-eaten Empire, and particularly when the several allied governments have shown themselves to be so politically, financially and militarily unstable.

Fifth, the question of the possibility of war with Russia at this time, should General MacArthur's recommendations be carried out—it is, of course, possible, but we do believe highly unlikely. It is true that the Soviet forces are spread over much of the European Continent, but—and this is a big but—those forces must be kept there to keep the subject peoples under control, as we do definitely believe that if the Soviet were to weaken its grip in any way, the people of those occupied countries would rise in revolt and throw them out—much as they did the Nazi forces—and well does the Soviet know this. Therefore, being forced to keep such a large force of arms present in Europe, could they spare much of a force and materials to meet an Asian campaign? It is said we are not militarily ready to meet such a force if loosed—we were less ready on December 7, 1941, but we made it. We have the necessary economic and industrial power to back such a move, and we—speaking for our family—are ready to pay for it if the need arises.

Sixth, how much material is being lost by this policy of constant advance, fall back, advance, fall back now going on in Korea? What does it do to our morale and that of the peoples of the world who look to us for guidance? Every time we fall back, what of our supplies and armament which must be left behind, to say nothing of the men? We know this is all considered expendable—we have heard that before. But is it necessary expense?

Seventh, we have many friends—Chinese-born in this country or not, living in this part of the country but who, nevertheless, have close contact with China. While they do not in many ways care for Chiang Kai-shek they feel, as we do, that the Communist government is not to be borne. Why not permit him to do what he can to assist in this struggle? This is his enemy we are fighting now, as well as ours—is he not an ally? If and when the Communist invasion is driven out of China and the people have had time to adjust to the advances of the postwar world—then it will be time for them to hold a free election and secure the type of government and leader they want, not what is forced upon them.

We realize that this letter is lengthy and there is more we would wish to say if we were able to talk with you—but it does express a large part of our general feeling, and may let you know we do some thinking in the matters now before the people. We realize there is a coming election, but we do most definitely feel that regardless of political party, we must examine closely the record and person of the man who runs for the office of the President of the United States; it is a burden only a very strong and good man could carry and we desperately need such a man. We must depend upon you in Washington to put forward such a man for nomination—we will do the rest.

One last thought: What is there in the Marxist or Communist tenets that leads any thinker to believe that its believers would ever live peacefully side by side with more liberal governments? Does the lion lie down with the lamb? Not in this world.

Thank you for your past courtesies; we hope you will find the moment to read our thoughts.

Sincerely yours,

Mr. and Mrs. ARTHUR G. TAYLOR.

Resolution of United Society of Friends Women

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I desire to include a set of resolutions recently adopted by the United Society of Friends Women that were forwarded to me by Mrs. Mary E. Cadwallader, an active member of the organization, who lives in Oskaloosa, Iowa.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE UNITED SOCIETY OF FRIENDS WOMEN, MAY 1951

Deeply concerned by the increasing militarization of our country, we call upon our Government to replace its negative, fearful foreign policy with a constructive program worthy of a Christian nation.

As our forefathers united diverse races, nationalities, and States into one Nation living in peace under law, the central aim of our foreign policy in this second half of the century must be the building of such a community of the world. Without an all-out positive program for world law and world welfare, there is a bleak future for our civilization.

Specifically, we urge that our Government lead in strengthening and changing the United Nations to provide security against attack and war through enforceable "foolproof disarmament" under law.

We urge that money now spent for armament be used by the United Nations to develop the poverty-stricken countries of the world. We would expand the United Nations organizations for refugees, agriculture, child welfare and technical assistance. The Food and Agriculture Organization and the World Health Organization especially need to be developed into agencies capable of making a concerted attack on world hunger and disease. We support the efforts of Senators BRIEN MCMAHON and RALPH FLANDERS and Congressmen JUDD and HAYS to bring this about.

We urge that grain be sent by the United States to India immediately as a gift and not a loan. We want our country to share its surpluses generously in Christian love, without political strings attached.

We urge that the United Nations ability to mediate disputes be used and expanded. We urge that the United Nations, which has stopped the fighting in Indonesia and Israel, continue to negotiate the Korean war.

We urge that in the present debate on Korean policy the principles of civilian control over the military be upheld. We deny that the only way to stop a war is to win it. We oppose extending the war to millions of other people.

We oppose the extension of conscription and universal military training. We doubt that such measures and expanding armament will insure peace.

We disapprove of the growing trend toward the garrison state as evidenced by increasing pressure for loyalty oaths, increasing military influence in education, increasing restrictions on freedom of thought, speech and conscience. It is unthinkable that men should be sent to prison in Christian America for conscience sake.

We wish our country to remain an asylum for political and religious refugees. We oppose barriers to immigration based solely on race or national origin. We urge the repeal of the present McCarran Act and the defeat of similar legislation in the future.

Nonphysical Retirements of Military Personnel During the Present Emergency Are Costing the American Taxpayers Nearly a Million Dollars Annually

REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, during the present emergency the American taxpayers are being called upon to spend nearly a million dollars a year on the retirement of military personnel for other than nonphysical reasons.

For the period of 8 months starting July 1, 1950, to March 1, 1951, the total of 1,914 officers and enlisted personnel of our Armed Forces were retired on age or forced to retire. Their retirement pay for the 8-month period amounted to $605,247.38. Many of these persons are in their early fifties and when retired have no difficulty in meeting the physical standards for employment in private industry.

I have just introduced a bill designed to suspend certain provisions of law with respect to retirement for other than physical reasons for members of the Armed Forces. My bill provides in substance that notwithstanding any provisions of law, until June 30, 1954, no member of the Armed Forces shall be compelled to retire or be ordered without his consent to inactive duty for other than physical reasons.

Because of existing law, hundreds of duly qualified officers and enlisted personnel are being retired after 30 years of service or on age. In addition, many senior officers not selected for promotion are also forced to retire.

This practice of retiring military personnel with pay during an emergency, despite the fact they are fully qualified for further duty, is a waste of money and manpower, since it not only requires two men to fill one job, but it also places both of them on the Federal payroll.

For example, the retirement of military personnel often requires the calling up of reserves to fill such vacancies. As an illustration, I know of a Navy captain, who at the age of 51 years, was forced to retire recently because he failed to be selected for promotion to rear admiral. His pay at the time of retirement was $860.25 and after being retired he received monthly $523.68, which he will continue to receive for the remainder of his life. This officer is a graduate of the United States Naval Academy and his education cost the taxpayers of America approximately $30,000. In addition to the experience that he gained during his naval career, he attended several postgraduate schools that added another $10,000 to the taxpayers' bill for his education. The result of his retirement is that after the taxpayers spent $40,000 on his education, at the age of 51 he was forced to retire because he was not selected for promotion to one of the few billets as rear admiral in the Navy. Thus, as a retired captain he will draw for the rest of his life $523.68 monthly.

To replace the retired captain a Reserve commander was called from civilian life whose base pay monthly is $689.25. Therefore the total cost to the Government for filling the vacancy caused by retirement of the 51-year-old captain is $1,213.23 monthly. Keep in mind that before retirement the 51-year-old captain was doing the same job for $360.25 monthly and in a more efficient manner because of his education and experience. Thus, this one example alone discloses a waste of taxpayers' money in the amount of $523.68 monthly.

This retired naval captain is only one of 1,914 officers and enlisted personnel of our Armed Forces who have retired on age or were forced to retire since the beginning of the Korean war. There is no doubt that many of these officers and enlisted personnel have similar case histories to that of the retired naval captain.

The attached table gives a breakdown of the 1,914 persons retired from our Armed Forces for other than physical reasons. By referring to the attached table you will observe that while these 1,914 men were on active duty, the total cost for their services was $805,156.92 monthly. Through their retirement, you have added $605,247.38, so that the net cost to the taxpayers of filling these 1,914 vacancies was $1,410,404.30.

If the provisions of my proposed bill had been in effect when these 1,914 persons were retired, a saving to the American taxpayers would have been effected in the sum of $605,247.38, which represents their retirement pay from July 1, 1950, to March 1, 1951, a period of 8 months.

Assuming that the Armed Forces will retire personnel at the same rate as during the period from June 25, 1950, to March 1, 1951, one can readily see that if my bill, which provides a 3-year moratorium on nonphysical retirements, should become law, the American taxpayers will be saved $2,723,613.21 in a 36-month period.

Mr. Speaker, this Congress is making every effort to cut nonessential governmental expenditures to a minimum. If Congress will approve my bill, it will be possible to save nearly a million dollars annually and at the same time eliminate the necessity of calling up Reserve military personnel to replace Regular personnel retired in the prime of life and while qualified and physically able to continue their services to their country.

Officers and enlisted men retired from armed services on statutory age and length of service, June 25, 1950, to Mar. 1, 1951

Shipyards on the West Coast

OF
HON. JOHN J. ALLEN, JR.
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. ALLEN of California. Mr. Speaker, in time of national emergencies, when every ship that can carry troops or supplies is required for an all-out effort, the merchant marine and the facilities which care for it are known to all of us to be as necessary a part of the Military Establishment as the armed services themselves. Not only must we have the ships but we must have the facilities that will keep them in operation. Such facilities are not brought into being overnight. There must be organizations of skilled management and skilled men constantly active during normal times and available as a nucleus for expansion when emergencies arise.

It is well, therefore, to take inventory from time to time. On the Pacific coast the present situation is not very good. It is somewhat indicated by the letter of April 24, 1951, which was addressed to me by Mr. Thomas A. Rotell, chairman, and Mr. R. J. Brennan, secretary, for the Pacific Coast Committee for Shipbuilding for National Defense. A temporary and partial remedy for the immediate future is suggested in a resolution set forth in a letter dated April 25 addressed to me by Mr. A. T. Wynn, secretary of the Bay Cities Metal Trades Council.

The letters to which I have referred read as follows:

PACIFIC COAST COMMITTEE FOR SHIPBUILDING FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Oakland, Calif., April 24, 1951.

Hon. JOHN J. ALLEN, Jr.,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JOHN: We have talked, wired, written and, in general, campaigned many times over a period of years relative to the decline of the private yards of the Pacific coast. Recently, a survey was made of employment in the three largest yards of the bay area. The facts obtained, more clearly than any words of ours, illustrate what is happening. The figures are as follows:

The number of employees working as of April 19, 1951, were:

Moore Dry Dock, Oakland	1,400
Todd Shipyard, Alameda	350
Bethlehem, San Francisco	500
Total	2,250

The figures of 1950 after the Korean incident for the same three yards were:

Moore Dry Dock	1,900
Todd Shipyard	2,100
Bethlehem	2,600
Total	6,600

This represents a decline of 4,350—or 65.91 percent in these three yards alone. It means that only 34.09 percent of those working in these yards during the latter part of 1950 are working there today. The figure of 4,350 represents those experienced shipyard workers who are drawing unemployment insurance, or have accepted employment in other industries in this, a time of emergency. Unfortunately, the acceptance of other jobs is altogether too prevalent.

Smaller yards (Triple A Machine Shop, San Francisco) reveal an even more alarming trend. Today 50 are working. Three weeks ago, the figure was 600—a decline of 550—or 92 percent in three short weeks.

It is particularly discouraging when the figures of World War II for the same three yards are noted. These figures are:

Moore Dry Dock	38,000
Bethlehem, San Francisco	18,500
Todd Shipyard (then United Engineering)	7,000
Total	63,500

A comparison of these figures with those of today shows a decline of 61,250—or 96.46 percent. If to World War II unemployment figures were added those of the Kaiser yards, General Engineering, Bethlehem (Alameda), Western Pipe & Steel, Marinship, etc., they would represent a decline of approximately 99 percent. To us, these figures are tragic. Joe Stalin might get comfort from such figures, but not those who are concerned with the security of the United States.

Anything you can do to assist in the correction of these conditions will be deeply appreciated, and thanking you for your splendid cooperation in the past, we remain,

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS A. ROTELL, Chairman.
R. J. BRENNAN, Secretary.

BAY CITIES METAL TRADES COUNCIL,
San Francisco, Calif., April 25, 1951.

Hon. JOHN J. ALLEN, Jr.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ALLEN: The following resolution was passed at the regular meeting of the Bay Cities Metal Trades Council of April 16, 1951, and I was instructed to send same to you for your consideration and action. We respectfully request you to give us your views on this very important matter:

"Whereas since 1947 contracts for the construction of only a few small vessels have been awarded the private yards of the Pacific coast; and

"Whereas recognizing the danger of national defense of a policy of not maintaining well-dispersed shipyards, staffed with a nucleus of skilled workmen, constant efforts have been made to win an allocation of contracts to the private yards of the Pacific coast; and

"Whereas despite the recognition of this principle, agencies of the Government have opposed allocation, contending that in peacetime only a relatively small number of vessels would be constructed, and that any arbitrary division of work would 'destroy the more efficient yards'; and

"Whereas specifically the Maritime Commission said, "The volume of work involved in a wartime or emergency program makes the allocation of work desirable, whereas a peacetime limited construction program does not' (letter from Philip B. Fleming to Schuyler Otis Bland, chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, July 6, 1946); and

"Whereas specifically the Munitions Board said 'The proposed allocation would be effective only when applied to a large Government construction program. When applied to the current program, the work may be spread so thin as to put out of business valuable' east coast yards with many years of experience.' (Letter of May 27, 1949, to Schuyler Otis Bland from Maj. Gen. Patrick W. Timberlake, Munitions Board Deputy Director of Staff, Merchant Marine Committee hearings, p. 118); and

"Whereas specifically the Navy said 'Recognition of the fact that there is less than a desirable distribution of shipbuilding throughout the country does not permit the conclusion that part of the existing effort should be transferred elsewhere. Rather should it follow that additional shipbuilding should be fostered, and the industry nurtured to a healthy condition.' (Supplementary statement of Rear Adm. Charles D. Wheelock, Deputy and Assistant Chief of the Bureau of Ships, made to the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, June 23, 1949, contained on p. 122 of hearings); and

"Whereas Congress preparing intelligently to meet this emergency has authorized:

"(1) The construction of mariner-type vessels by the Maritime Board;

"(2) The construction of 170 naval vessels and the conversion of 291 others; and

"Whereas the private yards of the Pacific coast, which built 42 percent of the vessels constructed during World War II, have little work, unstable employment conditions are forcing skilled shipyard employees into other industries in this a time of national emergency: Now therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Bay Cities Metal Trades Council, in meeting at San Francisco, Calif., the evening of the 16th day of April 1951, That the mobilization base be expanded to embrace the private yards of the Pacific coast, the construction records of which were unequaled in World War II; and be it further

"Resolved, That—

"(1) The remaining mariner-type construction contracts (10 estimated) be allocated to the Pacific coast yards, 25 already having been assigned Atlantic and Gulf coast yards, and

"(2) That a fair share of the Navy construction and conversion program be assigned to the private yards of the Pacific coast; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, the Chairman of the Maritime Board, the Navy Bureau of Ships, and to all Congressmen and Senators from the States of California, Washington, and Oregon, and the Metal Trades Department, A. F. of L."

Respectfully submitted.

A. T. WYNN, Secretary.

Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHESTER B. McMULLEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Tampa Morning Tribune of April 12, 1951:

IT'S BIGGER THAN MEN

It is important to make clear in the beginning that this newspaper has not been sympathetic with many of President Truman's actions. We have criticized him—and severely so—on many occasions. As for his momentous order relieving General of the Army Douglas MacArthur from all his commands, however, we agree the President has taken proper and corrective action.

Certainly the decision was one of the most difficult of Mr. Truman's career. It must rank next to his order approving the use of the atomic bomb in World War II.

Undoubtedly the President realized the dismissal of the hero-general would set off an emotional and political bomb at home. He was well aware of the attitude among many Americans—and not all of them in the Republican camp—that General MacArthur could do no wrong. But he also recognized there are issues of higher significance than the future and ambitions of a five-star general.

To those citizens who can see nothing right in the President's action, to those who uphold MacArthur's position without question, we would like to point out that it is an important tradition in this democracy that military authority is subordinate to civilian authority.

General MacArthur was wrong in taking his case to the public over the heads of the civilian authorities and in violation of the orders of his own superiors. Not even a five-star general is bigger than the Government of the United States. It was his duty to present his views or to criticize political and diplomatic decisions, which had been made by our civilian authorities, through proper military channels. As he repeatedly refused to do so, his removal was justified.

To be sure, there is more behind the dismissal than insubordination. At issue throughout the controversy has been the broad question of priority in fighting the world-wide battle against communism.

As he did during World War II, General MacArthur contends it is more essential to crush the enemy in Asia than in Europe. He has been agitating for a big push aimed at the hear of China. Isolated in the Far East for many years and seeing only one side of the world picture, he has been promising, in effect, that in winning an Asian victory Europe "most probably would avoid war."

THE DANGERS OF HIS POLICY

Our Government, our top military leaders of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and our allies in the United Nations have rejected the MacArthur policy, which could easily fan the Korean action into a major war before the free world is strong enough to fight such a war. They have opposed the use of Chiang Kai-shek's troops and bombing attacks on the Chinese mainland, knowing full well that a general war with the Red Chinese might embroil us in the quagmire of China for decades.

Again, to the MacArthur admirers, and to the Republicans who think that egging MacArthur on against the administration and our top military advisers is sound politics in the year preceding the 1952 presidential election, we say: "Shall we risk a conflagration in the Far East? Shall we follow the MacArthur course and destroy the whole painfully built structure of American alliances?"

Let us remember that Red China and Russia have a mutual defense pact. If we attack China proper, if we send Chiang back to the mainland and follow behind to support or bail him out, the Soviets may well come in. And world war III, which the American people want to avoid and for which we are far from prepared, may be under way.

The President's action has, of course, generated a new and bitter domestic controversy. Tempers have risen. Emotions are inflamed. But the heat of the controversy should not blind us to the fact that we comfort only the enemy when our passions get out of bounds.

Fundamental foreign policy decisions must now be made. If it takes another great debate to decide between the aggressive and dangerous MacArthur policy and a renewed commitment to the primary defense of Europe, let the discussions be conducted honorably, sincerely, and in the best American democratic tradition. In the present hair's-breadth zone of all-out war, this Nation must rise above personal and partisan bickering. Only as we realize that the question of fundamental policy is bigger than either General MacArthur or President Truman can we hope to achieve unity and arrive at decisions which will affect our whole national future.

Increases in Postal Rates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, while I realize there should be some increase in postal rates, I do not agree that the heavy increase demanded by the administration is necessary or justified. Some very interesting arguments against the administration position are carried in an article in the West Concord Enterprise, West Concord, Minn. in its issue of March 15. I hope the Members will read this article very carefully:

OUR CORNER—STATEMENTS REGARDING INCREASES IN POSTAL RATES

The statement made by President Truman in his message to Congress on February 27, contains certain statements which do not present the situation fairly to either the Congress or the public. The figures in the President's message are based upon Post Office cost accounting figures. Publishers believe these figures to be erroneous because the fundamental and realities of the proper cost accounting method are ignored.

Post Office cost accounting is determined on a weight and per piece basis without consideration of public service factors or priorities. However, these factors are basic and paramount in the operation of the Post Office, because the Post Office is not a business, but is a service to all the American people, and hence cost figures determined as they would be in competitive business are of little value for the setting of rates.

For illustration, according to the Post Office's own records, there are some 39,000 of the present 41,000 post offices in the United States which do not take in sufficient money to pay their own expenses. Ninety-four percent of all post offices are in this category. It is held that this fact is a self-evident indication that the Post Office Department is created primarily for service to American citizens and not as a business proposition.

A further illustration is the Post Office rural delivery service which certainly exists as a service to American farmers. The cost of rural delivery service in 1950 was $152,800,000. Under the Post Office cost ascertainment system, this amount is allocated to the various classes of postal service. But the service is provided by the Government to those who live on rural routes as is provided by the Government to those who live on rural routes as is proven by the fact that the "R. D." was for many years known as rural free delivery. It is primarily for the recipients, not for the users of the mails. This is indicated by there being no higher charge for letter mail to "R. D." addresses than to urban addresses.

These various facts should certainly be considered when the statement is made that first-class mail is profitable to the Post Office, for much of the expense now charged to other classifications is incurred, as indicated, in order to make first-class service possible.

The idea that the Post Office should serve all of the American public on a business basis is not in agreement with the handling of other Government departments. For example, in 1950 there were differences between income and outgo as follows: Interior Department, deficit of about $460,000,000; Commerce Department, deficit of about $668,000,000; Agricultural Department, deficit of about $475,000,000.

Each of these serves mere segments of the population. The Post Office serves everyone.

The President in his message of February 27 gives the estimated net postal deficit for 1952 as $361,000,000, which is less than those just mentioned.

The President points out that the matter of postal rates should be subject to very thorough study. The publishers have been urging such a study for years. It is felt that such a study will prove conclusively that the post office is a service agency of the Government that cost accounting charges should fundamentally be divided into two groups—Government service and business handling—that the first class should be paid for wholly by the Government, as are the deficits in the Interior, Commerce, and Agriculture Departments, and that the costs in the second group should be reflected in the rate structure of the postal service.

For the reasons indicated it is urged that the enactment of the rate increases at this time either be deferred or kept at a very low level, and that the survey which the President suggests should be completed before any substantial rate increases are attempted. It is urged very strongly that this thorough survey of the whole subject of postal rates be undertaken by an independent body similar in type to the Hoover Commission or the committees who in the past have made studies and recommendations in connection with social security.

Cutting of Plywood Tariff Imperils Employees of the Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RUSSELL V. MACK OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the American State Department in trade negotiations with 17 foreign nations at Torquay, England, last week agreed to cut by 50 percent the tariff that is charged on plywood shipped into the United States from foreign countries.

By this action, the State Department has imperiled the prosperity and employment of the 35,000 to 40,000 workers who are employed in the plywood industry of the three Pacific coast States of Oregon, Washington, and California.

The existing tariff on plywood is 40 percent ad valorem—on value. This means that on every $100 of plywood shipped into the United States from a foreign country the foreign supplier is required to pay a duty of $40.

Under the 50-percent reduction in the tariff on plywood, which was agreed to by our State Department at Torquay, England, this tariff hereafter will be $20 on each $100 of plywood shipped into the United States.

AMERICAN WORKERS TO LOSE

Even under the existing 40-percent ad valorem tariff, Canada last year shipped a total of $11,032,465 of plywood and veneers into the United States. Despite the fact that the Canadians were required to pay a $40 duty on each $100 of plywood shipped into the United States they were able to profitably market large quantities of plywood in the United States.

Now, with the tariff on plywood cut in half the Canadians will be in position to market even larger quantities of their plywood in the United States. The bad effects of this sellout of American plywood workers to foreign nations may not be felt immediately, due to the present large demand for plywood, but once there is any slackening of demand, this lower tariff will enable foreign mills to get the business and it will be our American mills that will be forced to close first when any decline in demand occurs.

COSTS LOWER IN CANADA

Costs of labor, stumpage, freight, and taxes are much lower—about 40 to 50 percent lower—in Canada than in the United States.

For example, last summer when I made a detailed study of this problem, I found that American plywood workers then were receiving $1.72½ an hour while plywood workers in Canada were getting only $1.22. The wage rates in both countries have increased since then, but are still much higher in the United States than Canada.

The 40-percent ad valorem tariff on plywood imports compensated for the difference in American and Canadian wages.

By reducing by $20 the duty Canadians must pay on each $100 of plywood shipped into the United States, the Canadians will be able to undersell American mills in the American market.

One of the probable results of this great advantage given to the Canadian plywood industry by our American State Department is that more plywood mills will be built in Canada, with either Canadian or American capital. The Canadian output of plywood, as a result of this lower tariff, is likely to increase by leaps and bounds and within a few years much of the American market now enjoyed by American plants may be lost to Canadian mills.

STATE DEPARTMENT ARGUMENT

The argument of the American State Department for decreasing the plywood tariff is that if the Canadians are enabled to sell more plywood in the United States they will get more American dollars. The State Department holds that the Canadians will spend these additional dollars in the United States to buy automobiles, farm machinery, and other goods.

This will no doubt be to the advantage of the automobile and farm-machinery makers, but it will be hard on the Pacific coast's 35,000 to 40,000 plywood workers, who in the long run may see many of their jobs lost to the lower-wage Canadian plywood industry.

JAPAN COMPETITION POSSIBLE

The State Department's agreement to cut the tariff in half on plywood imported into the United States from foreign countries may result, within the next few years, in Japan getting back into plywood production on a large scale and the shipping of her plywood into the United States.

Japan, prior to World War II, was a big producer of plywood. In 1938, Japan manufactured 1,100,000,000 square feet of plywood which was equal to one-half of the entire production of plywood in the United States for that year.

Japan has large forests, and therefore the raw material from which to manufacture plywood. The wage rate for forest-industry workers in Japan several years ago was 256 yens a day, which in United States dollars is the equivalent of 61 to 81 cents.

If Japan resumes plywood manufacture with labor that costs only 61 to 81 cents a day our American plywood workers, whose wages now are about $2 an hour or $16 a day, cannot compete with this 61 to 81 cents a day labor.

PLYWOOD MAKING BIG INDUSTRY

The Douglas fir plywood industry of the United States is largely centered in the three Pacific coast States of Oregon, Wahington, and California, although there are many hardwood plywood mills in the Southern States, which likewise will be adversely affected by this 50-percent reduction in the plywood tariff.

The three Pacific coast States today have 56 plywood plants, and the number of these is increasing. These plywood plants employ approximately 18,500 factory workers, and a similar number of workers are engaged in supplying these mills with logs, glues, and other materials used in making plywood.

These plants, for the most part, are located in small communities. In many cases a whole community is dependent on a plywood plant for its income and livelihood.

A State Department policy that results in the closure of any of these plants well may result in destroying the economy of an entire town or a whole region.

In my opinion, the State Department by agreeing to reduce the existing tariff on plywood by 50 percent has sold the Pacific coast's 35,000 to 40,000 plywood-industry workers down river.

Communists Have Suffered Serious Blow in Hollywood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES E. POTTER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an article by L. Edgar Prina entitled "Communists Have Suffered Serious Blow in Hollywood" which appeared in the Sunday, May 13, 1951, edition of the Washington Star. As a member of the Committee on Un-American Activities, I commend this well-written and documented article to my colleagues for their information:

COMMUNISTS HAVE SUFFERED SERIOUS BLOW IN HOLLYWOOD—COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES HAS CHOKED OFF BIG MONEY SOURCE

(By L. Edgar Prina)

The House Committee on Un-American Activities is at the halfway point in its investigation of Red influences in Hollywood. What has been accomplished? What conclusions may be drawn?

One big fact stands out: The Communist Party, its rise to power in the film capital abruptly halted by the 1947 hearings, has suffered a series of crippling blows in the past few weeks.

Despite Hollywood's fight to rid itself of Reds, the testimony has demonstrated clearly that there were plenty of Communist actors, directors, and writers employed in the movie industry as of last February 22 when the Star broke the story of the new inquiry.

More than 60 already have been named as Communists at one time or another, and additional identifications are coming. Chairman Parnell Thomas in 1947 said the committee had "a very complete record on 79 very prominent persons active out in Hollywood."

THREE PRIME REASONS

According to testimony of admitted former Reds, confirming long-time committee contentions, the Communist Party infiltrated Hollywood for three principal reasons:

1. To tap a lucrative source for party funds.

2. To gain prestige for the party by luring big names into front groups.

3. To control the content of films, in order to bar anti-Communist pictures or disseminate Red propaganda. This was to be done by domination of both talent and craft unions.

In the past the Reds have had considerable success on Nos. 1 and 2. But they have fallen flat on No. 3.

Now, in wake of the revelations before the committee, the once fabulous flow of money into the party coffers is expected to become little more than a trickle.

The reason for this is that witnesses who refuse to state under oath whether they are or were Communists, and others identified as Reds, almost automatically become unemployable in Hollywood. Contracts are terminated, wage earners are fired, and gone are the fat salaries.

An indication of the amount of money the Communist Party has taken out of Hollywood was given by Screen Writer Richard J. Collins, a party member for about 10 years and one of the most articulate witnesses yet heard in the inquiry.

Mr. Collins said that, in addition to regular party dues, he, like other highly paid Reds, was assessed a flat 4 percent of his salary.

"I suppose I gave about $185 a month for 3 or 4 years," he added.

Two other top film writers, both identified as Communists, Dalton Trumbo and Lester Cole, together received a total of $382,000 from Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer alone in the 3 years 1945–47. A 4 percent assessment would have meant $15,200 for the party.

HIGH FINANCING

When one considers there were several hundred Communists in the movie industry during the war, according to Collins, a lot of party activities throughout the country, from atomic espionage to aid for the tottering Daily Worker, could have been financed from the Hollywood take.

The Reds still have ways of tapping some of the movie gold, however. Screen star Sterling Hayden told how Karen Morley, an actress, attempted to persuade him to become a passive member after he quit the party in 1945.

He said Miss Morley told him he would have to take no part in party activities—just contribute. Hayden refused, but now many "passive" members and fellow-travelers today are contributing to Red causes is something the committee would like very much to know.

During the last few years, because of the cold war and naked Red aggression, it has become extremely unpopular and unprofitable to be a member of a Communist-front group. Even the most gregarious person nowadays checks thoroughly into an organization before joining. Hence, the Communists are finding it more and more difficult to lure "big names" into their front and thereby gain prestige and dollars from innocents and suckers.

Much testimony has been received bearing on the matter of efforts to inject Communist propaganda into films. There can be no doubt that there were attempts to respond to Lenin's admonition that the cinema, perhaps the most important medium for educating and propagandizing the public should be exploited carefully.

But the consensus of former Reds is that this was almost impossible. The reason: the producer, director, stars and front office all had a veto over the script. In other words, there would have to be a chain of Communists or fellow-travelers from the writer to the studio boss.

The party soon realized the difficulties and launched its vigorous campaign to control all unions in the film industry. The idea was simple: Control the unions and you have a powerful weapon to hold over the heads of the studios.

At the height of their power in 1946–47 the Communists dominated the Screen

Writers' Guild and the Conference of Studio Unions. While Reds infiltrated the Screen Directors' Guild and the Screen Actors' Guild, they were in no position to dictate policy in these groups.

Meanwhile, one witness testified that party instructions, as laid down by Screen Writer John Howard Lawson, identified as the Communist boss in Hollywood, were these:

"Try to get 5 minutes of the party line in every picture you write.

"Get it into an expensive scene, a scene involving expensive stars, large sets, or many extras, because, even if it is discovered by the front office, the business manager of the unit, the very watchdog of the treasury, the very servant of capitalism, in order to keep the budget from going too high, will resist the elimination of that scene."

Even this proved unsatisfactory, however, according to Collins, who said:

"Inclusion of several progressive lines per screen play was pushed, but they learned it didn't mean anything unless you had the code book with you. So the program was dropped."

Mr. Collins contended that the only time Communist propaganda gets into films to any appreciable degree is when it jibes with the attitude or opinions of a large segment of the American people.

WARTIME JOB EASIER

As examples, he cited the antinazism theme of certain wartime films and pictures concerned with racial discrimination.

The current hearings also have shown the solidness of 1947 testimony given by Louis J. Russell, senior staff investigator, concerning the Communist affiliations of 9 of the 10 witnesses heard at that time. Mr. Russell introduced what he said were photostatic copies of the Communist Party cards for 7 of the 10. Edward Dmytryk, a movie director and himself one of the Hollywood 10, and other former Reds, identified 9 as onetime Communists.

Twenty-one witnesses have taken the stand to date. Six have admitted past Communist Party membership: Hayden, Collins, Dmytryk, Larry Parks, and Marc Lawrence, actors, and Mrs. Meta R. Rosenberg, former story editor at Paramount Studios.

Fourteen have refused to state whether they were or are Communists, on the grounds of possible self-incrimination. They are:

Anne Revere, Gale Sondergaard, actresses; Howard da Silva, Will Geer, Morris Carnovsky, Victor Killian and Fred Graff, actors; Paul Jarrico, Waldo Salt, Abraham Lincoln Polonsky, Robert Lees, and Harold Buchman, screen writers; Sam Moore, radio writer, and George Willner, writers' agent.

One witness has denied ever having been a Red, althought admitting association with front organizations. He was John Garfield, stage and screen star.

The committee assumes that when a witness refuses to answer questions on communism it is because a truthful answer would be self-incriminating. The Congressmen have developed a technique which points up the issue sharply. For example, when Polonsky was asked whether he was a member of the Silver Shirts, a right-wing subversive group, he answered angrily:

"You know what the Silver Shirts is—it's a dirty Fascist organization!"

The next question followed quickly: "Are you a member of the Communist Party?"

"I decline to answer on the ground that it might tend to incriminate me," Polonsky said softly.

Then the final challenging query: "Can you name a single person who has appeared before this committee and answered truthfully who has been incriminated?"

Polonsky, like all other defiant witnesses, could not do so.

ATMOSPHERE HAS CHANGED

What makes the current hearings so successful, in comparison with those of 1947, is the temper of the times. Four years ago, the committee had documentary proof of the extensive infiltration of Hollywood, but it had no cooperative witnesses.

"I had a dream which became a nightmare that in the event of war with Russia I would be arrested as a friend of the Soviet Union, when, in fact, I was an enemy," Collins testified.

One major reason the cooperative witnesses broke with the party was its totalitarian discipline, the strait-jacket put on independent thought.

"They felt they had the key to all problems," Hayden said. "Everything was predetermined."

"I began to feel like a trained zombie," Collins declared.

"I objected to 'thought control,'" Dmytryk asserted.

These former Reds testified that it was idealism that brought them into the party and idealism that took them out.

Mrs. Rosenberg put her experience this way:

"I was an anti-Nazi and anti-Franco, and it seemed perfectly reasonable to join the Communist Party, which was the most violently anti-Hitler and pro-Loyalist organization in America."

The committee still has to hear at least 20 more witnesses, including a half dozen or so who have been avoiding service of subpenas and these headliners:

Jose Ferrer, this year's Academy Award winner; Budd Schulberg, novelist, whose The Disenchanted currently is a best seller; Abe Burrows, television and radio comedian and writer of Duffy's Tavern and Robert Rossen, director-producer, whose All the King's Men won an Oscar in 1949.

Truman-Acheson Fail To Answer General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. R. GROSS

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I call attention to an excellent editorial in a recent issue of the Waterloo (Iowa) Daily Courier.

In a letter to President Truman in February of this year, I asked among other things:

What is your objective in Korea? Are Americans to go on fighting and dying endlessly and forever with practically no help on the ground from other members of the United Nations? In utmost sincerity, and lacking a definition of your objective, I must again demand that you evacuate our ground forces from Korea. If you think you have a valid reason for continuing the war under present conditions, tell me what it is. I insist the American people deserve more from you than vague generalities and evasion.

It was my contention in letters to the President in January and again in February that the United States could not win a war of attrition against the Asian forces that could be mobilized; that our forces should be evacuated from Korea and followed with an effective sea and air blockade of the Chinese mainland and Hong Kong to stop the flow of war materials to the Communists, meanwhile protecting Japan, Formosa, and other strategic islands.

No reply has been received from Truman in response to either of these letters. It is obvious that the President is as unprepared now as he was in January and February to provide the citizens of this country with information to which they are fully entitled.

As the Waterloo Daily Courier well points out, continuation of this half war is intolerable. Here is the editorial:

WE MIGHT GET IN WAR

Both President Truman and Defense Secretary Marshall have attempted to answer the criticisms of General MacArthur. Their constant refrain is that following the MacArthur policy might get us into war with Russia.

All will agree that possible Soviet intervention must be carefully weighed. Running the danger of war has been inherent in every decision we have made since VE-day. We ran that risk in Iran. We ran it in Greece and in Berlin. And, finally, the possibility that Russia might intervene obviously had to be considered in making the decision to send troops to Korea.

Let us suppose, however, that the administration has authoritative information that Russia will enter the war if the MacArthur policies are adopted. Is it conceivable that the Kremlin would intervene rather than let us win a speedy MacArthur victory in Korea, but would not intervene to prevent a slow Truman victory after many years of fighting and enormous casualties on both sides?

In other words, if Russia intervenes in Korea, she will obviously do so for only one purpose—to prevent us from winning the war there. If the Kremlin is going to fight, it will fight equally hard to prevent a slow Truman victory as a speedy MacArthur victory. The only purpose of war is victory and if Russia proposes to win a Communist victory in Korea she will intervene whether the MacArthur or Truman policy is adopted. It makes no difference.

Perhaps, however, Truman does not propose to win in Korea. Perhaps he and Acheson are still clinging to the forlorn British hope for a negotiated peace following a stalemate. Then the Truman policies become equally intolerable. For in that case American troops are being sacrificed in a gamble that has so far proved vain and from all signs will continue to be so.

For if the administration does not even propose to win the Korean war, then its only alternative is to get out of Korea. It is not defensible to send an army into Korea and then refuse to give it maximum support. The public will not long tolerate continued casualties in Korea when the only objective in view is a stalemate based on the unreasonable hope for a negotiated peace. We cannot engage in a little war and then let it drag on for years because we are afraid an attempt to win it would result in a larger war. If the administration thinks Russia will not let us win in Korea, then it should never have entered the conflict in the first place.

The net effect of Truman's and Marshall's arguments in attempting to answer MacArthur, therefore, is to build up a convincing case for withdrawing from Korea entirely. If the fear of atomic war as pictured by the President is to deter us from giving full support to our troops in Korea, then we must withdraw from Korea.

Truman and Marshall have not answered MacArthur's arguments. If their conclusions are sound, the only course is to withdraw from Korea entirely. Continuation of the half war is intolerable from any point of view.

Study in Vacuums

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle, which may serve to clear up some of the confusion which has existed over the question whether or not the administration has devised a policy for the conduct of far-eastern affairs. The conclusion is reached that a principle exists, still unimplemented by any established policy.

STUDY IN VACUUMS

General MacArthur says a policy vacuum exists toward Korea.

Warren Austin, top American delegate to the U. N., replies that there is a clear, positive, and consistent policy on Korea.

Mr. Citizen, trying to resolve these skirmishings in the great debate, may suffer a clear, positive vacuum all his own.

Could the trouble, the confusion, lie in definitions? Could a brief sortie into semantics help Mr. Citizen straighten his thinking? He could start with Mr. Austin's concise definition of policy in Korea:

"Militarily, the objective is to repel the aggression and restore international peace and security in the area. Politically, the objective is to establish a unified, independent and democratic government in the sovereign state of Korea."

This, Mr. Austin says, is policy. Now Mr. Citizen might turn from Austin to Webster, and look up the definition of "policy." One of the most common is "a settled or definite course or method adopted and followed." From there Mr. Citizen might flip ahead a few pages and look up the word "principle." Here again several definitions; the one most widely used is "a governing law of conduct * * * settled rule of action."

Now back once more to Mr. Austin's quoted definition of what we're doing in Korea. Is it best covered by the word "policy" or "principle"?

If we are to take principle as a law of conduct, and policy as a definite method, then a good case can be made that we have fine principles in Korea but no policy. Repelling aggression and restoring peace is a generality. It is the diplomatic way of phrasing an old individual right, the right to slap down a bully and keep peace in the home. It is a principle of freedom.

Perhaps Mr. Citizen will arrive at the opinion that policy adds the "how" to principle's "what." He might even decide that there would be no quarrel at all if the administration and the U. N. would change their label of policy to principle and cling to it; then implement it with MacArthur's policy.

American Successes; Russian Failures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT RAINS
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. RAINS. Mr. Speaker, for clear-cut statement of American foreign policy I commend the reading of the editorial from the Montgomery Advertiser entitled "American Successes; Russian Failures":

AMERICAN SUCCESSES; RUSSIAN FAILURES

President Truman is probably too harried a man to have pondered the fact that after 6 years of relentless, resounding attack, the "event MacArthur" has suddenly brought him the ardent support of a majority of American papers. Like the Advertiser, these newspapers have been incessantly hostile to Mr. Truman on domestic issues, but they consider that in this case he represents right and wisdom. In general the Advertiser has been in good company in its views on the struggle with Russia; our views have been harmonious with such papers as the New York Times, New York Herald Tribune, Christian Science Monitor, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, the Washington Post, the Hartford Courant, the Atlanta Journal, the Louisville Courier-Journal. This is reassuring. Equally reassuring is the fact that our viewpoint is opposite to that of the inexcusable Chicago Tribune and the unpardonable Hearst press.

The following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal is specifically similar to the viewpoint expressed on this page repeatedly:

"It is being charged with increasing irresponsibility that the United States has no foreign policy, that our military and diplomatic leaders are 'drifting,' that we have failed to take a strong stand against communism.

"What is the record?

"Was the decision to aid Greece, a program that stopped Communist aggression in southeast Europe, a policy of 'drift'?

"Was there lack of action and determination in the Turkish aid program which made that nation a southern bastion against Russia?

"Was there lack of imagination and inaction in the Marshall plan, which saved Europe from economic collapse?

"Was the North Atlantic Defense Pact 'softness' toward communism?

"Did the Berlin airlift, which blocked the Russian plan to squeeze us out, show lack of courage and determination?

"Is our sending American troops to Europe in peacetime a passive subjection to Russia?

"Was our decision to stand against Communist aggression in Korea in company with the United Nations 'appeasement' of communism?

"Of course not.

"All of these programs and the decisions which led to them were courageous, bold, imaginative, and clear warnings to the Communist world. Each was the opposite of appeasement. Each hurt communism and hobbled Russia's program for expansion and aggression. Each saved a part of the free world.

"Who made these decisions and took these actions which have no peacetime parallel in American history? The administration—the political, military, and diplomatic leaders of both parties who are still directing our foreign and military policies.

"By what logic does anyone believe that men who were capable of such successful and realistic programs and policies should suddenly become inept drifters, appeasers, and not deserving of confidence?

"These men—again, men who represent both parties—have been a winning combination. They have made errors, of course. But does a baseball manager break up a winning team every time a shortstop overthrows first base or an infielder misjudges a fly ball?"

The Advertiser considers it important to harp on these American successes because of the national propensity for swift commuting between optimism and pessimism. We are disposed to have eyes only for Russia's successes and America's failures. It is in order to consider that time after time Russia has been frustrated or defeated in her aims.

For example, we fume and agonize over the lack of full support from our allies. And this newspaper does not hedge in acknowledging that the response of America's allies leaves much to be desired. But on that basis, Russia has twice and thrice the cause for grief that America has. None of our allies has fallen away as Yugoslavia has fallen away from Russia. That was a massive disaster for Russia. The rebelliousness in the satellite countries is well established.

The anxieties and difficulties of the Russians are immense (as MacArthur brought out). It is not realistic to blind ourselves to Russia's difficulties, any more than it is to became complacent over her advantages.

Russia was more exercised over the delayed opening of a second front in the course of a 2-year period in War II than we are about the instantaneous end of the Korean war. Even the English people grew restless and outspoken, just as we are today. But they had to wait. Rome wasn't built in a day.

We Can't Afford Their Stupidity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, I am placing in the RECORD an editorial from the May 4, 1951, issue of the Arizona Plain Talk. It certainly speaks for itself.

WE CAN'T AFFORD THEIR STUPIDITY

The matter of getting water for Arizona's farms, and hydroelectric power for its industries is all-important to the future of the State. Yet that matter has been left in the hands of the same people who failed in the past—and who have apparently learned nothing by their defeat.

To begin with, they have not learned that securing the water of the Colorado River cannot be accomplished by hurling accusations against the inhabitants of the sovereign State of California. It can only be accomplished by convincing the remaining States of the Union that we have a thoroughly sound project, on which the better than three quarters of a billion of Federal dollars necessary to make it an actuality would be well spent.

The central Arizona project, as it now stands, is decidedly not a project for which a conscientious legislator could vote the expenditure of a cast amount of Federal money because (see April 27 issue of Plain Talk) over 50 percent of the land within the project's area is owned by a few hundred excess acreage farmers and syndicates. These individuals and corporations, some 420 in all, have not only taken up holdings far larger than the 160 acres allowed to participants in a Federal irrigation project; but they have put themselves in a position, by sinking wells to the underground basins which the diverted waters of the Colorado would flood, to get water for which they would pay back nothing.

These facts have been exposed on the floor of Congress. What's more, a group of Congressmen recently made an on-the-spot investigation for themselves. As a result, the central Arizona project was killed in committee; and we predict it will never come to life until we in Arizona come to our senses and secure the services of a new organization to put the project over.

But what has happened has evidently made no impression either on the political leaders winking at the irregularities which discredit the project with the rest of the country or the highly paid mishandlers of public relations, with their senseless program of vilification against California.

Both of these groups continue to act as if their managing of this important matter deserves our confidence, not to mention every nickel they can shake us down for. Meanwhile neither of these groups has shown any evidence of a change in their thinking or course of procedure.

Well, do we, the rest of us, want the water, or don't we? If we do, we'd better devise a way to shake off the free riders, and we had better create a public relations plan—conceived on a level of adult intelligence instead of one of childish name-calling—which will sell the project to the 46 States whose votes we need.

Why William Crawford Gorgas Was Elected to the New York University Hall of Fame

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL ELLIOTT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege today to obtain unanimous consent of the House of Representatives to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an essay by Miss Clarice Sanford entitled "Why William Crawford Gorgas Was Elected to the New York University Hall of Fame." Miss Sanford is a student at the Thomas W. Martin High School in Gorgas, Walker County, Ala.

On March 5, 1951, Mr. Martin, for whom the high school at Gorgas was named, expressed interest in the school and its students by offering a prize of $150 and a trip to New York City for the best essay written by a member of the senior class on the subject, why William Crawford Gorgas was elected to the New York University hall of fame. The trip to New York City was offered to enable the student to attend the unveiling ceremony of the bust of Dr. Gorgas to be held at the Hall of Fame of Great Americans on May 24, 1951.

Dr. J. M. Mason, Birmingham; Dr. John Temple Graves, Birmingham; and Dr. J. C. Gladney, of Jasper, were announced as the judges for the contest, and on April 26 they announced Miss Clarice Sanford, of Good Springs, Ala., as the winner, with Miss Barbara Widman as runner-up.

The Seventh Congressional District is proud and appreciative of the honor that has come to Alabama by the election of one of its great sons to the New York University Hall of Fame.

I am likewise proud that one of the finest communities of the congressional district which I have the honor to represent was named for the great Gorgas, whose contributions to mankind in the fields of medicine and sanitation loom larger in their significance with each passing year.

Mr. Thomas W. Martin has performed a fine public service through the years in calling the accomplishments of General Gorgas to the attention of Americans everywhere. His efforts in this direction stimulated Miss Sanford to write her talented essay on Gorgas.

Miss Sanford's essay reads as follows:

WHY WILLIAM CRAWFORD GORGAS WAS ELECTED TO THE NEW YORK UNIVERSITY HALL OF FAME

(By Clarice Sanford, Martin High School, Gorgas, Ala.)

Fame cannot be measured. Neither can William Crawford Gorgas' services to humanity. He was great in the eyes of great men and in the eyes of uneducated laborers.

Perhaps yellow fever had more influence in the life of William Crawford Gorgas than of any other person in the world. Indirectly, or in some cases directly, yellow fever caused the major stages of his life to be directed over a path, seemingly well planned by some superior being.

The first part yellow fever played in the life of Gorgas was bringing his parents together. Even before William was born, it seemed the fates were weaving his life around a pattern of yellow fever. In October of the year 1853, an epidemic of this dreaded disease ravaged Mobile, and naturally caused a hurried evacuation of the city. Amelia Gayle moved from there to Mount Vernon away from swamps and yellow jack, and here she met a promising young officer, Josiah Gorgas. After a brief courtship, the two were married, and this daughter of a former governor of Alabama settled down in an aristocratic old house to rear a family.

William Crawford, the first child of the Gorgas', was born on October 3, 1854. Josiah had been placed in command of the army arsenal at Mount Vernon; therefore his son grew up learning and loving army life.

After the Civil War, Josiah Gorgas was appointed president of the University of the South at Sewanee, Tenn. William grew up at Sewanee. He was a slender, handsome youth, energetic and generally popular. A baseball field seemed to be the place in which William was more at home during the first years of his college life. While his enthusiasm for sports was at its peak, he was an extremely bad student, but in his final year, he turned scholarly. He won the Alabama medal for class leadership, and to cap the stack he began pining for a military career.

Gorgas' father discouraged this ambition, so he went to New Orleans and studied law for a year. He knew from the beginning that he would always detest this profession, and several times during that year he applied in vain for admission to the United States Military Academy. Finally, he decided that the only remaining possibility for an army life was for him to win a degree in medicine and thereby enter the Army Medical Corps.

At that time Gorgas had no interest whatsoever in medicine; his sole goal was the army. With this in mind he set in to learn medicine. His father strongly protested his becoming an army doctor, for next to a navy medical man, he considered an army doctor the lowest form of animal life in existence.

The first 2 years of medical school were mostly financed by the old captain, and during this time Gorgas became casually interested in his medical studies. Casual interest soon changed to enthusiasm, and when his father was no longer able to send funds, he stayed on, frequently hungry. While other students drank and caroused, Gorgas could be found studying.

In June, when he was 24, William Gorgas received his degree as doctor of medicine. At commencement, which was held in one of New York's most handsome theaters, the Academy of Music, Dr. Gorgas was favored with a beautiful bouquet of roses—his first flowers of praise on the way to fame.

One year after being awarded his doctor's degree, Gorgas entered the Medical Corps. The first years of his life as a first lieutenant were spent in typical frontier posts. After disposing of his work as sanitation inspector, hospital work, record keeping, and dozens of other army tasks, he found opportunity for outside fee work. There was plenty of such work due to blizzards, floods, hurricanes, plagues, and, most tragic of all, yellow fever, but usually the fees were lacking.

In addition to the life of a typical army doctor and keeping up his social obligations, Gorgas continued his study of medical science. He probed into this science which had been awakened by such men as Pasteur, Lister, and Koch. William Gorgas was helping medical science to plunge forward, but yellow fever, apparently ignorant of this march of science, steadily increased.

Dr. Gorgas' first real combat with yellow fever was at Fort Brown, Tex. Over 23,000 cases of yellow fever were well on their way when Gorgas finally arrived. There were differences of opinion as to the cause of this disease. Some said a "yellow fever breeze" brought it across the Rio Grande from Mexico; others laid the blame on bananas and oranges; but most everyone agreed on the preventives—mustard seed and whisky.

While doing what he could to relieve the sufferers, Dr. Gorgas met Marie Doughty. She was afflicted with yellow fever, and everyone concerned agreed that it was best to bury such victims as soon as possible after death, so her grave was made ready. Gorgas was also stricken, and while the two were convalescing, they began their courtship. Later, they were married. Thus yellow fever was responsible for another major happening in the life of William Gorgas.

When Gorgas, then known as the yellow fever specialist, was appointed sanitary officer and commissioned to Habana; ahead of him was a real job of cleaning up a pesthole of filth. Already several doctors had put forth theories concerning how yellow fever germs were transmitted, but not a one of them offered a solution. Walter Reed was also sent to Habana, and when he satisfactorily demonstrated that a certain type of mosquito does carry yellow fever germs, it was considered by scientists as merely a brilliant statement. They didn't see how the mosquito could be punished, without having been proven guilty.

To the people of Habana, Reed's discovery came like a sentence of death. To them it seemed just as impossible to banish the mosquitos as it would be to banish the air which they thickened. Were they always to live knowing their enemy and dreading to even sleep? What Reed regarded as accomplishment merely added horror to the lives of the people in Habana.

In about 6 months, Gorgas had made the city the cleanest of all tropical cities. Since it was so clean and attractive, immigrants started pouring in. Yellow fever, seemingly in subjugation, broke out anew with this fresh supply of blood with no resistance. When Gorgas saw that his clean-up campaign had failed to ward off this worst epidemic, he started from a different angle.

The Alabama doctor started studying the disease-carrying mosquito. The sanitation campaign had cleaned up some of the breeding places of the mosquito, but now Gorgas undertook the embarrassing job of going into private homes. Inside buildings was the favorite breeding place of the mosquito. The home inspection did not cause Gorgas to become unpopular, however; instead it brought him nearer the hearts of the group of humanity he was serving.

The second anti-yellow-fever war in Habana lasted about 6 months and was indeed a great success. Just the beautiful, healthful city of Habana and the pride which the Cubans have in the city is a living monument to the work of William Crawford Gorgas.

In June of 1905, Gorgas was sent to Panama where the United States was attempting to dig a canal. The French had failed on this very project because of the yellow fever and other diseases which were far too common. When Gorgas asked the Canal Commission for the necessary materials to launch an attack against disease, they scoffed at his requests for screen wire and oil spray.

The Governor of the Canal Zone, the Chairman of the Canal Commission, and other officials were not reluctant in getting appropriations for coffins, but they did not try to understand why the sanitation committee needed screen wire to clean up the Canal Zone.

While Gorgas and his helpers struggled against all this official opposition, yellow fever was getting the upper hand. As soon as a boat load of workers unloaded, they got a view of a row of coffins, not empty ones, and became frantic trying to get return passage on the same boat.

After what seemed endless delay, help arrived from the United States with more doctors and nurses and the attack on yellow fever began to gain ground, and by September of 1906 it was fairly well under control.

Though the Senators and Canal Commission officials had stamped and declared in a loud voice that the Big Ditch was an impossibility, Gorgas proved that neither it nor he was a failure. The greatest handicap had been the politicians who seemed to think they knew so much about Panama, even though they had never been nearer than Washington, D. C. The feelings of the great doctor must have been a mixture of the pride of a conqueror with humble gratefulness to God.

Even after Gorgas had so nearly completely abolished yellow fever, some of the Commission tried to have him replaced. They did not believe all that nonsense about the mosquito and claimed that every mosquito that Gorgas killed had cost the United States $10. Fortunately, President Theodore Roosevelt refused to carry out the recommendation of firing Gorgas.

The presidency of the University of Alabama was offered to Gorgas, but he declined this offer so that he might carry on as a helper of humanity. Along about this time he received honorary degrees from Harvard, Brown, University of Pennsylvania, and the University of the South.

Gorgas realized that the completion of the Panama Canal had been a triumphant accomplishment, but he could not keep from thinking of the millions of sufferers in other lands. Truly, this doctor had dedicated his life in making the lives of others happier.

Diamond mines had been opened in South Africa, and as is sometimes the case where wealth is involved, greedy operators were cruelly mistreating the workers. Heedless of the needs, diseases, and even deaths of their workers, the operators paid wages on which health could not be maintained. Due to unsanitary housing conditions, unnourishing food, and scanty clothing, the Negro workers were dying of "minus pneumonia." This disease spreads like wildfire, for the Negro is especially susceptible to lung disease.

Months of investigations and hard work soon slackened death's pace, and a Gorgas assistant was left as sanitation director. The British Empire was in charge of the mines, and they, the British, were thankful for the lives of their workers being saved. During this time the elderly doctor was promoted to Surgeon General, and he toured parts of South Africa spreading good will, and good advice. His audiences usually consisted of farmers, and he spoke on sanitation and malaria control.

Since the opening of the Panama Canal meant that people from all parts of the world would be traveling at proximity to the United States, the Americans realized that the whole globe must be freed from yellow fever. The International Health Board made Gorgas director of a world-wide campaign against yellow jack.

Then the United States declared war on Germany, and as Gorgas was a general, he had work to do. Base hospitals were built; sick and wounded were cared for; preventive serums were injected; the doctor was leading a busy, useful life at an age when most men are retired.

Although he had conquered an enemy which killed more men than actual bullets did, Gorgas still dreamed of leading men into actual combat. At the age of 64, the yellow fever specialist said that he still had not realized his full army ambition. He wished that his rank could be reduced from major general in the Medical Corps to brigadier general on active duty at the head of a brigade of Alabamians. He was not a warmonger, however, for about this time one of his aides heard him remark that he wished the war were over. If so, he would go to South America and exterminate the last wisp of yellow fever from the earth.

After the armistice was signed, General Gorgas was retired. When reports of outbreaks of yellow fever came from West Africa, Gorgas was off to the battle. The Harbin Medal for services to mankind, awarded by Belgium, was to be presented to Dr. Gorgas at the International Hygiene Conference at Brussels in 1920.

On the day after Gorgas landed in London, he was taken ill. Being a doctor, he had a fairly accurate conception of his condition, so while lying in bed at Willbank Hospital, he stated quietly that he would fight to the last, though he believed he was dying.

The King of England visited Gorgas at the hospital and in a simple ceremony presented him the insignia of the Knight Commander of the Most Distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George.

About 4 weeks later, Dr. William Crawford Gorgas died. His funeral was held at St. Paul's Cathedral, and his body was returned to Arlington Cemetery.

William Crawford Gorgas is without a doubt justly represented in the New York University Hall of Fame for Great Americans. Not only has he won the respect and admiration of Americans, but of suffering humanity everywhere in the world.

Rubber for the Wheels of China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, with leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting in the RECORD a very timely editorial published in the Albion Journal-Register, Albion, Ill., last week in which this splendid paper cries out against the shipment of strategic material to Red China through the connivance of the British Government.

I believe this short editorial will be of interest to the Members of the House:

RUBBER FOR THE WHEELS OF CHINA

As the American battle toll this week mounted to more than 62,000 men, killed, wounded, and missing, Great Britain grudgingly announced that it has finally suspended shipment of war materials to Red China. That announcement came only after an exposé of trade relations between England and China shocked all democratic nations, and stirred deep indignation in these United States.

England as a member of the United Nations—is supposed to be supporting the U. N.'s decision to resist aggression wherever aggression appears—even has a tiny fighting force in Korea—but, England and British companies in the Far East shipped more crude rubber into Red China during the first 9 months of the Korean war, than during the whole of 1949.

Number 10 Downing Street is now opposing sanctions against the Chinese Reds. The move to blockade the Chinese coast and ports—one of the strongest weapons against any aggressor—is bogged down in U. N. red tape.

Why?

That's the question the majority of Americans are asking.

Why are our men dying in Korea in a campaign that precludes either victory or a quick and decisive end to the conflict?

Why must American delegates to the U. N. wrangle with other delegations for days or weeks before sanctions against Red China can be made effective?

Why should England, while attempting to dictate U. N. policy, traffic in war materials with the government that is killing and maiming American troops?

Why does the United States—and that means our State Department as well as the Executive—permit the U. N. to vacillate, permit the pinko denizens of Downing Street to traffic with the enemy, permit our men to die while the rest of the world and especially the British empire, profit from their bloodshed?

How long are Americans going to permit a continuation of the Korean fiasco? How soon will they issue a mandate to the White House and to Congress? How soon will they demand that we either fight to win in Korea, or pack up and come home?

How long is it going to take the American people to discover that the U. N. is playing the United States for a sucker? How long must we delay notifying the other U. N. members that unless they support the Korean effort, support it wholeheartedly and with troops and guns and matériel, that we're through supplying the goon squad while they play footsie with the Reds.

It's about time that the United States notified the world that as long as we're furnishing the men, the supplies, and the money, that we're going to make the rules.

The Defense Secretary Makes Answer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include in the RECORD an excellent article entitled "The Defense Secretary Makes Answer" which appeared in the May 9 edition of the New Haven (Conn.) Evening Register. This editorial is a penetrating and thoughtful analysis of the testimony of Secretary of Defense George Marshall and General MacArthur. I should like to call particular attention to one sentence of the editorial:

The whole MacArthur program of protest appears to us as a very serious mistake and as a major blunder.

The editorial follows:

THE DEFENSE SECRETARY MAKES ANSWER

At the outset The Register wishes to state that it finds itself almost completely in accord with everything that Secretary of Defense Marshall has thus far had to say in stating the political and military program which this country now proposes to follow.

Secretary Marshall has testified that in his opinion General MacArthur's Korean war plans would risk our involvement in an all-out war. He has said they might cause the United States to alienate and possibly lose its European allies. The Register is in complete accord with this opinion.

We might even be franker in the matter and say that Secretary Marshall is in complete accord with us. For in a front page editorial at the time of General MacArthur's sudden dismissal this newspaper urged against any extension of the land war in Asia with realization that this represented but one phase of the global picture.

In that editorial it was advocated that we protect the situation in the west, that we take into consideration the views of our allies in Europe and in the United Nations, and that we must continue to cooperate with them. Failure to do so would weaken or destroy the United Nations effort, both in Korea and elsewhere, perhaps leaving us to act alone. It would tend to break down the Atlantic Pact and lessen the European will to resist aggression.

It is certainly time that the American people cast aside their illusions and realized it is all very well for the United States to assume leadership, but in so doing it must preserve harmony and unity with its allies.

One may well hesitate to criticize General MacArthur too severely. Nevertheless, he seems to have fallen into error through his great enthusiasm for a sweeping victory in the Far East. This might be accomplished. But it also might not unless we threw the major part of our military resources in men and war materials into a supreme struggle in that area—a very serious gamble, the failure of which might lead to disaster to the whole cause of global defense against Communist aggression.

The general took it upon himself to determine military, diplomatic, and political policy from the standpoint of Asia alone. This would be taking a chance, and a very desperate one.

The whole MacArthur program of protest appears to us as a very serious mistake and as a major blunder. As was suggested in our editorial of April 11, nothing has been accomplished except to widen the growing misunderstanding between the United States and its allies and to alienate them, to cool their ardor for further cooperation in Europe, and even to lead to a possible complete breach with them.

Worst of all, the matter of our foreign policy is now being rehearsed in public for the benefit of Russia and Red China. These two countries can now make their plans for the immediate future in view of what appears to be a lack of definite policy agreement between the United States and its allies. This ventilation of our disagreements with Britain, France, and others of our United Nations allies can only be viewed as a serious weakening of our leadership. This is very likely to present new and difficult problems of global security for us and for the United Nations.

Already our actions in the Far East have nearly upset the British Cabinet, causing resignations from its membership, and brought President Auriol on a hurried and unprecedented visit to Washington to assure us that the present French Cabinet crisis will not alter French cooperation. General MacArthur's suggestion that America, in spite of this, should assume world leadership might easily leave us in the seemingly glorious but inconsequential position of leadership with only reluctant and unenthusiastic supporters and followers.

Reorganization of the Department of State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. Y. BERRY
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I have joined with my colleague, Senator FRANCIS CASE, of South Dakota, in the introduction of a bill to provide for the reorganization of the Department of State of the United States in the interest of economy, efficiency, and a more effective administration of affairs, both foreign and domestic. Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I should like to explain my views regarding the need for such action.

This bill as introduced by Senator CASE has been designated as S. 1389, and was introduced April 26, 1951.

NEED FOR REORGANIZATION

The people of the United States, and possibly many of the people of the world, have lost faith in our Secretary of State, Dean Acheson. They no longer have the trust and confidence that is needed in an official who holds the position that Secretary Acheson holds. Especially in times as critical as these do we need someone at the head of our Department of State who not only has the confidence of the people of this Nation, but the people of the world as a whole.

When this situation exists, the people of the Nation look to Congress to bring about the changes they feel should be made in the executive branch of the Government.

There are probably three involuntary methods of replacing an official in the executive branch:

First. Discharge.

Second. Impeaching.

Third. Reorganization of the department.

The first of these methods—discharge—is probably too remote to warrant consideration. The Secretary of State is responsible only to the President, and it is extremely unlikely that the President would discharge the present Secretary.

The second ground—impeachment—is the ground I should first like to have you consider with me. It is my purpose to outline to you the grounds, the procedure, and the evidence that you may be fully advised and reach your own decision, but after my study, I have come to the conclusion that, although grounds for impeachment may exist, the process is lengthy. It would require much time on the part of the House and Senate, and at a time when the fate of the Nation may be hanging in the balance, I wonder about the advisability of such a proceeding.

Under these circumstances, I have come to the conclusion that the better method of accomplishing the purpose of this Congress is to reorganize the Department of State. My colleague, FRANCIS CASE, for many years a member of this body, has developed a program for reorganization which is complete in every detail and which would make for a better and more efficient Department, even though no other purpose were being served thereby.

GROUNDS FOR IMPEACHMENT

The provisions of the Constitution of the United States bearing upon impeachment which might be involved in this study include:

Article I, section 2, clause 5:

The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment.

Article I, section 3, clause 6:

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present.

Article II, section 4:

The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

The grounds for impeachment, stated in article II, section 4, are treason, bribery, and "other high crimes and misdemeanors." The terms "treason" and "bribery" require no definition. Treason, in fact, is defined in article III, section 3 of the Constitution, and the meaning of bribery is well established—Yankwich, district judge, Impeachment of Civil Officers Under the Federal Constitution, 1938, 26 Geo. L. J. at pages 852–853; Third Willoughby on the Constitution, 1929, at page 1449.

The only real question arises as to the meaning of "high crimes and misdemeanors." It has been argued that the phrase comprehends only crimes or offenses under the Federal statutes, the Constitution or the common law. But the view sustained by the better authority is than an offense may be grounds for impeachment even though not a statutory or common law crime—Yankwich, opere citato supra, at pages 853, 860—"a study of English and American precedents in impeachment cases leads to the conclusion that they cover general official misconduct"; from the precedents "it is evident that the interpretation which is placed upon the words 'crimes and misdemeanors' is a broad one; that persons have been impeached and found guilty for acts of misconduct, some of a personal, others of an official character which do not amount to a crime"—Third Willoughby, opere citato supra, at pages 1449–1450; Simpson, Federal Impeachment, 1916, Sixty-fourth University of Pennsylvania Review, at pages 676–695; Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, fourth edition, sections 796–800; First Tucker on the Constitution, 1899, section 200. In Second Watson, opere citato supra, pages 1034–1035, the author declares:

Blackstone says that a crime or misdemeanor is an act committed, or omitted, in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it, though crime in a narrower sense is distinguished from a misdemeanor as being an offense of a deeper and more atrocious dye, and usually amounting to a felony.

A misdemeanor comprehends all indictable offenses which do not amount to a felony; as perjury, battery, libels, conspiracies, attempts and solicitations to commit felonies, and so forth. These seem to be the definitions of these terms at common law, but it would be strange if a civil officer could be impeached for only such offenses as are embraced within the common law definition of "other high crimes and misdemeanors." There is a parliamentary definition of the term "misdemeanor," and a modern writer on the Constitution has said: "The term 'high crimes and misdemeanors' has no significance in the common law concerning crimes subject to indictment." It can only be found in the law of Parliament, and is the technical term which was used by the Commons at the Bar of the Lords for centuries before the existence of the United States. Synonymous with the term "misdemeanor" are the terms misdeed, misconduct, misbehavior, fault, transgression.

Suppose the President of the United States should insist upon using the White House for some purpose which would bring moral disgrace upon the Nation and the established rules of civilized society. Is it to be claimed that he would not be liable to impeachment for such conduct because the offense was not indictable under a Federal law? Or suppose he should refuse to perform the duties, or some of them, which the Constitution enjoins upon him? Would it be claimed that he was not impeachable? In Mississippi v. Johnson, supra, (4 Wall. 475), Chase, Chief Justice, asked, "May not the House of Representatives impeach the President for refusing to execute the laws of Congress?" Suppose the Vice President should refuse to preside over the Senate, or to discharge any of the duties incumbent upon his high office? There is no statute under which he could be indicted and consequently he would escape punishment and would continue to hold his office and embarrass the operation of the Government, but will it be claimed that he would not be subject to impeachment? The managers on behalf of the House of Representatives in the impeachment of President Johnson crystallized the doctrine of impeachable offenses into the following rule: "An impeachable crime or misdemeanor is one in its nature or consequence subversive of some fundamental or essential principle of Government or highly prejudicial to the public interest, and this may consist of a violation of the Constitution, of law, of an official oath, or of duty, by an act committed or omitted, or, without violating a positive law, by the abuse of discretionary powers from improper motives, or from any improper purpose."

The author further states—pages 1036 to 1037:

A civil officer may so behave himself in public as to bring disgrace upon himself and shame upon his country, and he may continue to do this until his name would become a national stench, and yet he would not be subject to indictment by any law of the United States, but he certainly could be impeached. What will these who advocate the doctrine that impeachment will not lie except for an offense punishable by statute, do with the constitutional provision relative to judges which says, "Judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior?" This means that as long as they behave themselves their tenure of office is fixed, and they cannot be disturbed. But suppose they cease to behave themselves? When the Constitution says, "A judge shall hold his office during good behavior," it means that he shall not hold it when it ceases to be good. Suppose he should refuse to sit upon the bench and discharge the duties which the Constitution and the law enjoin upon him, or should become a notoriously corrupt character, and live a notoriously corrupt and debauched life? He could not be indicted for such conduct, and he could not be removed except by impeachment. Would it be claimed that impeachment would not be the proper remedy in such a case?

And in connection with the investigation of the conduct of District Judge English, the House Committee on the Judiciary made the following statement in its report—House Report No. 653, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session—as set out in six Cannon's Precedents of the House of Representatives, 1936, section 545:

Although frequently debated, and the negative advocated by some high authorities, it is now, we believe, considered that impeachment is not confined alone to acts which are forbidden by the Constitution or Federal statutes. The better sustained and modern view is that the provision for impeachment in the Constitution applies not only to high crimes and misdemeanors as those words were understood at common law but also acts which are not defined as criminal and made subject to indictment, but also to those which affect the public welfare. Thus an official may be impeached for offenses of a political character and for gross betrayal of public interests. Also for abuses or betrayal of trusts, for inexcusable negligence of duty, for the tyrannical abuse of power, or, as one writer puts it, for a "breach of official duty by malfeasance or misfeasance, including conduct such as drunkenness when habitual, or in the performance of official duties, gross indecency, profanity, obscenity, or other language used in the discharge of an official function, which tends to bring the office into disrepute, or for an abuse or reckless exercise of discretionary power as well as the breach of an official duty imposed by statute or common law."

The committee held, however, that "No judge may be impeached for a wrong decision"—Sixth Cannon's, opere citato supra.

PERSONS AND OFFENSES COVERED

As indicated above, article II, section 4, of the Constitution designates who may be removed by impeachment, and the offenses, including treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors:

Impeachment is a criminal trial. A true crime must be charged, and the jurisdiction of the Senate is neither more extensive nor more restricted than that of the House of Lords in respect to the nature of the offenses charged. * * * Whether a crime ("Crime" is used, not in a technical sense, but as meaning a "criminal act," the chief element of which is the evil, as distinguished from the virtuous intention) does or does not appear can be determined to some extent by decisions of the Senate in cases of impeachment, but is chiefly to be decided by common-law rulings in similar cases; and in new cases we must frequently be guided by the definitions furnished us by writers on the criminal law, as a result of a close study of the cases decided in the common-law courts. (Impeachable Offenses Under the Constitution of the United States, by George Willett Van Nest, American Law Review, June 27, 1882, pp. 818–819.)

INITIATION OF IMPEACHMENT

The sole power of impeachment is conferred upon the House by article I, section 2, clause 5, of the Constitution of the United States, which reads:

The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers; and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

Impeachment may be initiated by charges made on the floor by a Member on his own responsibility. The question of impeachment is one of constitutional privilege which may be presented at any time by any Member of the House, but recognition to raise a question of constitutional privilege must be preceded by a resolution or notice in writing, and a mere proposition to investigate the conduct of a civil officer is not presented as a matter of constitutional privilege, even though impeachment may be contemplated. Impeachment may also be initiated by a memorial containing charges under oath, by a message from the President, by a charge preferred by a State or territorial legislature, and by petition.

Charges always have been examined by the House before impeachments have been voted. After the charge is originally made, it is by resolution referred to a standing committee, or to a special committee for investigation and report. The investigation by the committee may be conducted ex parte, or it may be conducted to permit respondent to appear in person and by counsel to testify, to present witnesses, and to cross-examine. The House of Representatives, when acting in impeachment proceedings, has the power to compel the attendance of witnesses. The investigations are conducted more or less according to the established rules of evidence, but the strict rules of evidence have been relaxed. Upon the conclusion of the investigation by the designated committee, a report favoring impeachment may be referred to the House Calendar or may be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union. If the latter procedure is adopted, when debate is ended, the Committee of the Whole arises and reports its resolution to the House, whereupon the question is put: "Will the House concur with the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union in the adoption of said resolution?" Usually a record vote is taken, but it is not required.

Managers have been selected by three methods: First, election by ballot, a majority vote being required; second, by resolution naming them; and, third, by resolution authorizing the Speaker to appoint. These managers are usually appointed from those in accord with the sentiment of the House and from both parties. The chairman is designated by the managers selected.

After the House has voted impeachment, it notifies the Senate thereof by message.

Upon receipt of message from the House, the Senate adopts an order and sends a message to the House that it is ready to receive articles.

The managers, on the part of the House, present to the Senate the articles of impeachment signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk. The Chairman of the Committee impeaches at the bar of the Senate by oral accusation and requests that the Senate take order as to appearance.

The accused may appear in person or by attorney, or he may not appear at all in which case trial proceeds as if a plea of not guilty were entered.

The sole power to try impeachments is vested in the Senate by article I, section 3, clause 6, which reads:

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside. And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present.

On the final question of whether an impeachment is to be sustained, the yeas and nays are taken on each article separately, upon which there must be an affirmative vote of two-thirds of the Members present.

The extent to which a judgment in an impeachment proceeding may go is set forth in article I, section 3, clause 7, of the Constitution which reads:

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States: but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law.

GROUNDS AND EVIDENCE

In laying a foundation for any proceedings by the House of Representatives against the Secretary of State for breach of official duty by malfeasance or misfeasance of office, we should have a complete outline of the law and the acts of the Department of State leading up to the present situation—a situation in which we find ourselves engaged in a major war in Korea without United Nations authority, without constitutional authority, and without authority of Congress, a "police action" in which the United States has already suffered some 65,000 casualties, an undeclared war against at least one major power and one minor nation in which the Secretary of State was at least the moving hand in advising the President in his leadership.

The first step in obtaining a background is to find the legal, the constitutional, or the treaty basis for our involvement in Korea. In considering the legal and treaty basis, we turn to the United Nations Charter.

UNITED NATIONS AUTHORITY

The United Nations Charter, setting forth fully and completely the purpose and authority of the organization, membership, and obligations, was adopted by the Congress of the United States in July 1945.

It is the contention of the State Department that such authority as the United States had under the United Nations Charter in sending troops into Korea is under article 39 of the United Nations Charter and the resolution pursuant thereto. Article 39 reads as follows:

The Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with articles 41 and 42, to maintain or restore international peace and security.

I call your attention to this phrase, "and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with articles 41 and 42, to maintain or restore international peace and security."

Article 41 empowers the Security Council to decide what measures not involved in the use of armed force may be employed to give effect to its decision, and it may call upon the members of the United Nations to apply such measures. It reads as follows:

The Security Council may decide what measures not involving the use of armed force are to be employed to give effect to its decisions, and it may call upon the members of the United Nations to apply such measures. These may include complete or partial interruption of economic relations and of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, radio, and other means of communication, and the severance of diplomatic relations.

It should be emphasized that nothing in article 41 could be constructed as authorization for the use of armed force.

Article 42 reads as follows:

Should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in article 41 would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockade, and other operations by air, sea, or land forces of members of the United Nations.

Attention is called to the wording of section 42 which says, "such action 'may'."

Article 43 provides:

1. All members of the United Nations, in order to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security, undertake to make available to the Security Council, on its call and in accordance with a special agreement or agreements, armed forces, assistance, and facilities, including rights of passage, necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

2. Such agreement or agreements shall govern the numbers and types of forces, their degree of readiness and general location, and the nature of the facilities and assistance to be provided.

3. The agreement or agreements shall be negotiated as soon as possible on the initiative of the Security Council. They shall be concluded between the Security Council and members or between the Security Council and groups of members and shall be subject to ratification by the signatory states in accordance with their respective constitutional processes.

Again I emphasize, "and shall be subject to ratification by the signatory states in accordance with their respective constitutional processes."

I would like to quote article 44:

When the Security Council has decided to use force it shall, before calling upon a member not represented on it to provide armed forces in fulfillment of the obligations assumed under article 43, invite that member, if the member so desires, to participate in the decisions of the Security Council concerning the employment of contingents of that member's armed forces.

This further points out that the "agreement or agreements" had to be made before force could be used.

Article 45 provides:

In order to enable the United Nations to take urgent military measures, members shall hold immediately available national air-force contingents for combined international enforcement action. The strength and degree of readiness of those contingents and plans for their combined action shall be determined, within the limits laid down in the special agreement or agreements referred to in article 43, by the Security Council with the assistance of the military staff committee.

I point out the wording, "within the limits laid down in the special agreement or agreements referred to in article 43, by the Security Council with the assistance of the military staff committee."

THE PARTICIPATION ACT

Although more than 5 years have elapsed since the United Nations Charter has been adopted, neither the United States nor any other member nation has entered into any agreement or agreements with the Security Council of the United Nations, nor has the Congress of the United States had any opportunity to take any steps which might implement the Charter as therein provided, except that in 1949, Congress, by the United Nations Participation Act as amended in 1949, authorized the assigning to the United Nations an amount not to exceed 1,000 noncombat personnel of the Armed Forces.

In order to authorize the President to enter into the agreement or agreements, the Congress in 1945 enacted H. R. 4618 and S. 1580, the same being section 287d of title 22 of the United States Code, which is as follows:

The President is authorized to negotiate a special agreement or agreements with the Security Council which shall be subject to the approval of the Congress by appropriate act or joint resolution, providing for the numbers and types of armed forces, their degree of readiness and general location, and the nature of facilities and assistance, including rights of passage, to be made available to the Security Council on its call for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security in accordance with article 43 of said Charter. The President shall not be deemed to require the authorization of the Congress to make available to the Security Council on its call in order to take action under article 42 of said Charter and pursuant to such special agreement or agreements the Armed Forces, facilities, or assistance provided for therein: Provided, That except as authorized in section 287d–1 of this title, nothing contained in this section shall be construed as an authorization to the President by the Congress to make available to the Security Council for such purpose armed forces, facilities, or assistance in addition to the forces, facilities, and assistance provided for in such special agreement or agreements.

To further explain the meaning of the charter and the law, at the time of the hearing before the House Foreign Affairs Committee on December 7, 1950, reported on page 23 of such hearings, Secretary Acheson testified as follows in response to questions from members of the committee:

Mr. BURGIN. Mr. Chairman, does that mean the Security Council names the number and amounts of troops and equipment we shall furnish the Security Council?

Mr. ACHESON. No. It means that we must work out with the Security Council a special agreement or agreements in which we develop the number of troops, the location, the degree of readiness, etc.; and that when we have done that, and when you gentlemen have approved it, then and only then, are we bound to furnish that contingent of troops to the Security Council; and the President is not authorized to furnish any more than you have approved of in that agreement.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This, then, would be in the nature of a police force which the President could make available automatically, but he would be unable to go beyond that with the unlimited force which Congress would still have to pass upon for unlimited war?

Mr. ACHESON. Yes. Beyond the amount which you have agreed in the special agreement, and the President is not given authority to furnish any additional troops, and whatever happens after that is determined by the ordinary constitutional relations between the Congress and the President.

Let us look at pages 25 and 26 of the same hearings and see the answer Secretary Acheson gave in answer to a question of Congressman KEE:

Mr. KEE. I would like to clear up a question that is in my mind in respect to section 6 (U. N. participation act) that authorizes the President to negotiate special agreements with reference to providing troops and so forth, and the Armed Forces to be provided. The President has negotiated this agreement with the Council, as I understand this, without consulting or submitting the matter to Congress. If it becomes necessary in the course of an emergency, he can proceed to supply the forces agreed upon before submitting the agreement to Congress for action, is that correct?

Mr. ACHESON. This is an important question of Judge KEE, and may I state his question and my answer so that it will be quite clear here. The Judge asks whether the language beginning on line 19 of page 5, which says the President shall not be deemed to require the authorization of Congress to make available to the Security Council on its call in order to take action under article 42 of the Charter, means that the President may provide these forces prior to the time when any special agreement has been approved by the Congress.

The answer to that question is "No," that the President may not do that, that such special agreements refer to the special agreements which shall be subject to the approval of the Congress, so that until the special agreement has been negotiated and approved by the Congress, it has no force and effect.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is a little hard for us to get the meaning of article 42, Mr. Secretary. Will you explain what this is?

Mr. ACHESON. Article 42 says—should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in article 41—now those are the measures short of armed forces—would be inadequate or prove to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security, and such action may include demonstrations, blockades, and other operations by air, sea, or land forces of members of the United Nations. Now that is the article under which the international organization puts into effect the police forces which are made available to it under article 43, and the only reason that the President is permitted to make these forces available, after the special agreement has been approved is to carry out the provisions of article 42, to which we are committed by our ratification of the Charter.

Mr. RYTER. That may mean actual fighting, may it not?

Mr. ACHESON. Yes, it may.

Mr. FLOOD. It is also true, is it not, Mr. Secretary, that these occurrences come up only in the case of the breach of the peace or threatened breach of the peace?

Mr. ACHESON. That is correct.

In this connection it is also interesting to note the statement of Sir Gladwynn Jebb, United Kingdom representative to the United Nations, which can be found on page 54 of House Report No. 2495, dated July 11, 1950, in which he said:

Had the Charter become fully into force, and had the agreement provided for in article 43 of the Charter been concluded, we should, of cource, have proceeded differently and the action to be taken by the Security Council to repel the armed attack would no doubt have been founded on article 42. As it is, however, we can naturally only act under article 39, which enabled the Security Council to recommend what measures should be taken to restore international peace and security.

The House Foreign Affairs Committee, when reporting the bill to the floor for consideration by the House as a whole, included in their report the following:

At the same time the bill, by providing that the Congress shall approve any such agreement or agreements as may be negotiated, insures that the Congress will have full opportunity to pass upon the terms and provisions thereof.

At the time the legislation was considered on the floor of the House, Chairman Sol Bloom, of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, in his explanation of the legislation, stated on the floor, and this can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 91, part 9, page 12267, the following:

The position of the Congress is fully protected by the requirement that the military agreement to preserve the peace must be passed upon by Congress before it becomes effective. Also the obligation of the United States to make forces available to the Security Council does not become effective until a special agreement has been passed upon by Congress.

In considering this legislation on the floor of the United States Senate on November 26, 1945, Senator CONNALLY, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, stated, which statement is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 91, part 8, pages 10967 and 10968, as follows:

These contracts must be submitted to Congress. When the agreements are made with the Security Council, they must come back here. Senators will have an opportunity to debate them, to offer amendments, to qualify them, and so forth. As to declaring war, that is not a question which is involved here at all. These forces are not exacted to make war. They are exacted as peace forces, to undertake to preserve peaceful nations against aggression and attack. If we wish to go to war, we can still go to war, by declaring war and making use of our entire armed forces. I do not suppose we would hesitate to do it if we felt that the national interest required or demanded it.

Thus it is made clear by the original United Nations Participation Act that we, as an individual member of the U. N., had not in any way committed ourselves to furnish armed forces to the United Nations for use in armed intervention under the provisions of the articles of the United Nations Charter to prevent breaches of the peace or maintain international security.

In 1947 we find that evidence is further presented to the effect that these agreements must be completed before troops or armed forces could be assigned to the United Nations by a speech delivered by Herschel V. Johnson, who was the Deputy United States Representative to the United Nations. Mr. Johnson, in a speech delivered on June 4, 1947—and this speech can be found on page 1143 of Document No. 123, Eighty-first Congress, first session, of the Senate entitled "A Decade of American Foreign Policy." Mr. Johnson said as follows:

One vital organization task remains undone. Article 43 of the Charter imposes upon the Security Council the responsibility for negotiating "as soon as possible" special agreements under which the member states will make available to the Security Council, on its call, "armed forces, assistance, and facilities, including rights of passage, necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security." Until those agreements have been concluded and put into force, the Security Council will be unable to fulfill its responsibilities as the enforcement agency of the United Nations. Chapter VII of the Charter, insofar as it relates to military enforcement measures, will remain inoperative.

Therefore we see that even in 1947 there was no authorization.

On October 10, 1949, the Congress enacted 287d–1 of title 22 of the United States Code, which specifically provided that they could not involve the employment of armed forces contemplated by chapter VII of the United Nations Charter. The limitations were specific. That legislation authorized the President to detail a total of not more than 1,000 noncombat personnel to a mission at any one time.

In connection with the legislation which was enacted, it is interesting to note on page 17 of the hearings which were held before the House Foreign Affairs Committee on H. R. 3085, 4497, 4708, on May 10, 11, 12, and 13 of 1949, the statement was made by Mr. Ernest A. Gross, now adviser to Ambassador Austin at the United Nations, as follows:

I think this is even a more important point. Because of the fact that under the Constitution American military personnel cannot be made available to foreign powers or foreign organizations, except by authority of law, it has been necessary, instead of detailing the personnel to the United Nations for service with these missions, to keep them within American control, so to speak, so they would be responsible to and report to the military chief, the American military chief, or to the top American diplomatic official in the area or attached to the commission.

SUMMARY

From a complete research of both the House Foreign Affairs Committee and Senate Foreign Relations Committee, it is a certainty there have been no agreement or agreements entered into between the United States and the United Nations Security Council as provided for in article 43 of the Charter and the Participation Act of 1945. On June 25, 1950, the Security Council had no authority to send any troops to Korea. The President of the United States had no authority to send any troops to Korea under any authority of the United Nations.

HISTORY OF KOREA

According to the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations pursuant to House Resolution 206 entitled "Background Information on Korea," on page 43 thereof is the statement by our representative to the United Nations on June 25, 1950, which is in part as follows:

At 4 o'clock in the morning Sunday, June 25, Korean time, armed forces from North Korea commenced an unprovoked assault against the territory of the Republic of Korea. This assault was launched by ground forces along the thirty-eighth parallel, in the Ongjin, Kaesong, and Chunshon sectors, and by amphibious landings on the east coast in the vicinity of Jangmung. In addition, North Korean aircraft have attacked and strafed the Kimpo airport in the outskirts of the capital city of Seoul.

Mr. President, I have tabled a draft resolution which notes the Security Council's grave concern at the invasion of the Republic of Korea by the armed forces of North Korea. This draft resolution calls upon the authorities in the North to cease hostilities and to withdraw armed forces to the border along the thirty-eighth parallel.

The draft resolution requests that the United Nations Commission on Korea observe the withdrawal of the North Korean forces to the thirty-eighth parallel and keep the Security Council informed on the implementation and execution of the resolution. The draft resolution also calls upon all members of the United Nations to render every assistance to the United Nations in the carrying out of this resolution and to refrain from giving assistance to the North Korean authorities.

As a result of that report, Resolution 1 was adopted by the Security Council, which resolution is in part as follows:

III. Calls upon members to render every assistance to the United Nations in the execution of this resolution and to refrain from giving assistance to the North Korean authorities.

On page 45 of the above-mentioned House report appears the statement by the President of the United States on June 27, 1950, which is in part as follows:

In Korea the Government forces, which were armed to prevent border raids and to preserve internal security, were attacked by invading forces from North Korea. The Security Council of the United Nations called upon the invading troops to cease hostilities a..d to withdraw to the thirty-eighth parallel. This they have not done, but on the contrary have pressed the attack. The Security Council called upon all members of the United Nations to render every assistance to the United Nations in the execution of this resolution. In these circumstances I have ordered United States air and sea forces to give the Korean Government troops cover and support. * * *

Accordingly I have ordered the Seventh Fleet to prevent any attack on Formosa. As a corollary to this action I am calling upon the Chinese Government on Formosa to cease all air and sea operations against the mainland. The Seventh Fleet will see that this is done. The determination of the future status of Formosa must await the restoration of security in the Pacific, a peace settlement with Japan, or consideration by the United Nations. * * *

I have instructed Ambassador Austin, as the representative of the United States to the Security Council, to report these steps to the Council.

It should be noted at this time that the minutes of the United Nations for June 27, 1950, contain the statement of Ambassador Warren Austin as follows:

The United Nations finds itself confronted today with the gravest crisis in its existence.

Forty-eight hours ago the Security Council, in an emergency session, determined that the armed invasion of the Republic of Korea by armed forces from northern Korea constituted a breach of the peace. Accordingly, the Security Council called for a cessation of hostilities forthwith and the withdrawal by the northern Korean authorities of their armed forces to the thirty-eighth parallel. The Security Council also requested the United Nations Commission on Korea to observe the withdrawal and to report. Finally, the Security Council called upon all members to render every assistance to the United Nations in the execution of the resolution and to refrain from giving assistance to the North Korean authorities.

The decision of the Security Council has been broadcast to the Korean authorities and is known to them. We now have before us the report of the United Nations Commission for Korea which confirms our fears. It is clear that the authorities in North Korea have completely disregarded and flouted the decision of the Security Council. The armed invasion of the Republic of Korea continues. This is, in fact, an attack on the United Nations itself. The North Korean authorities have called upon the established government of the Republic to surrender.

It is hard to imagine a more glaring example of disregard for the United Nations and for all the principles which it represents. The most important provisions of the Charter are those outlawing aggressive war. It is precisely these provisions which the North Korean authorities have violated.

It is the plain duty of the Security Council to invoke stringent sanctions to restore international peace.

The Republic of Korea has appealed to the United Nations for protection. I am happy and proud to report that the United States is prepared as a loyal member of the United Nations to furnish assistance to the Republic of Korea.

I have tabled a resolution which I ask the Council to consider favorably as the next step to restore world peace. That resolution is as follows:

"The Security Council—

"Having determined that the armed attack upon the Republic of Korea by forces from North Korea constitutes a breach of the peace;

"Having called for an immediate cessation of hostilities; and

"Having called upon the authorities of North Korea to withdraw forthwith their armed forces to the thirty-eighth parallel; and

"Having noted from the report of the United Nations Commission for Korea that the authorities in North Korea have neither ceased hostilities nor withdrawn their armed forces to the thirty-eighth parallel, and that urgent military measures are required to restore international peace and security; and

"Having noted the appeal from the Republic of Korea to the United Nations for immediate and effective steps to secure peace and security;

"Recommends that the members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area."

This is the logical consequence of the resolution concerning the complaint of aggression upon the Republic of Korea adopted at the four hundred and seventy-third meeting of the Security Council on June 25, 1950, and the subsequent events recited in the preamble of this resolution. That resolution of June 25 called upon all members to render every assistance to the United Nations in the execution of this resolution, and to refrain from giving assistance to the North Korean authorities. This new resolution is the logical next step. Its significance is affected by the violation of the former resolution, the continuation of aggression, and the urgent military measures required.

I wish now to read the statement which the President of the United States made today on this critical situation. (Statement herein quoted above in part.)

It is unquestioned from the United Nations Security Council minutes that this resolution and the report of the President were tabled at 3 o'clock in the afternoon on June 27. Attention is called to the fact that the statement of the President of the United States which was tabled with the resolution says:

I have ordered United States air and sea forces to give the Korean Government troops cover and support.

Alhough it is not known the exact time such order was made by the President, it was, of necessity, made prior to 3 p. m. on June 27.

According to the Security Council meetings, when the Council convened at 3 p. m., on June 27, there were tabled two resolutions—the resolution of Yugoslavia Government and the Austin resolution. The Yugoslavia resolution was reported in the New York Times under date of June 28, 1950, as follows:

Today Dr. Bebler said that the Council "after only 2 days of fighting," should not abandon hope that the two sides would enter into negotiations, and introduced a resolution calling for the appointment of a United Nations mediator.

According to the minutes of the Council, a recording is made of the two resolutions. The President of the Security Council said that under rule 32, motions and draft resolutions have precedence in the order of their submission. "Under this rule, I have to put the United States draft resolution to the vote first," he said.

Austin presented this resolution at the time the Council convened at 3 p. m., and that meeting adjourned at 6: 15 p. m. The Council then reconvened at 10: 25 p. m., and it was during the meeting that convened at 10: 25 p. m., that both resolutions were voted upon.

According to the minutes of the United Nations Security Council, there was a lapse of time from 3 p. m., until at least 10: 45 p. m., that night before the Austin resolution was adopted. It should be noted that in the afternoon meeting, Austin read President Truman's statement in which he said, "I have ordered United States air and sea forces," and so forth.

Even if the agreements had been in force, and they are not, President Truman still would have jumped the authority of the resolution by at least 7 hours in ordering American armed intervention in the Korean war.

The next official action taken by the United Nations Security Council was on July 7 when the following resolution was adopted:

The Security Council, having determined that the armed attack upon the Republic of Korea by forces from North Korea constitutes a breach of the peace, having recommended that members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as may be necessary to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area:

(1) Welcomes the prompt and vigorous support which governments and peoples of the United Nations have given to its resolutions of 25 and 27 June 1950 to assist the Republic of Korea in defending itself against armed attack and thus to restore international peace and security in the area;

(2) Notes that members of the United Nations have transmitted to the United Nations offers of assistance for the Republic of Korea;

(3) Recommends that all members providing military forces and other assistance pursuant to the aforesaid Security Council resolutions make such forces and other assistance available to a unified command under the United States;

(4) Requests the United States to designate the commander of such forces;

(5) Authorizes the unified command at its discretion to use the United Nations flag in the course of operations against North Korean forces concurrently with the flags of the various nations participating;

(6) Requests the United States to provide the Security Council with reports, as appropriate, on the course of action taken under the unified command.

On July 8, the President of the United States made the following statement:

The Security Council of the United Nations in its resolution of July 7, 1950, has recommended that all members providing military forces and other assistance pursuant to the Security Council resolutions of June 25 and 27, make such forces and other assistance available to a unified command under the United States.

The Security Council resolution also requests that the United States designate the commander of such forces, and authorizes the unified command at its discretion to use the United Nations flag in the course of operations against the North Korean forces concurrently with the flags of the various nations participating.

I am responding to the recommendations of the Security Council and have designated Gen. Douglas MacArthur as the commanding general of the military forces which the members of the United Nations place under the unified command of the United States pursuant to the United Nations assistance to the Republic of Korea in repelling the unprovoked armed attack against it.

I am directing General MacArthur, pursuant to the Security Council resolution, to use the United Nations flag in the course of operations against the North Korean forces concurrently with the flags of the various nations participating.

PRESIDENT'S CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY

It has been noted in the past that numerous Presidents have sent troops into foreign lands in defense of the lives, the property, and treaty obligations of the United States. However, in this case it should be noted that at the time of entry, there were no lives and no property involved in South Korea. It should further be noted that there was no treaty with South Korea requiring us to furnish them with military assistance, and that under the United Nations Charter and our Participation Act we had not completed the agreement or agreements with the Security Council to provide it with troops. As stated by Herschel Johnson, the United Nations Charter did not become a treaty and binding upon the United States until the agreement or agreements had been executed.

Even though the President in his statement of June 28, 1950, attempted to represent to the American public the fact that he had the authority to send American Armed Forces into Korea under Article 39 of the United Nations Charter and pursuant to International law, it is very clear that neither of these authorities existed at that time, because he had not implemented the Charter under Article 43, and there were no American lives and no American property involved.

To summarize, there is no precedent in the history of this Nation for the President of the United States to involve this Nation in a war, such as that in which it is involved at the present time under the Constitution without a declaration of war or approval by Congress. There is no authority under the United Nations authorizing the action which this Nation has taken, and in the words of Senator PAUL DOUGLAS in hearings following the introduction of a resolution to revise the United Nations Charter he stated on page 12 of the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate on February 2, 1950:

For it should never be forgotten that the Charter of the United Nations declares that the first purpose of the United Nations is * * * to maintain international peace and security and to that end, to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace and to bring about by peaceful means and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace.

That is what we agreed to when we ratified the Charter. But due to structural defects in that Charter and to to the Russian attitude, we have failed to realize that purpose.

FOREIGN POLICY

In a brief prepared by the Department of State on the authority of the President to repel the attack in Korea found in Background Information on Korea, page 65, the Secretary of State said as follows:

Thus, even before the ratification of the United Nations Charter, the President had used the Armed Forces of the United States without consulting the Congress for the purpose of protecting the foreign policy of the United States. The ratification of the United Nations Charter was, of course, the landmark in the development of the American foreign policy.

The agreement or agreements had not been consummated with the Security Council, implementing the United Nations Charter, thus the adoption of the United Nations Charter had not, as yet, become a part of the United States policy. On June 27, 1950, when the President ordered American troops into action at least 7 hours prior to the resolution of the United Nations Security Council upon which authority they rely, such action could not have been taken for the purpose of "protecting the foreign policy of the United States under the United Nations Charter."

It cannot be said that the policy of the United Nations with regard to Korea became a policy of the United States, calling for armed intervention with regard to Korea, since Resolution No. 1, which was the only one adopted at the time, calls for only cessation of hostilities, calls for withdrawal of North Korean armed forces, and requests the United Nations Commission on Korea to keep the Council informed. I call your attention to the fact that section 3 says:

Calls upon all members to render every assistance to the United Nations in the execution of this resolution and to refrain from giving assistance to the North Korean authorities.

The words "in the execution of this resolution" preclude the President or the Secretary of State from claiming that the United Nations called upon all members to render "military" assistance to the United Nations because of the phrase "in the execution of this resolution." The resolution itself covers merely cessation of hostilities and authority to the Commission on Korea, it carefully avoids reference to military assistance to South Korea, and then, since our Government ordered troops into Korea without any recommendation or request from the Security Council, there can be no claim that the action taken by the President was in any manner in support of American foreign policy under the United Nations Charter. The minutes prove that the Security Council has not even considered military operations or the authorizing of any such operations.

FOREIGN POLICY

It should be further pointed out that the adoption of the United Nations charter had no bearing on American foreign policy, because on January 12, 1950, Secretary Acheson stated that our foreign policy insofar as Korea was concerned was as follows:

Defensive perimeter runs along the Aleutians to Japan and then goes to the Ryukyus [Okinawa] * * * [and] to the Philippines. * * *

So far as the military security of other areas in the Pacific is concerned, it must be clear that no person can guarantee these areas against military attack. But it must also be clear that such a guaranty is hardly sensible or necessary with the realm of practical relationship. Should such an attack occur—one hesitates to say where such an armed attack could come from—the initial reliance must be on the people attacked to resist it and then upon the commitments of the entire civilized world under the charter of the United Nations. * * * But it is a mistake, I think, in considering Pacific and far-eastern problems to become obsessed with military considerations.

It was not an obsession on January 12, 1950, but on June 25, 1950, it was. On January 12, 1950, we were not to become obsessed with military considerations; today we are obsessed with some 65,000 casualties.

What was the American foreign policy on June 26, 1950? Quoting the New York Times for June 27, 1950, it read as follows:

Rear Admiral Hillenkoetter, Central Intelligence Agency, convinced Senate critics that the intelligence service was not caught by surprise by the Korean invasion. He revealed that the invasion of South Korea was detailed in the Soviet publication, Izvestia, which on June 10, 1950, printed a timetable for uniting Korea under a single parliament.

UNITED NATIONS EFFORT?

On June 29, 1950, on July 3, 1950, and on March 24, 1951, the State Department issued memorandums on the authority of the President to repel the attack in Korea, portions of which are as follows:

All actions taken by the United States to restore the peace in Korea have been under the aegis of the United Nations. * * *

In conclusion, the action of the United States Government in Korea is taken in support of the authority of the United Nations. It is taken to restore peace and security to the Pacific area.

Secretary Acheson at his news conference on June 28 emphasized that the actions of the United States had been taken in support of the United Nations. "After June 25," he said, "all action in Korea has been under the aegis of the United Nations."

The political issues, which General MacArthur has stated are beyond his responsibility as a field commander, are being dealt with in the United Nations and by intergovernmental consultations.

The last statement was released the day General MacArthur asserted he was ready to confer in the field with the commander of the Chinese and North Korean forces to end the war.

All of these quotations indicate an attempt on the part of the Secretary of State to disguise our military actions as those of the United Nations. In contradiction of these I set forth a letter received by me from Secretary of State Dean Acheson under date of April 17, 1951, which sets forth as follows:

I am in receipt of your letter of March 19 in which you pose the general question of the status of United States troops in Korea. This letter will amplify more fully what, of necessity, were rather brief responses to questions asked on March 15 when I had the privilege of meeting with you and other Members of Congress.

The over-all directives under which military action in Korea is being conducted are in the main embodied in three resolutions passed by the United Nations shortly after the outbreak of hostilities in Korea. In general, the Security Council resolution of June 25, 1950, determined that the attack on the Republic of Korea was a breach of the peace, called for immediate cessation of hostilities, and called upon United Nations members to render every assistance to the United Nations in the execution of the resolution. The Security Council resolution of June 27, 1950, recommended that members of the United Nations furnish such assistance to the Republic of Korea as necessary to repel the armed attack and restore peace in the area.

On July 7, 1950, the Security Council passed a third resolution recommending that the United Nations members make their forces and assistance "available to a unified command under the United States," and requesting "the United States to designate the commander of such forces." This same resolution of July 7 authorizes "the unified command at its discretion to use the United Nations flag in the course of operations against North Korean forces concurrently with the flags of various nations participating."

On July 8 the President of the United States stated: "I am responding to the recommendation of the Security Council and have designated General Douglas MacArthur as the Commanding General of the military forces which the members of the United Nations place under the unified command of the United States pursuant to the United Nations" assistance to the Republic of Korea in repelling the unprovoked armed attack against it.

"I am directing General MacArthur, pursuant to the Security Council resolution, to use the United Nations flag in the course of operations against the North Korean forces concurrently with the flags of various nations participating."

Pursuant to the Security Council resolution, the forces furnished by the United States and by all other United Nations Members are fighting under their own flags and concurrently under the United Nations flag.

The Commanding General of the forces placed under the unified command reports to the President of the United States through the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Therefore, it follows that any military action taken by the unified command is taken in the same manner as military action taken by the United Staets. In the event the United Nations should disapprove actions of the United States Government in its capacity as the unified command, presumably the United Nations could revoke the authority of the United States Government to act as the unified command. However, such action would not affect the relation of the United States forces and the United States commander.

The United States forces supporting the Security Council resolutions are commanded by the Commander-in-Chief of the United States Forces in the Far East (CINCFE). This officer is not an agent of the Security Council. The Security Council has no force of its own, and therefore, it has not designated any commander of such a force. It has recommended that Members of the United Nations render assistance to repel the attack and restore peace in the area, that Members make forces and assistatnce available to a unified command under the United States, and that the United States designate the commander of such forces. No action has been taken which has transformed the United States forces into United Nations forces, and the United States forces have, as well as other forces participating in the effort, retained their identity.

The resolutions passed by the United Nations under which military action is being taken in Korea contain broad directives. No United Nations resolution attempts to give to the unified command instructions as to how military action is to be carried out or to place any limitation on military action taken in Korea to accomplish the objective of the Security Council resolutions "to repel the armed attack and to restore international peace and security in the area." Thus, the Commanding General of the forces made available to the unified command is free within the framework of directives from the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff to make the necessary decisions to carry forward the military phase of the United Nations action without further Security Council decisions.

IN SUMMARY

By way of summary, there are three involuntary methods of replacing an official in the executive branch of government:

First. Discharge.

Second. Impeachment.

Third. Reorganization of the Department.

I have already stated that discharge is improbable.

I believe I have presented a sound case of misfeasance and malfeasance in office under which the decisions of the courts amount to high crimes and misdemeanors under the Constitution. That such high crimes and misdemeanors are based upon the fact that the Secretary of State of the United States advised the President of the United States to send Armed Forces into Korea without authority of the United Nations, without authority of the Constitution, without authority of the Congress.

With or without authority, this Nation is actually engaged in war in Korea, a war which must be terminated honorably, successfully, and at the earliest possible date. Since this is true and since unity of purpose is essential to the speedy termination of such war, I believe it would be for the best interests of this Nation that no impeachment proceedings, which would disrupt national unity, be commenced. I therefore recommend to the Congress the passage of legislation providing for the reorganization of the Department of State, which I am today introducing in this body and which my colleague, FRANCIS CASE, of South Dakota, has already introduced in the Senate.

Nazi War Criminals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS B. HELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, many of us in this House were terribly shocked recently by the action of our American authorities in Germany who reprieved the death sentence of 21 German war criminals and completely set free a number of others. These reprieves and pardons for outright murderers, who committed the greatest crimes recorded in human history against millions of innocent and helpless people of all religious faiths and of various nationalities and races, have aroused against us the contempt of all freedom-loving and righteous people throughout the world.

By our action, we are courting a discredited and despised element—discredited and despised even in Germany—and in so doing we are jeopardizing the tremendous moral support we have had throughout the world in our struggle against the destructive ideologies of Nazi totalitarianism. Upright and fair-minded people in this country and all over the world were shocked by this disgraceful action of our officials in Germany and their unwarranted disregard of the decisions handed down by the Nuremberg courts against these war criminals.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with this matter, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues a very interesting letter which was published in the Christian Science Monitor, May 1, 1951, and written by Frederick C. McKee, chairman of the Committee on National Affairs. This committee, whose main offices are in New York, is encouraging all "action to strengthen national and international organization for security, freedom, and justice," and lists on its executive committee such outstanding Americans as the noted church leader Dr. Henry A. Atkinson; Editor Barry Bingham, of the Louisville Courier-Journal; Russell W. Davenport; Clark M. Eichelberger; George Fielding Eliot; August Heckscher; Edgar Ansel Mowrer; former Ambassador Ruth Bryan Owen Rhode; Gen. Telford Taylor; former chief counsel for war crimes in the United States Military Government in Germany, and others. Mr. McKee's letter follows:

NUREMBERG COMMUTATIONS—WAR CRIMINALS

To the Christian Science Monitor:

The recent commutation by High Commissioner McCloy of the sentences of 79 German war criminals convicted of heinous crimes against humanity is alarming. Among the criminals, of whom 21 now escape the death sentence and 34 are set free, are Nazi officials who planned and executed Hitler's murder program, who directed a campaign of wholesale slaughter in the occupied areas, and who committed atrocities in the concentration camps. These sentences had previously been confirmed by General Clay upon the advice of counsel of impeccable integrity and competence.

The Advisory Board on Clemency for War Criminals, appointed by Mr. McCloy, heard only the lawyers representing the convicted criminals, representatives of the prosecution not being allowed to participate. In recommending the reduction of sentences they nevertheless pointed out that they were "not entitled to grant relief beyond that warranted by mitigating circumstances and fair consideration of individual situations." They further stated that clemency "may be an encouraging example, but a mistaken tenderness toward the perpetrators of mass murder would be a mockery. It would undo what Nuremberg has accomplished if in the end we were guided entirely by considerations of sympathy or generosity. Executive clemency does not exist to that end."

But the fact is that these commutations are "a mistaken tenderness towards the perpetrators of mass murder," constitute "a mockery" of what Nuremberg has accomplished, and are dangerous for the following reasons:

1. They tend to throw into doubt the entire basis, procedure, and judgments of the trials conducted by the United States military tribunals at Nuremberg. Although both Mr. McCloy and the members of his clemency board defend the Nuremberg trials, it would have been more appropriate to sustain the results of the trials by confirming rather than by upsetting the verdicts. In granting the commutations expediency appears to have been a factor in seeking the favor of those elements in Germany whose devotion to democracy is suspect.

2. At a time when it is contemplated that Germany be granted greater independence, to reduce the sentences of the perpetrators of inhumanities, many of whom are now able to return to public life, hardly encourages the democratic elements in Germany.

3. The commutation of the sentences of Nazi war criminals has alarmed our allies among the democratic nations of Western Europe and among the believers in democracy in the countries behind the iron curtain.

4. If these commutations were intended to placate German opinion in the effort to make Western Germany a bulwark against the very real threat of Soviet aggression, such a policy of expediency does not accomplish its purpose and leads to other evils. Reports already indicate that the Germans are not satisfied with the extent of the commutations and are urging the release of all war criminals. The United States cannot safely copy the Russian technique of currying favor with former Nazi leaders, for these criminals are basically totalitarians, and hence more sympathetic to the totalitarian East than the democratic West.

Ready in Revolt, Chinese Reds Kill, Starve, and Enslave People of China—Letter Tells of Sufferings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting the pertinent facts in a letter which I have received from China. I am eliminating such parts as might lead to the identification of the sender, in order to prevent any retaliation against him.

The letter reveals the deplorable and horrifying conditions in China today. It also reveals why it would be possible, with intelligent guidance, to create a backfire that would end the war in Korea and prevent thousands of additional American casualties; and at the same time, help to save Asia and the world from the Communist threat.

This letter said in part:

Although I am one of the millions who have a definite reason to oppose communism, not only realize there is no middle course to take, but also advocate such antihuman or inhuman slave policy must be done away with. I join you at least in spirit to carry out your brave and wise action. I admire the Americans and I admire you.

As a Chinese and being enslaved by the Chinese Communists, who are themselves slaves of Moscow, I secretly succeeded in getting this letter through and asked a friend of mine to mail it to you.

Innocent people are being slaughtered in China by the thousands in a month. There is no freedom, but fear; no food, but hunger. It is hell. I am an American-educated Chinese and forced to do degrading work by the people's government. I know my fate will be worse yet.

I hope you will try your best to help the central government in Formosa to fight back to the mainland and thus restore freedom to the millions. I think America must wake up before it is too late.

A Great Fermentation Is Taking Place; the Distillation Will Be Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat and Chronicle, in which are proposed and answered many questions of national interest vitally affecting the welfare of our country. The editorial writer reaches an optimistic conclusion, to which all all of us hopefully subscribe. It is worthy of wide dissemination.

A GREAT FERMENTATION IS TAKING PLACE; THE DISTILLATION WILL BE UNITY

It should be remembered in all the flaming discussion of the hour that the American people are not as disunited as a stranger might think. It cannot be doubted for a moment that the President and his Cabinet members, the Congress and the Defense Department are governed by the same love of country and eagerness for sound peace that moves the rest of us. It is true that even in America there are weasels and skunks and other unpleasant fauna. They are outnumbered; they can do no lasting harm.

Our differences are in the method of achieving what we all desire. We believe there is a definite weakness in our leadership. We also believe that those weaknesses can be overcome in the democratic way and that eventually we will win through.

Washington is a land of geysers. Excitement, politics, foreign relations, and domestic affairs are in constant eruption. Some of those fountains emit nauseating odors. Others excite awe. Together they lead the more thoughtful citizen to prayerful thought.

The great geyser of the past few weeks was the MacArthur visit. Because that visit sent emotions soaring, because it brought into clear view the basic differences of opinion as to our conduct in the Orient, it was one of the great dramatic events of the years. And because it was so all-encompassing it shed a white light on the confusions and the conflicts which rule in Washington.

Little Alice, if you remember your wonderland, nibbled a bit of cake and shrank so quickly that her chin smacked against her slippers. As our cartoonist shows in an adjoining column, our President has been eating some bitter cake and as a result has lost stature. Alice recovered. Whether the President can find a speedy antidote for his cake is a problem to which he doubtless is giving attention.

MacArthur has one great advantage over the President. He has a definite program for prosecuting affairs in the Far East. The President has none. MacArthur would do something positive. He would move as the British, weak as they are, moved to threaten military action in Iran if that Government choked off their oil supply. He speaks as one knowing the territory and knowing the opposition. He proposes direct action, confidence in victory. That program opposes a weak, wavering, and indecisive course laid out by the administration.

There will be debate and hearings on the subject before we know whether we are to continue in a period of indecision or will take counteraction against the Reds. Unfortunately the choice between the two plans is political at the moment. We are arguing about defense along the party line rather than along the American line.

Mr. Truman lost stature by his treatment of MacArthur. No matter how one argues his rights in the matter, the sacking of the general was a brutal affair. The President compounded the offense by ignoring the general's return to Washington to finish 52 years of distinguished service. Or, worse yet, he sulkily recognized the return by sending his pseudo-military aide to represent the White House.

But there have been other ingredients in the bitter cake nibbled by the President. His sheltering of shady friends. His support of weak advisers. His stubborn defense of ill-advised programs in the domestic field. Because of all these we have no true over-all program. The President says he works for peace and we must believe him. Yet he offers no positive program. He works in secret and snubs the public's interest in the outcome of our difficulties.

As a matter of fact, Washington just now raises more questions than it answers.

Will MacArthur's proposals as to Korea go unheeded? Probably not. Some of them already are undertaken in part.

Will there be a cleaning out of those who have sullied the administration? Probably not; the President still is unconcerned over the misdeeds of his pets.

Will there be a real system of controls? No. Too unpopular.

Will there be a reasonably satisfactory system of universal military training? Yes, thanks to nonpartisan action in Congress.

Will Dean Acheson remain as Secretary of State? Doubtless, as long as he can stand the criticism fired at him from every direction.

Will General Marshall remain as Defense Secretary? Probably as long as he desires to do so. He is surprisingly vigorous. He is admired as a soldier, criticized by many as ineffective in matters of policy.

How about the experiment of a woman as a Deputy Defense Secretary? Anna Rosenberg is an eloquent, able, hard-working person.

What of the Joint Chiefs of Staff? They are brilliant, able fighting men. They have not looked too good in the current controversy because some of them were dispatched as errand boys to support the President against MacArthur. MacArthur may be able to prove that actually the chiefs were in agreement with his own plans on winning a war and a peace.

RFC is being cleared up, but rascals who used it are not being cleared out.

* * * * *

Washington is confused and in conflict. National affairs are mingled in politics. Personalities sometimes are lifted above policy. Yet part of the confusion is due to the fact that a great fermentation is taking place. The scum eventually will be cleared. This still is a great and powerful country, making headway despite all the disturbance. The President has lost stature, but the presidency has not.

We will win through.

Congressman Roosevelt's Views on National Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS B. HELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from New York, the Honorable FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, JR., has delivered a most interesting report on national affairs to his constituents in the Twentieth Congressional District in New York City on Thursday evening, May 3, 1951, at a meeting of the Liberal Party at the Cameron Hotel. The following are excerpts from his address:

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen, I am grateful to the Liberal Party for calling this meeting and giving me the chance to submit to you this interim report on a few of the important questions which confront us.

Since two of the previous speakers have referred to the increase in the sales tax and the revelations of the Kefauver committee, I would like to make clear my position on these two issues at the outset.

First, the sales tax. I hesitated considerably before I wrote my letter to the deputy mayor, Mr. Charles Horowitz, who, you will remember, was my campaign manager in 1949, because I did not want to appear to be interfering in the problems of city government. However, because of the importance of this issue and because of my personal friendship for Mr. Horowitz, I felt that I could not sit idly by. As you know, I was then and I am now deeply opposed to this increase. * * *

The second issue is that of the Senate crime investigation. I recently urged that the three great civic, nonpartisan, nonpolitical foundations, Ford, Carnegie, and Rockefeller, all dedicated to the public welfare, appoint a citizens' committee to investigate the whole field of morality and ethics in the profession of public service, and then recommend a code of ethics for politics. We have such codes of ethics in the medical profession and in the legal profession. However, the only restraints on a public servant are his conscience and the criminal law. Unfortunately, it is apparent that the conscience of some public officials is below par. The establishment of a code of ethics and a commission to enforce it would do much to remedy this situation. * * * In this connection, there is an additional problem, that which involves those who hold office in political organizations, such as the party officials of the Republican, Democratic, Liberal, and other parties. I do not feel that any individual who, either socially or otherwise, is on a familiar basis with the crooks and the gamblers—those people who devote themselves to violating the law and helping others to violate the law—should hold a party office.

This country has never gone on such an emotional jag or enjoyed such complete confusion as it has in the last 2 or 3 weeks. It is probably a good thing. I would like to make clear at the outset that as one member of the United States Navy who served in the Pacific, I have nothing but the utmost admiration and respect for General MacArthur. He is a remarkable military genius. But, unfortunately, the old soldier who is fading away is being replaced by a resurgent politician. This subject requires calmness, objectivity, and courage, because whether we like it or not we are leaders of the free world today. We cannot shirk our responsibility, we must act as an intelligent and mature people. We cannot afford to reach our decisions out of emotion, prejudice, or hate. We must maintain our respect for our civilian leaders and we must give due weight to the recommendations of our military leaders.

I think there are two questions involved in the present problem. First, the right of the Commander in Chief of the United States, the President, to remove any military leader, and, second, the question of our far-eastern policy, keeping in mind its relation to our world policy. We should try to keep these two issues separate in our minds. We must not let any resentment for the way the President carried out his decision impair our judgment.

I have yet to meet a responsible official in Washington who disputes the right and the rightness of President Truman's removal of General MacArthur when it became apparent that the general could not and did not support the policies of the United States Government of which he is a servant. I need not remind you of the basic American doctrine—the superiority of the civilian authority over the military. * * *

The other problem, our far-eastern policy, is far more complex. There are three possible choices. The first is to do what Mr. TAFT and Mr. Hoover recommended last December and January. Pull out of and abandon Korea; don't send troops to Europe; and, as Mr. Hoover stated, set up a Gibraltar ring of island defenses—in short, let the rest of the world go to blazes. That is one choice, it is an extreme. The other extreme, or the second choice is now proposed by General MacArthur, which I would like to take up in detail. It is a rather confusing proposal because he has stated it in separate major documents in different degrees. In his address to the Congress, one of the great oratorical efforts in our history, he proposed a four-point program, a program set forth as a study by the Joint Chiefs of Staff:

1. Economic blockade of China.

2. Naval blockade of China, or, as the study report said, preparing for a naval blockade in case of certain eventualities.

3. Air reconnaissance of the coastal areas on China and Manchuria.

4. The logistic support for the effective use of the Nationalist troops on Formosa. (Logistic support means supplies. It does not mean air support or naval shore bombardment prior to making a landing.) Naval warfare is not logistic support.

The second phrase "effective use of the Nationalist troops on Formosa," is susceptible to many different interpretations. The effective use might mean the defense of Formosa, or hit-run raids. Or it might mean in the extreme a Normandy-type landing to create a second front in China.

However, in his letter to Mr. JOE MARTIN, the Republican leader in Congress, General MacArthur added two points: First, the bombing of the so-called Manchurian sanctuary of the enemy. In this connection, I might point out that the United Nations forces have been enjoying a similar sanctuary in Japan, and, furthermore, South Korea has not had air attacks from the enemy. But we have enjoyed complete air supremacy in attacking the enemy and his supply lines in North Korea. Certainly the Joint Chiefs of Staff have never agreed to these two additional recommendations by General MacArthur, two additional recommendations which he had made at the time of his removal.

This is a new kind of war in Korea. MacArthur was right when he said that there had never been in all history an alternative to victory in war, but I submit that perhaps civilization has gone one magnificent step forward toward achieving world peace and the settlement of international differences not by force but by law, when we say that our objective in this war imposed upon us by the aggression of first North Korea and then China, our objective is not victory over China, but our objective is to stop aggression in Korea, and to recreate the independence of that liberty-loving people.

We do not want to invade China. That would be no victory. We want only to stop aggression and restore law and order and peace in Korea. This is the first time in history that there has been a limited objective in war. Perhaps because of this world war III may not grow out of this Korean tragedy.

The second point that General MacArthur failed to mention before the Congress, which he did mention in his letter to Mr. MARTIN, was the creation of a second front on the mainland of China by using Nationalist troops from Formosa supported by our Air Force and Navy. Only recently, Chiang Kai-shek announced in Formosa that the Nationalist troops could not possibly undertake a landing unless they were completely re-equipped by the United States. I believe that out of the 450,000 troops on Formosa, there are only 100,000 combat troops and of these only 40,000 are adequately equipped. Suppose we do reequip the Nationalist troops and suppose they land in China, do we know they would be successful? We started in Korea only using our Air Force and Navy, but when the Korean troops were inadequate to stem the Communist tide, our foot soldiers had to go in. If Chiang Kai-shek's troops start to lose, will our Army then be called on to fight on the mainland of China?

It is very easy for General MacArthur to say that his program will mean a quick end and will save lives in Korea. But in ending the war in Korea, he may be very probably starting a much more difficult war in China. In fact, he may be committing American lives and resources to the morass of the Chinese mainland. Furthermore, he may be running the risk that Russia will invoke her treaty of friendship and alliance with Red China. And we may find world war III upon us before we know it. We may be falling into the very trap which many believe Russia has been setting for us. This program might be the first act of the suicide of the free world.

The third alternative to these two extremes is the middle course—to continue to repel aggression in Korea, to limit the war to Korea. This course is heartrending in many ways. It is difficult to see an end and it requires great patience. It is the course recommended by one of our greatest military geniuses, who also has a deep sense of public service and civilian authority—General Marshall. He was in large measure responsible for the strategy in World War II. He is respected and loved by all Americans. I am confident that the peace of the world can rest in no more capable hands.

It is difficult to predict the future, but I have so often been asked how our present policy in Korea will end that I hazard this guess. I doubt that the Communists will ever agree to a negotiated peace, but they cannot absorb the tremendous losses in men and equipment indefinitely. I think that in the months to come we will find that they will simply retire behind the Yalu River and that we will stop our advance considerably short of this natural boundary, and that the no-man's land between will be tactitly agreed upon by both sides as a sort of buffer zone. For a time, this zone may require policing by our Air Force to give warning of any possible new assault, but the actual land fighting will cease and the work of restoring Korea, her independence and her freedom, may be undertaken by the United Nations.

If my hope is right, we will have stopped aggression and I hope prevented world war III, we will have preserved the authority and prestige of the United Nations, we will have avoided being enmeshed on the mainland of China in support of Chiang Kai-shek and abandoned by practically all our other allies, and we will have maintained the united alliance of the free world.

Arizona Admits Speculators Would Make Millions of Dollars on Proposed Reclamation Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, on March 8, 1950, I addressed the House of Representatives to show how speculators and big landowners would make millions of dollars if the proposed central Arizona project were authorized by Congress. I was bitterly attacked by proponents of the project for my factual disclosures.

The accuracy and truthfulness of my charges have now been substantiated by supporters of the project from within the State of Arizona. On April 27, 1951, the newspaper Plain Talk, published in Phoenix, ran a forceful article under the headline: "Central Arizona project discredited by activities of land speculators."

The complete article follows:

CENTRAL ARIZONA PROJECT DISCREDITED BY ACTIVITIES OF LAND SPECULATORS

The shelving of the central Arizona project was a staggering blow to the economy of Arizona. The disaster, however, should be blamed as much upon the actions of certain citizens of our own State as upon the machinations of California.

As far back as March 8, 1950, NORRIS POULSON made a speech in the Federal House of Representatives which, in our opinion, destroyed congressional confidence in the worth of the project once and for all. It is true that POULSON is from California, but he did not invoke the requirements of that State's large population, its vast industrial needs, etc. Instead he exposed what amounts to a conspiracy on the part of opportunistic farmers and syndicates of Arizona. In effect these, all large landholders, would help themselves to the waters diverted by the central Arizona project, paying nothing for the moisture which would enable them to make fortunes, either from farming their lands, or through selling their acreage at a premium.

The project would permit farmers to have 160 acres serviced with surface irrigation, for which the landholders would pay an adequate fee. But neither the provisions of the project nor any other Federal law governs the use of underground water. As for the new State code, it affects only land bought since 1949, whereas the oversized farms in question were set up before that.

The water diverted from the Colorado River would be brought to the selected areas of Maricopa and Pinal Counties on the surface, but, to quote Representative POULSON, "enormous amounts of this water will flow into underground basins."

Realizing this, the farmers and syndicates in question established what is known as "excess ownership" holdings, often thousands of acres beyond the statutory limitation of 160. They accomplished that by sinking wells hundreds, and in some cases thousands, of feet deep. This was done, as POULSON points out, "in the face of dire warnings that there was no adequate water for such operations."

It was an expensive as well as ruthless gamble with State resources, but the stakes promised to be tremendous—if the central Arizona project could be pushed through before the great pumps started sucking sand. If it was approved, the speculators would have an unlimited supply of water, at a bargain. For while the farmers who complied with the terms of the project would pay high prices to have their 160 acres watered, the operators with the long pumps would have thousands of acres irrigated by water for which they would pay the project not one red cent.

At the time Representative POULSON made his congressional exposé, he was able to report that out of the estimated 628,000 acres in the area, which the Bureau of Land Reclamation reported as having some history of irrigation, 345,000, or 55 percent of the total acreage, were excess ownership holdings. This 55 percent was distributed among only 7 percent of the farms within the project area.

In short, the CAP—at least as far as the farming aspect of it is concerned—would call for the Government expenditure of $780,000,000, over half of whose benefits would go to the enrichening of a few hundred free riders. And these opportunists are already prosperous, or they could not afford the blue-chip ante demanded in this game. The skinny end of the drumstick would go to the thousands of small farmers who would be charged for what the project would offer.

In summing up his case, Representative POULSON said devastatingly: "I can see why the landholders of Arizona want this project, but I cannot conceive of Congress authorizing it." Under the circumstances, we can see no reason why Congress should have done so, either.

Arizona must have the equivalent of the project, but it must be revamped so that it is genuinely designed to benefit the people of the State as a whole, instead of being a grab bag for land speculators. It is preposterous to expect the 46 States not involved in the quarrel over the Colorado to award this State the water of that great river, together with $750,000,000 to implement its use, for the benefit of a few hundred of our already wealthy citizens.

The fact that the people of the State have allowed the central Arizona project to be shaped to satisfy the greed of speculators has given Arizona a stunning setback. It is useless to rage at California, even if its citizens are, not unnaturally, thinking of their own welfare rather than ours. The cold fact is that the project, as set up and presented to Congress, was made to order for indiscriminate speculation.

If we must rage at anybody, let us rage at the exploiters, Arizonians, not Californians, whose conduct went far toward giving our State this crippling loss. We say loss, for we believe that the central Arizona project, as it now stands is not merely set aside, but permanently scuttled.

Meanwhile let us go into a huddle and draw up a bill which will make hard sense to the 46 States whose sympathies for our genuine and critical needs we are trying to win. It must be such a bill, as the central Arizona project now is not, that its background and practical workings will bear the honest inspection of nonpartisan investigators.

Lest We Forget

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, so much happens in such a short space of time that it is easy to forget the headlines of only a few months ago. Great stress is laid by administration spokesmen on the damage done to Allied unity by General MacArthur's advocacy of his policy for terminating the Korean war. The Rochester (N. Y.) Times-Union has republished in an editorial the headline of last November 30 when the President announced to a startled world that the atom bomb would be used in the Far East if necessary to meet the military situation. The decision whether or not to use that ultimate weapon, he said, would be left to the American military leaders in the field, meaning at that time primarily General MacArthur. So far as is known, General MacArthur never advocated such a step. Certainly, whether or not one agrees with all of his recommendations, however, no proposal which he has advanced is calculated to cause consternation and dismay in foreign capitals equal to that occasioned by the President's pronouncement of last November 30.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the above-mentioned editorial, which follows:

Part of the story that shook our allies' confidence:

"UNITED STATES TO USE A-BOMB IF NEEDED, TRUMAN SAYS; SPURS ARMING

"WASHINGTON.—President Truman declared today the United Nations forces will not back down in Korea, and that the atom bomb will be used if necessary to meet the military situation.

"Mr. Truman's firm stand and mention of the most fearful weapon in the world's history came at a news conference.

"The President said that whether the bomb was used was up to American military leaders in the field, but that personally he hoped it would not have to be employed."

The above headline, reproduced from the Times-Union of November 30, bears on the testimony of Secretary Marshall before the Senate committees investigating the summary removal of General MacArthur and our Far East policy.

General Marshall testified:

"By his (General MacArthur's) public statements, he set up a very serious reaction among our allies, which threatened our collective action with them and which threatened our position in the world in relation to this great crisis and which threatened to leave us in the situation of going it alone."

This is the crux of the administration's defense of its humiliation of General MacArthur. Secretary Marshall admits that General MacArthur violated no military orders, but all through his testimony the theme recurs that General MacArthur was out of step with the 13 governments that have furnished one-twentieth of the United Nations forces in Korea.

Time and again General Marshall has expressed grave concern about the reactions of these governments to events in Korea. And time and again he has laid the blame for their hesitancy and distrust of our intentions as agents of the United Nations upon General MacArthur.

We are a forgetful people. But reprinting the headline of November 30 will recall to every reader an offhand statement by President Truman at a press conference that not only shocked the world but strained every tie binding our allies to the United Nations effort in Korea.

The statement was made just a few days after Red China had struck, opening a new war. Every chancellery had the jitters. Spokesmen for every government had to answer questions about Mr. Truman's intentions. Prime Minister Attlee of Great Britain rushed to Washington to find out just how far Mr. Truman intended to go. The reaction in this country was just as violent.

A White House statement 3 hours after the press conference attempted, but failed, to repair the damage. It cleared up the President's statement at the press conference that the use of the atomic bomb would be up to the American military leaders in the field, by quoting the law that only the President can authorize the use of the atomic bomb.

Obviously this ill-considered statement of the President on November 30 is not the only factor entering into our allies' reluctance to support decisive measures in Korea. The defection of India, the importance to Britain of Hong Kong, the fear of a European war, the reluctance by some to throw the book at Red China, all enter into it.

But on the point of causing uneasiness among our allies, everything General MacArthur said or wrote was minor compared to the effect of Mr. Truman's outburst of November 30.

Now if the point of recalling the November 30 press conference were merely to say "you're another" there would be no reason to do so. But it seems to us that it illustrates the point that defenders of the administration have become so engrossed in winning an argument that they have drifted into positions unbecoming to the leaders of a nation in time of peril.

Another instance was General Marshall's testimony of Monday. He said General MacArthur's invitation of March 20 to the Red Chinese commander to negotiate an armistice—a time-honored right of every field commander—had cost whatever chance there had been at that time to negotiate a settlement of the Korean conflict.

As James Reston points out in the New York Times, nobody in Washington believed at that time there was a good chance to make peace. President Truman had submitted to envoys of the allies the draft of a public appeal to the Chinese Reds for peace. But numerous such appeals had been made without result, and there was nothing to indicate that a different fate awaited this one.

Yet, General Marshall's testimony went out as implying that General MacArthur had upset a hopeful peace move.

The present hearings, it seems to us, can hardly settle finally the question of who is right in the MacArthur controversy. The events of the next 10 years will be more important evidence on that point. But meanwhile a sound policy in the Far East and sound conduct of that policy are of vital importance.

Let us look carefully to any line of questions in this inquiry that develop these.

The Miracle of the County Agent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. SMITH
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include the following article from the Delta Democrat-Times of Greenville, Miss.:

LOOKING AT THE SOUTH—THE MIRACLE OF THE COUNTY AGENT

(By Hodding Carter)

Wars and politics to the contrary, the destiny of man is decided by what he does with the land. We forgot that for a long time in the South, but we're remembering now.

The people most responsible for the vital change are at the same time among the most overlooked of all the civilian army of Government employees. That army gets a lot of kicking around. Whenever we get angry with our Government—Federal or State or local—we usually begin and end by damning the people on the public payrolls. The indictments are almost always too general and unfair, for in our anger we forget the notable work being done in a thousand directions by so-called bureaucrats. Reminded that this is so, we generally answer that we didn't mean those fellows but just the ones who don't do anything worth while.

That's a long preamble to a pat on the back for the county agents, and especially those who serve the Southern States. Still, it might be a good idea to remember that bureaucracy does include thousands and thousands of devoted men and women, whose sum total of effort means a better life and a more enduring civilization.

But to get back to the county agents. Now in the fullness of spring is the best time to come face to face with their miracle. All any of us have to do, if our memories go back 20 years and even less, is to get in an automobile and drive along the highways and country roads anywhere in the South and compare the present with the past. The trail from yesterday begins with one crop that grew on abused and tired land; today, it is lined with many products of the earth, and the earth itself begins to be strong again.

Driving along that trail, which extends everywhere in the South, the transformation may appear to have been easily accomplished. Yet, on every farm which bears witness to good farming practices has fallen the shadow of a patient, sweating county agent, persevering in his task of bringing southern farmers to their senses and southern farms to life again. Any veteran county agent can tell you of the earlier difficulties; for there was a time, not long past, when the farmers who knew everything except how to make a living would laugh at and deride the young agents and their high-falutin' college notions. They don't laugh now.

The transition from suspicion to full acceptance of the county agent is not yet complete. There are still not enough of them to go around; not enough funds available for them to do all they know to do and want to do; not enough public acceptance of the basic fact that man rises and falls with the land and the way he works it. Many thousands of farms in the South cry out for the county agent's shadow. For some he will come too late; but not for as many as we may fear, for the good earth is durable and can be reclaimed even from the desert.

Today, in the South, we have halted the destructive march toward barrenness; and the men who are responsible are a bunch of fellows on the public payroll. It isn't a bad idea to stop cussing all public job holders for a little bit and say thanks to at least some of them.

Security Is Everybody's Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, on several occasions, I have called attention to the importance of maintaining the complete security of our codes and ciphers. These methods of secret communication are vital to the safety of our Armed Forces and our Nation. No traitorous act could have graver consequences for us all than the delivery to our enemies of the keys to our secret codes and ciphers. This fact places a responsibility upon those who are permitted to see and study classified documents. While it is necessary and proper for the Members of Congress to see classified documents in order to be fully informed, it is also necessary that members, as well as other persons permitted to use such documents, be responsible for seeing that they do nothing likely to reveal the contents of such documents to our enemies.

It seems to me that we are witnessing too much laxity in this regard. In addition to discussing our most confidential military matters in public, we are also failing to insist upon absolute adherence by all persons to the rules intended to maintain the security of classified documents. The Associated Press has discussed this subject in a news story which appeared in the New York Times on May 13. I should like to include it in our RECORD for the benefit of Members who may not have seen it:

HEARINGS INVOLVE SECRET CODES; "CRACKING" A MAJOR PERIL IN WAR—MILITARY CONCERNED LEST OUR CRYPTOGRAPHIC DATA, APPEARING IN PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, MIGHT TIP OFF ENEMY SPIES

WASHINGTON, May 12.—The Senate committee hearings on the MacArthur case have produced bare references to one of the most carefully guarded secrets of the military—its system of cryptography.

In war, or even in peace, cracking the code of another nation can have value equal to the destruction of enemy armies or fleets. Because the United States learned Japan's communications code, it was ready when the Japanese fleet made the costly and unsuccessful strike at Midway Island in World War II.

The term "cryptography" really covers both the use of the code and of cipher transmission machines. Thus, a secret message can be transmitted by a machine that transmits symbols or groups of symbols that are (as the military says) "de-cryptographed" mechanically upon reception of the message.

Or cryptography may be merely the old but still useful system of using letters or groups of letters that have no meaning until a key converts the message into plain language.

Of particular concern to those charged with maintaining the security of crytography systems is the chance that a message sent by cipher may appear, by accident, at a later date in a public document. This would be useful material for an espionage agent who, having picked up from radio or other sources a copy of the coded message, could compare it with the plain-language text and thus crack the code.

Cryptographic messages sent in symbol could be as simple as the gadget used to run a player piano or could be much more intricate—which they are.

The military places the tightest protection not only over the machines and codes but over copies of messages that have been transmitted cryptographically. Regulations require that cryptographic material must be kept "in the most secure storage available and will never be left unattended except when locked in a three-combination safe or its equivalent," decoded cryptographic messages may not even be kept in the same safes with the code used to decipher them.

To prevent code-cracking, material sent cryptographically is paraphrased before being released for use by others than those to whom the messages are directed.

Regulations specify that "routine reports and messages which must be given wide distribution, or the contents of which have been or may eventually be furnished the press" should be transmitted whenever possible in plain language, but that if code transmission is required the text should be paraphrased before being distributed.

Precise instructions for paraphrasing also are set down. The sequences of paragraphs and of sentences in paragraphs must be changed; positions of subject, predicate, and modifiers must be altered; synonyms should be used.

The St. Lawrence Seaway Would Be an Easy Target for Attack

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the Buffalo (N. Y.) News in an editorial in the issue of April 14, 1951, reveals the vulnerability of the proposed St. Lawrence seaway to an attack by an enemy. The editorial follows:

SEAWAY WOULD BE VULNERABLE

As the hearing of those who are opposed to the St. Lawrence seaway project progresses before the House Public Works Committee the arguments of the proponents of it, previously heard, begin to sound rather hollow. Far from being an element of defensive strength, as spokesmen for the Truman administration have insisted, opponents make a strong case for an opposite conclusion.

Capt. Willis W. Bradley, United States Navy, retired, former Governor of Guam, gave it as his opinions at the committee hearing that the Great Lakes area had become one of the frontiers most exposed to attack and that a lock canal could not be made resistant either to atomic bombs or to modern conventional weapons. He went on to say that enemy attack can and likely would seriously damage the proposed waterway and thus block ship transit for an undetermined time. Thus it would be foolhardy, in his view, to place dependence for an ore supply in time of war on so vulnerable a means of transportation. Incidentally, Captain Bradley stated that such overseas trade as the 27-foot channel might develop would likely be 100 percent in foreign ships.

As a defense route, the seaway obviously would have to be kept in a state of constant military defense. During the war German submarines were reported in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Russia has many submarines, from which aircraft might be launched for an attack on the locks of the waterway. Thus there would be need of naval forces to protect shipping in the Gulf and the channels approaching the Great Lakes and air forces to turn attacks from the vital locks. The opinion of Captain Bradley seems to be that some of the enemy aircraft would certainly get through to this target. In which case there would be no seaway.

The Truman administration has emphasized that iron ore from Labrador is absolutely essential for full-scale operation of the steel mills on the Great Lakes for national defense. But Big Steel (Bethlehem and U. S. Steel) has shown no interest whatever in ore supplies from that source, despite the fact that it is vastly expanding the facilities of its Great Lakes plants. Chairman Eugene C. Grace, of the Bethlehem Steel Corp., told stockholders at the annual meeting last Tuesday in Wilmington, Del., that he did "not think the St. Lawrence seaway is essential to bring Labrador ore to the United States." Moreover, he said that the corporation was developing a process to produce iron from low-grade taconite ore, of which there are billions of tons in and about the Mesabi Range. He indicated that within a year or two Bethlehem would have a practical production from taconite.

Who will believe that practical steel men such as Mr. Grace, who are responsible for private investments of billions of dollars, cannot calculate better than Mr. Truman's Cabinet members what is to the best advantage of their industries? In a business rating who would place the Cabinet members on a par with them? They say that there is no need for a seaway to bring in ore from the Labrador wilderness for their mills, and they ought to know. In the circumstances, it does not make sense to spend perhaps a billion dollars or more for a seaway, one that would become a military zone inviting enemy attacks.

Air Power the Dominant Force in Modern War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEROY JOHNSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, it is not often that a Member of the House has the opportunity to read a literary production by a fellow Member, or—in the case of the article to which I am about to refer—by fellow Members. Indeed, it is not often that Members of Congress, in the pressure of the work at hand, find time to produce a stirring article for a popular magazine. I might add, with some envy, that not all of us are as gifted as the Honorable W. J. BRYAN DORN, of South Carolina, and the Honorable O. K. ARMSTRONG, of Missouri, who have contributed a timely article on the great lessons of Korea to the May issue of Air Force magazine.

There are a number of other things about the publication of this stirring article that seem to me significant. In the first place, the material for it was gathered by the authors on a trip made during the Easter recess, the expenses for which were borne by the authors and Air Force magazine. It was written in the flush of excitement produced by what they saw on their trip. It is not an official report on an official investigation. It is a personal tribute by two enthusiasic close observers of modern warfare to the power that is the dominant force in Korea, and that is ready for use against aggression elsewhere in the world or for war against Russia.

My colleagues went to Japan and Tokyo, talked with generals, pilots, privates, correspondents, and statesmen. In this article they have listed lessons they had learned as the result of their investigation which may be summarized briefly as follows:

First. This is an unreal war.

Second. Airpower has become the predominant destructive force against ground troops in the field.

Third. Airpower must be the keystone in the military defense structure of the free world.

In spite of the fact that their study of the situation in Korea led to their placing this emphasis on air power, their view is not a prejudiced one. They write that they believe—

Air power must be raised in the national mind above the confusions of interservice strife, above the shackles of an unrealistic and outmoded balanced force concept, and certainly above partisan politics. * * * Our admiration for the job being done by the Army, Marines, and Navy in Korea, and wherever else they may be, is as strong as the next man's. We believe firmly that all three services have a vital role in combating aggression. But we cannot, in all honesty, fail to recognize that air power is the dominant force in modern war.

Their soundly argued conclusion is, therefore, that Congress must assert itself, and raise air power to the position it deserves in our military and diplomatic structure. In short, we must recognize once and for all that air power has revolutionized our old traditional military and diplomatic concepts and is our defensive keystone.

Mr. Speaker, the report of my colleagues is so good, so packed with facts, so strengthened by cogent reasoning, that I shall take no more time to comment on it. Instead, I ask unanimous consent to insert both the report and the informative editor's note which precedes it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The report by Representative W. J. BRYAN DORN, Democrat, of South Carolina, and Representative O. K. ARMSTRONG, Republican, of Missouri, from the May 1951 issue of the Air Force Magazine is as follows:

THE GREAT LESSONS OF KOREA

(EDITOR'S NOTE: Shortly after the March issue of Air Force appeared with its special report on the air-ground operation in Korea the editor received calls from Congressmen W. J. BRYAN DORN (Democrat, South Carolina) and O. K. ARMSTRONG (Republican, Missouri).)

Independently each Congressman explained that the March issue of Air Force had, for the first time, cut through the confusion and doubt which prevailed on Capitol Hill regarding the role of air power in the Korean conflict.

The magazine report had already provoked unprecedented interest, but to Congressmen DORN and ARMSTRONG it called for more than interest. It called for action. First of all, each argued, it was high time that elected representatives of the people go to the Far East and see the facts for themselves, and then report to the American public.

The idea appealed to the editor, who wishes every Congressman could get closer to the facts of combat air power, and it was consistent with AFA's interest in better government. Further, it suggested an article for Air Force, prepared jointly by these two Congressmen. Let them form a private, bipartisan committee to search out the lessons of the Korean war which might be applicable to Western Europe and other potential trouble spots, and report the facts as they found them.

The Congressmen at their first meeting offered to forsake their Easter-recess trips back home, and further, to split with AFA the $1,500 per passenger round-trip airline fare to Tokyo.

Congressmen DORN and ARMSTRONG made a good team. They are of different political faiths and from different parts of the country. DORN is young, aggressive, and gregarious, an orator in the pattern of William Jennings Bryan, for whom he was named. ARMSTRONG is older and more reserved, a former university professor, an accomplished author and lecturer, and bylined staff writer for the Reader's Digest. DORN had been a member of an infantry outfit in the National Guard, and in World War II had served 19 months as a corporal with the Ninth Air Force in Europe through five major campaigns. ARMSTRONG, an Air Corps captain in World War I, did welfare work in France after that conflict, and had served the American Legion as a member of its foreign relations committee and at the FIDAC congress in Paris in 1937.

The two Congressmen left Washington aboard a Northwest Airlines plane on March 24. Representative DORN returned April 9 and Representative ARMSTRONG, who also visited Okinawa and Formosa, arrived April 16. Their intensive survey of the Far East had included an hour and a half conference with General MacArthur and an interview with General Ridgway. They had appeared before a committee of the Japanese Diet, visited with American Ambassador John J. Muccio and President Syngman Rhee of the Republic of Korea, and had interviewed scores of officers and GI's of all services from Tokyo to the front lines north of Seoul, including Lt. Gen. Edward M. Almond, commanding the Tenth Corps, United States Army; Lt. Gen. George E. Stratemeyer, commanding the Far East Air Forces; Rear Adm. George R. Henderson, commanding Fleet Air Japan; Lt. Gen. Frank W. Milburn, commanding the First Corps, United States Army; Maj. Gen. Oliver P. Smith, commanding the First Marine Division, and Lt. Gen. Earle E. Partridge, commanding the Fifth Air Force. Congressman ARMSTRONG also interviewed Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and Maj. Gen. Claire Chennault (retired) on Formosa.

Arriving in Washington in the wake of General MacArthur's ouster as supreme commander, the Congressmen were immediately besieged with requests for public appearances. For several days their comments were news, on front pages and on radio and television programs, where they expressed their personal views independent of their Air Force assignment.

We are proud to present the joint report of Congressmen DORN and ARMSTRONG on the lessons of Korea.

REPORT BY REPRESENTATIVES DORN AND ARMSTRONG

From the moment our airliner touched its wheels to the long runway at Haneda Air Force Base near Tokyo and throughout our tour of the Far East, we were both impressed and startled by certain unrealities of the war in Korea.

The war was very real as we stood at the front line north of Seoul and observed the engagement between our doughboys and enemy troops just across the river. The fresh, gaping holes in the B-29 we examined at an emergency landing strip were real enough, and so were the reports of the F-86 pilots we interviewed at Suwon after their return from fighting MIG's over the Yalu River. To the men doing the fighting and dying in Korea, the war is very real indeed.

And yet our mission for Air Force magazine was to search out the lessons of Korea, lessons which might be applied to periphery wars of the future, or war against Russia.

On this basis alone, the first great lesson to be learned from Korea is that this is an unreal war.

In Japan, nerve center of the entire war effort, we were only 350 miles from enemy air bases on the mainland, near enough for our fighter planes, earlier in the war, to conduct combat operations from the islands, as our bombers still do. Despite its vulnerability to air attack, Tokyo reminded us of Washington. Here there was freedom of movement and communications. There were no air alerts or defense drills. Security restructions were temperate. It was hard to believe we were within fighter range of an active enemy.

In Korea the U. N. supply convoys moved freely in broad daylight right up to the front, bumper to bumper on the main roads. Here our combat cargo planes shuttled back and forth between rear areas and the front on precise schedules rivaling those of our domestic airlines. At Kangnung airstrip on the east coast we watched the little T-6 Mosquito planes take off and land on their fire direction missions quite oblivious to any possible danger and quite reminiscent of our hometown private pilots on a fair weather weekend at the local airport. We ourselves participated in the unreality of it all as we calmly observed the battle areas north of Seoul from the vantage point of one of the Army's little unarmed L-5's, and again, even more calmly, as passengers in an unarmed C-47 which circled lazily over a battle zone so we could watch our fighters strafe and napalm enemy troop positions directly below. It was as if we were seated in the second deck of a ball park looking down on a play at third base.

These were luxuries that had come with command of the air, and command of the air had come in the early days of the Korean war. Freedom of movement was taken for granted in Korea. In all-out war with Russia, or even in another perimeter war, this freedom would be lacking because air superiority would be lacking, as General Spaatz has pointed out so forcefully in this magazine—The Airpower Odds Against the Free World, April Air Force.

From the standpoint of both air and surface forces, command of the air is the key to full understanding of the war in Korea. Without it the Inchon landing could not have been attempted. Without it our Navy could not operate freely off the shores of the peninsula. Without it our B-29 strategic bombers could not be employed in direct support of the troops. Without it, these troops could not obtain what General MacArthur called "The greatest air support any ground forces have ever received in any war in history." And without this air support, we heard from one ground man after another, the U. N. forces could not have remained in Korea.

Thus, we early came to the obvious conclusion that the U. N. effort in Korea was dependent primarily on an unreal situation—unreal, that is, in terms of all-out war because it would not prevail in all-out war. This, we determined, was a lesson the American people must learn to understand in all its ramifications, lest they falsely project the Korean experience to other areas of the world, lest they take air superiority for granted and forget that in any war with Russia air superiority would have to be fought for and won before our surface forces could move effectively and safely.

In our repeated inquiry into the lessons of Korea that might apply to all-out war, we were confronted repeatedly with the lessons that have not and cannot be learned in Korea.

This experience brought to mind the criticism that was heaped on Maj. Gen. Emmett (Rosy) O'Donnell, former chief of the bomber command in the Far East, for his reported statement a few months ago to the effect that Korea had provided no real lessons in strategic air warfare. The unfavorable reactions to his remarks seemed, in retrospect, to illustrate the misinformed and misguided thinking which has prevailed in the country regarding the war in Korea and especially its airpower aspects.

For example, the so-called controversy over the jet fighter versus the propeller-driven fighter for ground support operations becomes no controversy at all under the light of full investigation. We spoke with Air Force and Navy pilots who must live or die with the subject, and found the jet fighter the established favorite for all types of tactical combat work. In fact, our ground troops have enjoyed their immunity from enemy air attack to a great degree because of the unique capabilities of our jet planes. As Lt. Gen. George E. Stratemeyer, commanding general of the Far East air forces, explained, "Had we been shackled with obsolete, single-purpose, piston-driven airplanes, the air superiority we now enjoy might never have been achieved."

Nor did we find evidence to support the much-publicized controversy over the effectiveness of Marine versus Air Force support of our ground troops. If such a controversy did exist in the early stages of the campaign, as reported, it has vanished with time and experience. The military team in Korea is a unified team. At the Joint Operations Centers, heart of the air-ground activity, representatives of all the four services work side by side in harmony. Marine land-based aviation has, since the start of the war, been under the directional control of this Joint Operations Center system, which handles all close support aviation coordination in Korea. From a C-47 over the bomb line near the east coast of the peninsula we watched Air Force T-6 Mosquito planes lead and direct Marine Corsairs to their targets in a mountain valley just below us. Those who continue to stir up this fallacious Marine-Air Force controversy are sabotaging the service unity that is working in Korea.

Looking back, it seems incredible that so many of our citizens were led so far off the track in interpreting the role of airpower in Korea. The misconceptions regarding this effort surely have been instrumental in preventing a realistic approach of our mobilization effort. It was not until publication of the special report, the Air-Ground Operation in Korea, in the March issue of Air Force magazine that our legislators and the public could properly appraise airpower in this war. The statements attributed to Gen. Rosy O'Donnell, untimely as they may have been, are even more understandable now that we have been to Korea and have witnessed for ourselves the conditions under which our men are fighting in the Far East.

It was General O'Donnell, we believe, who first called public attention to the diplomatic barriers to our military effort in Korea, barriers which illustrate further unrealities in this war. Without consideration of the diplomatic issues involved, it must be reported that the prohibition against our bombing beyond the Yalu River has placed our military leaders in Korea—as it did General O'Donnell—in an impossible tactical position.

On missions against the international bridges that cross the Yalu—their bomb runs by necessity paralleling the river line along the Korean shore—our B-29's are like ducks in a shooting gallery, running along a fixed track with the rifles—the enemy's jets and anti-aircraft guns—trained on them. In full view below are the Red airports from which these jets stage their attacks on the bombers. We watched the B-29's limp home in the soup one evening, and we talked to the crews. We heard them relate with understandable bitterness how they watched the Red jets take off from their Manchurian bases, attack the bombers, and then, after expending their ammunition and fuel, return to base, refuel and rearm, and climb up to repeat their attacks. We heard F-86 pilots who escort the B-29's tell how they must give up the chase against the MIGs when they spot the Yalu River barrier below. From an operational point of view alone, it is both a unique and a disgusting situation.

Our inquiry into the B-29 operation revealed further why the Air Force could hardly be expected to learn lessons about strategic air power in Korea. At the start of the war there were only 18 targets in North Korea that could be classified as strategic—targets such as the Chinnampo chemical and metal plant, the Chosen Nitrogen Explosives Co., at Haeju, the Wonsan oil refinery—and all 18 of these targets were neutralized through B-29 attacks by September 15, 1950, less than 3 months after the beginning of the war. They were neutralized with sporadic attacks sandwiched in while the B-29's were employed predominantly in a tactical role. When General O'Donnell was asked if he had learned anything about strategic bombing in Korea, he could hardly have replied except as he did, in the negative.

On the other hand, the Air Force has learned something about tactical employment of B-29's, primarily because these bombers have never before been in a position to be so employed. The Air Force has learned, for example, that the big bombers can destroy targets no larger than railroad bridges and moving trains. To do this, of course, the bombers must come down to an altitude which makes them, from an operational standpoint, unjustifiably vulnerable to ground attack and fighter opposition. This forbids accurate evaluation of their vulnerability, or lack of it, as strategic bombers.

Another unreal aspect of the war concerns both our air and ground units. The ground troops are by now seasoned fighting men, experienced by the hard knocks of battle, experienced in all phases of ground warfare—except one. They have had no opportunity to gain experience in dealing with hostile airpower. Few of them, from commanders on down, have ever seen unfriendly aircraft overhead in Korea. As a result, camouflage, dispersal, communications security and other antiairpower measures are lacking, simply because there is no need for them. The same situation prevails with our air units. In addition, the Air Force is able to devote such a large segment of its air capability to ground support operations that it is gaining little or no experience about air defense against modern fighters.

The war in Korea is unreal for another reason. To the average newspaper reader, for example, its progress is measured by the amount of terrain won or lost by the U. N. forces. The public can hardly be blamed for using this yardstick, inasmuch as it is the official U. N. yardstick. The stated U. N. objective in the war is to join North and South Korea by force of arms as a prelude to establishment of a unified Korea. This objective places the emphasis on gaining real estate, whereas, from time immemorial, the mission of every military commander is to destroy the enemy's military machine. This military mission prevails in Korea.

General Ridgway's Operation Killer was aptly named. Militarily, the objective is to destroy enemy troops and weapons, with the gaining of real estate only a means to that end. Politically, or diplomatically, it is the end in itself. Thus, in Korea a strategic withdrawal, with heavy destruction of enemy troops accompanying it, is temporarily at least a military gain and a political set-back. The Christmas advance to the Yalu, on the other hand, was a political gain and a military set-back.

In evaluating the success of the military mission, it is necessary to understand the nature of the enemy we are facing. Red China's casualties in the war are estimated in the hundreds of thousands. Everywhere we heard that her hospitals are terribly pressed. No one would venture a guess as to how heavy their war losses must be before Red China's leaders conclude that Korea is not worth the sacrifice. It is generally assumed that her casualties are already greater than a democracy such as ours could tolerate, and quite possibly greater than Russia's leaders would permit. It is true that Russia's casualties at Stalingrad were enormous, but it is also true that losses incurred in defending one's homeland are quite different than losses incurred on foreign soil. With Russia pulling the strings of war without suffering the losses of war, the enemy's casualty rate is perhaps higher than could be expected elsewhere.

However, with Operation Killer the military order of the day in Korea, the weapon accountable for most of the killing must, of necessity, take on special significance. In Korea, the airplane is this weapon. The scope of its destructive power against ground troops, given little consideration in the past, is so great that we must conclude:

The second great lesson to be learned from Korea is that airpower has become the predominant destructive force against ground troops in the field.

The Air Force, repeatedly under fire since World War II for its damage claims, has vastly underestimated the number of casualties it has inflicted on enemy troops in Korea.

GHQ estimates, based on prisoner-of-war interrogation and preliminary field reports, have credited our air power with 47 percent of all enemy casualties in the Korean war—an unusually high figure, based on past war experience. We believe, however, that further evidence will reveal that this figure must be revised upward.

Field reports from Army sources, we learned, now indicate that air attack probably has been responsible for more, and perhaps twice as many, enemy casualties in Korea as ground attack. Whatever the final estimate might be after all the evidence is in, there is no question but that—once air superiority has been attained—air power becomes a far greater destroyer of troops in the field than is ground power.

This new development in warfare is full of meaning.

As long as air superiority is on our side, as long as we have command of the air over our troops, we can exploit this great destructive power so forcefully demonstrated in Korea. Under these circumstances, air power becomes the only hope of offsetting the enemy's overwhelming weight of numbers and his willingness to accept abnormally high casualties.

In Korea it was the prevailing opinion that air power—through ground support—had made it possible for U. N. forces to hold the peninsula. General MacArthur called the air-power effort monumental, and he added, "air power has saved our Army in Korea on numerous occasions." Lt. Gen. Frank W. Milburn, commanding the First Corps, United States Army, told us, "We couldn't have carried on the Korean operation without air power." Lt. Gen. Edward M. Almond, commanding the Tenth Corps, United States Army, added, "The Air Force has done a splendid job in carrying out its air-support mission. The air-ground team is working most effectively." This was the tenor of comment from ground men all down the line.

But now the airplane emerges, not only as a superior support weapon to assist our ground troops in killing the enemy but, in itself, and by a wide margin, the U. N.'s most productive troop killer. This is a new role for air power.

However, we must be bluntly realistic about the air weapon in relation to our current air-power position. We must consider the second lesson of Korea in reverse.

We know from World War II experience that Russia is a past master in attack aviation. We have the report of Gen. Carl Spaatz, first chief of staff of the Air Force (April Air Force) that Russia is assured command of the air over Europe and Asia for several years ahead, at least; that in Western Europe she holds a 10 to 1 advantage in modern planes and will hold at least a 5 to 1 margin over the free world at the end of 1952.

In the face of these alarming facts, we must consider, first, that Russian air power possesses equal if not greater destructive force against ground troops as the force we have revealed with our own air power in Korea; second, that this destructive force is dependent upon sufficient air superiority to insure command of the air; third, that Russia has this command of the air and there is no evidence she cannot maintain it; and fourth, that under this set of circumstances we must be prepared to accept, in any war with Russia and perhaps in a lesser war, the casualty rates which modern war imposes upon an Army that does not have adequate air protection—the type of intolerable casualty rates which Red China has suffered in Korea.

All this compels us to recognize once and for all that air power has revolutionized our traditional military and diplomatic concepts, and prompts the conclusion that:

The third great lesson to be learned from Korea is that air power must be the keystone in the military defense structure of the free world.

Our policy makers are strangely inconsistent in their evaluation of air power as an instrument of national and international policy. Shortly before our departure for the Far East we attended a conference at which State Department leaders acknowledged, in the course of their comments on the world situation, that our long-range air power provided the only major deterrent to all-out Russian aggression. These same leaders, however, revealed a lack of appreciation for the necessity of overwhelming air power for the protection of our troops in Western Europe. If our diplomats are truly interested in deterrents, as they must be, they couldn't find a better one than the U. N.'s command of the air over Western Europe.

On the other hand, we suspect that our policy makers are more dependent upon air power than they themselves realize. Their dependency on the deterrent effect of our strategic air power, and its resultant effect on national policy, is too obvious to discuss here. We refer to the official policy which confines our forces to Korea, as against the alternative of carrying the fight to the Reds with aerial bombardment of their Manchurian bases. This official policy of containment obviously centers in the hope that we can kill sufficient Communists in Korea to force Red China to give up the struggle and settle on "honorable terms." General Bradley said as much in an address in Chicago on April 17. "Our present objective in Korea," he explained, "is to stop the Communists—to kill as many as we can at the least possible cost to ourselves."

That objective is clear enough. The problem is, it is not being supported, at least not in terms of emphasis in our mobilization effort. As we have pointed out, the airplane is—by a wide margin—our best destroyer of Communists in Korea. Thus, air power is—though not recognized as such—the backbone of our official strategy, as defined by General Bradley. Our policy makers, under their own terms, must depend on it as much or more than those who would send our bombers across the Yalu. Therefore, to support their own strategy—since the airplane can destroy enemy troops in other parts of the world as well as in Korea—one would expect an adequate build-up in air-power development. Surely, an all-powerful United States Air Force should be in the making.

Yet, General Spaatz reports that under prevailing policy an Air Force of only 50 modern groups is actually being produced, and that we have slowed down on our whole air-power build-up. This seems not only inconsistent but a direct invitation to disaster.

Whether you take the stand that the calculated risk involved in bombing Manchuria is too great, or that we must take that risk now as the lesser of two evils; whether aggression, or will hasten it; whether you consider the British Isles a dependable military base, or an expendable atomic target; whether you feel we must stop Russia short of North America, or make our own continent a huge air and sea base for the world—no matter which side you're on in the so-called great debate, the determining factor in your argument must be, it seems clear, the air-power capability of the free world compared to that of Russia.

In view of this, we believe air power must be raised in the national mind above the confusions of interservice strife, above the shackles of an unrealistic and outmoded balanced force concept, and certainly above partisan politics. We must forget the service feuds of the past that still plague us to the point that when the capabilities of air power are cited it is charged that one believes air power can win a war alone; when it is argued that the Air Force must be, in keeping with its responsibilities and destructive power, the major service in our Military Establishment, it is charged that this is disparaging to the other two services. The war in Korea—once it is viewed at close range—dispels all such shallow considerations. The doughboy is delighted that airpower is capable of such destructive force; he just wants to get the job done, he doesn't care how, and get back home. Our admiration for the job being done by the Army, Marines, and Navy, in Korea and wherever else they may be, is as strong as the next man's. We believe firmly that all three services have a vital role in combating aggression. But we cannot, in all honesty, fail to recognize that air power is the dominant force in modern war.

Official thinking in this country is seemingly unaware of the military and diplomatic revolution that is taking place as a result of air power development. In the national interest, we urge that the Air Force Association continue and intensify its aggressive policy of bringing the story of this development to the people. We will urge that the Congress assert itself and raise airpower to the position it deserves in our military and diplomatic structure.

If the war in Korea does not force a departure from the surface thinking that permeates our present military strategy, if it does not lead to full realization that air power is the determining military factor in our foreign policy, if it does not hasten the establishment of a sound air power policy for all the free nations, then much of our military effort in Korea will be in vain, and as a nation we will be judged guilty of gross negligence before the facts of modern war and modern diplomacy.

Exchange of Students

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. SMITH

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include the following article from the New York Times of April 15, 1951:

GREATER EXCHANGE OF STUDENTS URGED—ADVISORY COMMISSION'S REPORT TO CONGRESS STRESSES SOVIET METHODS OF INDOCTRINATION

WASHINGTON, April 14.—An expanded State Department educational exchange program to combat Russia's spreading Communist culture was urged in a report to Congress today by the United States Advisory Commission on Educational Exchange.

Particular stress was laid on Russia's cultural imperialism in North Korea as a prelude to aggression under an economic and cultural agreement made by Russia and her satellite on March 17, 1949. This was cited as an example of what this country should resist through programs tailor-made for the countries in which they are to be used.

Meanwhile President Truman appointed Dr. Margaret Clapp, president of Wellesley College, and Dr. James W. Edgar, State Superintendent of Public Instruction of Texas, as members of the Board of Foreign Scholarships that operates the Federal student exchange program. They will serve for 3 years.

More extensive exchange of students, Government officials, labor groups, and youth and professional leaders in all fields was urged with the aim of attaining these three objectives:

"1. To keep alive the spirit of cooperation among the free nations of the world for the purpose of self-protection and progress for all.

"2. To strengthen resistance to communism in countries immediately threatened with infiltration or aggression.

"3. To weaken the forces of communism and diminish its power in areas now under the domination of the U. S. S. R."

"The Commission wishes to make it clear that we do not believe the program has attained its maturity either in scope or definition," said the report.

Signed by the chairman, Dr. Harvie Branscomb, chancelor of Vanderbilt University, and his associates, it added:

"The process of adjusting it to the tasks imposed by the Communist challenge will be a continuous one.

"To illustrate, we feel that the reexamination of the content of the presentation made to other peoples, as contrasted with the objectives sought has only just begun. Part of the approach used at one time—the emphasis upon the strength and industrial wealth of the United States, for example—ran grave risks of creating envy and resentment, rather than attitudes of cooperation and friendship."

The commission, however, complimented Edward W. Barrett, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, for giving the program "vigorous and forward-looking leadership."

It is expected that grants for the exchange of persons will exceed 6,500 in 1951, the report said. This Government program is relatively small compared to exchanges made under private auspices, it added. By way of contrast, it reported that 30,000 foreign students were now studying at a thousand American campuses.

In discussing the North Korea infiltration, the commission said the United States program as first conceived had not considered "intensive campaigns for the conversion of whole peoples to the Communist point of view."

"The facts in this instance are so significant that they should be cited specifically," the report continued. "In 1945, some 3,700 North Koreans were enrolled in one or another of the Soviet-oriented cultural societies in that area. By 1949, this number had been increased to over 1,300,000. During the 3-year period prior to 1948, some 770,000 copies of 72 Russians books were published in North Korea. In 1949, some 500 books were translated and large numbers of copies distributed.

"Numerous classes in the Russian language were organized. Almost 70,000 lectures and concerts were given in North Korea by Soviet artists, writers, and other cultural representatives in 1948, and an even greater number were given in 1949.

"In the course of the 5-year period preceding hostilities, hundreds of intellectual, industrial, and political leaders from North Korea were taken to Moscow for indoctrination. This provides a vivid illustration of the Soviet program to misguide and seduce a whole population for violent ends."

Among the books published in 1949, were a total of 537,000 copies of the "History of the Communist Party (Bolshevik)" and Stalin's "Collected Works."

MacArthur's Strategy: Pros and Cons Weighed—Issues Raised at the Senate Hearing and Analysis of Points in Dispute

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, the New York Times on Sunday, May 13, carried the following excellent analysis of the MacArthur controversy by its famous authority on military matters, Hanson W. Baldwin:

MACARTHUR'S STRATEGY: PROS AND CONS WEIGHED—ISSUES RAISED AT THE SENATE HEARING AND ANALYSIS OF POINTS IN DISPUTE

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

Victory through attrition or victory through attack—these were the basic alternatives presented last week to the Senate committees studying the issues presented by the dismissal of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur.

Although General MacArthur and Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall have been, so far, the only witnesses, the battle lines already have been clearly drawn, and the issues considerably, though by no means completely, illuminated.

The Republicans, critical of the policies we have followed in Korea and the Orient, would probably say with Pyrrhus: "One more such victory and we are undone." And the Democrats, supporting the limitation of the conflict in hopes of ultimate gains, would probably agree with Polybius: "It is no doubt a good thing to conquer on the field of battle, but it needs greater wisdom and greater skill to make use of victory."

The strategy for victory in Korea and the Orient and its relationship to world strategy was the major problem that formed the background of the great debate. How to achieve that victory with the least cost to the United States and how to accomplish the political aims of the containment of communism on a world-wide basis was the subject around which all the questions in the Senate committees' caucus room sooner or later revolved.

General MacArthur stressed again and again that American blood was being shed in Korea, and advocated a course of action somewhat similar to the strategy he followed in the brilliant Inchon operation and later in the ill-fated victory offensive toward the Yalu—a course of great risk in the hope of great gain—and a limited extension of the war in the Orient beyond Korea to force Communist China to abandon the Korean campaign.

Strategy of attrition

General Marshall stressed again and again that it was the opinion of the Pentagon that the course advocated by General MacArthur might cause the loss of more, rather than of less, American blood, and might well involve the Nation in the very thing we are trying to avoid—world war III. A strategy of attrition within Korea—the decimation of the Chinese armies thrown against us, and particularly the destruction of their best troops—offered, he suggested, the best hope for an eventual cease-fire, with a safeguarding of American and allied interests in the Orient and the world.

The principal topics discussed were: (1) air reconnaissance; (2) hot pursuit of enemy planes across the Yalu and bombardment of enemy bases in Manchuria; (3) economic blockade of China; (4) naval blockade of China; (5) Formosa and Nationalist troops and guerrillas; (6) the relationship of Communist China to Soviet Russia; (7) the strength and capabilities of Soviet forces in the Far East.

The MacArthur position, the administration position (insofar as the hearings have revealed them) and an analysis of each of these topics follow:

1. AIR RECONNAISSANCE

MacArthur: "Remove now any restrictions on air reconnaissance of China coastal areas and of Manchuria." (Quoted by the general, as representing his position, from tentative proposals suggested by the Joint Chiefs of Staff in January.)

Administration: This, and other courses of action, once tentatively suggested by the Joint Chiefs of Staff during the darkest days of the Korean war, "were considered inadvisable in view of the radical change in the situation. * * * [This course] would have us, on our own initiative, carry the conflict beyond Korea, against the mainland of Communist China."

Analysis: This issue is minor and represents something of a tempest in a teapot. Extended air reconnaissance is a corollary to extended bombardment and, if we bomb in Manchuria, our "photorecon" planes must have freedom to fly nearly anywhere in the Manchurian air space and probably over the coastal areas—not easily defined—of China. Today—and since the Korean war started—our reconnaissance planes are making daily flights from Okinawa, Japan, and elsewhere along the coast of China from the Yellow Sea to Canton, but have remained over the sea. Inspection and photographs of ports is a daily routine, but detailed close inspection of certain areas is not possible.

Other reconnaissance planes have photographed border areas in Manchuria across the Yalu from great heights. By such means we have had forewarning of a Chinese Communist air build-up in Manchuria and of periodic concentrations of junks opposite Formosa. Present reconnaissance, together with other intelligence sources, should give us ample information to wage a war limited to Korea, but would be clearly inadequate if the war were extended beyond Korea.

2. "HOT PURSUIT"

MacArthur: The pursuit of enemy planes beyond the Yalu to their bases in Manchuria and the bombardment of the enemy sanctuary in Manchuria—including airfields, troop concentrations, supply dumps, and railroads—would, together with other actions, "force China to diminish her effort in * * * Korea."

Administration: The administration early agreed to the hot pursuit of enemy aircraft beyond the Yalu, but because of allied opposition, did not authorize it. Bombing of Chinese bases "would not bring victory," but if there were no danger of bringing Russia into the war we would not hesitate to bomb them.

Analysis: This issue involves a question of judgment as to just how much air power can accomplish. General MacArthur testified that if he had been permitted to bomb across the Yalu prior to and when the Chinese Communists struck us in force in late November, "I haven't the faintest doubt we would have thrown them back."

Air power exaggerated

But General MacArthur told the President at Wake Island before the attack that if the Chinese Communists did attack him his air power would slaughter them. Exaggerated optimism about the ability of air power to interdict completely enemy communication lines has characterized much of the Korean war; yet the enemy, utilizing animal transport, human porters, and moving by night and with great camouflage discipline, always has brought up supplies.

There is, nevertheless, not much doubt that our bombardment of enemy facilities in Manchuria would considerably complicate the enemy's ground campaign in Korea, and might, in time, reduce his ability to maintain troops there. But such a result would be conditional upon three other factors: (1) Increase of the strength of our own Air Forces in the Far East; (2) negligible or limited opposition from the Chinese Communist Air Force; (3) no opposition from the Soviet Air Force.

General MacArthur testified that his program of bombardment might require the addition of perhaps one B–29 group and a B–36 group to the far eastern air forces. No public and official administration estimate of the additional effort needed has been given, but some administration spokesmen fear such a campaign would necessitate the reduction in strength of our strategic air command, which now represents the (atomic) right fist of our world strategy, and of our continental air defense in order to supply enough planes for the broadened Far East strategy.

This would be particularly true if the Chinese Communist air force—now believed to number 500 to 700 planes in Manchuria, including two types of modern Russian jets—should retaliate by active attack upon our bases and ground troops.

Question of sanctuary

If the Russian air force, numbering perhaps 3,000 planes east of Lake Baikal, should intervene, all bets, of course, would be off, and Russia has troops, and planes along the Manchurian railways, which are important to the supply of the sizable Russian garrisons at Port Arthur and Dairen.

The administration makes the point that our planes and troops—as well as the enemy's—have a sanctuary in Korea; we are now relatively free from any serious air attack, and that if and when enemy aircraft intervene massively in the ground battle in Korea or in attack upon our bases, our planes will immediately retaliate by attacks upon Manchurian bases and supply lines.

United States air attacks upon Manchuria would certainly broaden the war. And the military gains achieved would be at the expense of the commitment of greater force to the Orient—with consequent reduction in our strength elsewhere. Such action might also result in development of a major air war—in addition to the existent ground fighting—and consequent deprivation of our troops in Korea of the great volume of air support they are now receiving.

3. ECONOMIC BLOCKADE

There is no material difference between General MacArthur and the administration on this point. The administration's difficulty has been to convince its allies—particularly Great Britain—of the wisdom of such a measure, and to control shipments carried in foreign-flag vessels. Recent United Nations and congressional actions indicate that the way has been cleared for tightening an economic blockade which has long been in effect.

4. NAVAL BLOCKADE

MacArthur: China is "peculiarly vulnerable to the process of blockade. * * * There is no weapon of war in my opinion that is quite as efficacious as a blockade. * * *"

Administration: "It would inconvenience them and in time might have a very serious effect on the stability of the Chinese Communist Government."

Analysis: A sea blockade of an island, or of a small nation with limited land access to other nations, is most effective; sea blockades of great continental nations or of half a continent, like China, are generally far less effective. General MacArthur's point is that naval closure of the sea lanes of communication to China, plus the air bombardment of the Manchurian railroads, would cut effectively the main routes by which supplies reach China. This is undoubtedly true. But naval blockade plus air bombardment would probably never be—at least until months after its inception—more than 50 to 75 percent effective. Other land routes beyond our effective reach are still open to China, via central Asia, via India, via Burma, and Thailand, and by blockade-runners.

Moreover, railroads, once bombed are not necessarily severed; they can be repaired quickly, as Germany in the last war and Korea now, have demonstrated; it would require consistent and persistent large-scale effort to halt traffic.

Even when China was limited in the last war to supplies over the Hump and by the Burma Road, resistance against the Japanese was still maintained. Moreover, China is capable of manufacturing in sizable numbers the small arms, mortars and machine guns which form the bulk of the equipment of her army in Korea, and China has sufficient rice to prevent nationwide famine.

Greater naval forces

Like air bombardments, naval blockade, if it is to be effective, would require a greater concentration of United States naval forces in the Far East—how much greater no witness yet has ventured to guess. It would, like air bombardment, increase the risk of involvement with Soviet Russia; General MacArthur advocated the inclusion of Russian Port Arthur in our blockade cordon. It would increase friction with our allies and with "neutrals," and India, at least, would probably pay no attention to it. Yet, even with the naval force now available in the Far East, a blockade which would greatly cut down Chinese imports could be established.

5. FORMOSA

This breaks down into a number of issues:

(1) Strategic importance

MacArthur: "I would insure that Formosa shall not fall into Red hands. * * * If it does, you have not only lost everything we gained in the Pacific war, but you have rolled back our strategic frontier * * * all the way to the western coast of the United States."

Administration: "We did not want [Formosa] for ourselves, but it would be very serious for our line of defense there if it got into hostile hands." The administration has advocated "neutralization" of Formosa and last week General Marshall agreed completely with General MacArthur that it should not be allowed to pass to Communist control.

Analysis: Few military leaders would agree with the extreme statements of General MacArthur about Formosa's strategic importance; in effect he said that if we lost Formosa we lost the Pacific. Yet Formosa was in enemy hands in World War II and even in the darkest days our strategic frontier was never pushed back to the Pacific coast. As General MacArthur himself pointed out in his testimony, our military superiority in the western Pacific is dependent upon sea and air superiority; if we maintain such superiority, Formosa, even in enemy hands, could not be a vital military threat. However, enemy jet planes based on advanced fields on Formosa, would have range enough—unlike the same planes based on the Chinese mainland—to operate against the Philippines, and the political and psychological effect of a Communist Formosa would be very grave in the Philippines and the Orient.

(2) Chiang Kai-shek

MacArthur: "I believe that to the average Asiatic, Chiang Kai-shek stands out as the great symbol against communism."

Administration: Inherent in the testimony was some feeling of reserve about Chiang Kai-shek's leadership.

Analysis: Few experts would characterize Chiang in the sweeping terms used by MacArthur, but on the other hand, there are few who can name any Chinese leader to replace him who would command the same power. The issue should not be put in terms of Chiang or Mao, but in terms of many anti-Communist leaders.

(3) Nationalist armed forces

MacArthur: These forces are on the whole good, but need United States equipment, training, and logistical support. They should be built up and Chiang Kai-shek, with United States support, should be allowed to use them against the continent of Asia. There was also some discussion of their use in Korea. United States help should never include the commitment of United States ground troops on the China mainland.

Administration: On the basis of reports by "the survey party which was sent by MacArthur to Formosa" the Joints Chiefs of Staff were convinced "that these [Nationalist] forces would not be effective" in Korea. No clear-cut statement is available about how the JHS feel today about the use of these troops against the China mainland, but the United States Seventh Fleet is still acting under orders which prevent Nationalist attacks against the mainland.

Aid to Chiang Kai-shek

Analysis: Gradual modification of our Formosan policy since last summer now has reached the point where mutual defense assistance program aid is being given to the island, and a United States military mission—to administer that aid but not to supervise it or to train the Chinese—is now on Formosa. The checks which prevent the use of the Nationalist Navy, Air Force, and Army against the mainland still, however, exist. If they were lifted, immediate small-scale operations against the Communists would be possible, but large-scale operations are months away and would be dependent for their success upon extensive United States supervision and logistic support. Our present policy of giving aid without supervision is largely useless; the reforms needed on Formosa to make the 500,000 men of the Nationalists effective fighting forces are too major to be accomplished without United States supervision and training.

(4) Nationalist guerrillas

This subject was slurred over in the released testimony, but a United States program of aid and organization for anti-Communist guerrillas on the mainland of China has been considerably increased in recent months, and there seems to be no difference of opinion about this.

6. CHINA AND SOVIET RUSSIA

MacArthur: Communism, rather than Russia, is the major threat, and Moscow and Peiping are not indissolubly linked.

Administration: Soviet Russia is the main threat. Moscow and Peiping are not indissolubly linked but are close together now, and an attack upon Peiping might further forge this link.

Analysis: This argument seems a quibble. The enemy is both communism and Soviet Russia, but it is indisputable that from a military point of view Russia is the main danger. Psychologically, ideology cannot be defeated by a sword; hence the military measures against Chinese communism which MacArthur advocates would not strike against the main military opponent and might psychologically forge the present link between Moscow and Peiping more strongly.

7. SOVIET FORCES IN EAST

MacArthur: "Their air is not to be discounted * * *. That she [Russia] could get command of the sea * * *, I would be very doubtful of. * * * The Soviet has the capacity to launch a punishing attack upon Japan, but * * * [not] to overrun Japan * * *." There are major industrial and logistic weaknesses in the Soviet military set-up in the Far East. Their dispositions are primarily defensive.

Administration: Figures of Soviet strength were censored, but are nevertheless well known; there are at least 70 Soviet submarines, including some snorkels, in the Pacific; at least 3,000 planes east of Lake Baikal and from 30 to 40 divisions in the same area. There are probably close to 100,000 Russian troops of all types in Manchuria and several hundred thousand others in the Vladivostok area or along the Manchurian frontier. Soviet capability for an offensive effort is not discounted.

Analysis: Any judgments are speculative, but some of the communication and industrial weaknesses cited by MacArthur appear to be dated. They were true prior to World War II, but an improved communication network and industrial facilities have been established in the Far East; there are today, for instance, Soviet submarine-building yards in Siberia. The remoteness of Siberia from the Urals and European Russia undoubtedly would hamper Soviet supply, but there is probably sufficient matériel stockpiled to permit major efforts for some months of war. The Soviet military capabilities, in any case, must be reckoned as initially strong, particularly on the continent of Asia.

CONCLUSION AND SUMMARY

The issues obviously boil down to differing judgments as to the efficacy of the measures proposed, the strength of the Russians in the area, and the Communist reactions to these measures. General MacArthur thinks that the extension of the limited war in Korea to a limited war in China would increase the pressure against the Chinese Communist Government sufficiently to force it to make peace in Korea and that Russia would not intervene, though the risk would have to be taken. The administration doubts the efficacy of these measures, fears more than does General MacArthur the possibility of Soviet intervention, and believes that some of the measures might split us from our allies and weaken us in other areas of the world more vital to our global strategy.

Any objective appraisal would probably fall somewhere between these judgments. Bombardment and blockade is not likely to bring about full-fledged open and all-out Soviet intervention, but it very probably would mean the increase of indirect Soviet aid to China, with a resultant increase in the scale of fighting. On the other hand, there is no present indication that Peiping is ready to cry quits in Korea, and there does not appear to be any foreseeable end to the present campaign of attrition.

In such circumstances it seems likely that we must inevitably move, not all the way to the MacArthur program, but toward a less limited war—the imposition of a tighter and tighter economic blockade, the strengthening of Formosa and the mainland guerrillas, and the lifting of the restrictions that now hamper the Nationalists. But it seems unlikely—and undesirable—that we will, in the near future, bomb and blockade Communist China unless the enemy himself first broadens the war.

In other words, the basic issues of victory through attrition or victory through attack seem oversimplified; neither strategy promises clear-cut victory. For in Korea, as elsewhere in the world, we are engaged in a political, psychological, economic, and military campaign of attrition—with our patience, judgment, firmness, and strength the only factors that stand between us and some future era of greater security and the specter of world war III. We are in for a long pull and a hard pull—and no prescription for a quick and easy cure can change the prognosis.

The Land Where the River Flows North

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, the great Red River Valley of the North has played an important part in the development of our Nation. Its broad, rich acres produce some of the finest crops in the world, crops which are a basic part of our national economy.

I would like to call to the attention of the Members an article by Mr. H. W. Herbison, which explains the history of the region and its development as a potato center. The article, as printed in the program for the National Potato Conference at Grand Forks, N. Dak., March 20 to 31, follows:

THE LAND WHERE THE RIVER FLOWS NORTH
(By H. W. Herbison)

Where tossed and rolled the mighty waters of prehistoric Lake Agassiz, remaining in the wake of the northward retreat of that great continental ice sheet blanketing the land during the Wisconsin stage of ice invasion, is now an 8,000-square-mile reservoir of soil fertility we call the Red River Valley of the North. Other than the black-land region of the Don in Russia, no strip of land exists quite like it in potential power to produce cereal grains, flaxseed, potatoes, sugarbeets, and legumes in complementary combination with good farm management.

Beginning near Wahpeton, N. Dak., this land-use area extends nearly 200 miles northward in the direction of Winnipeg, Manitoba. In width, it averages about 40 miles (as narrow as 20 miles near its southern boundary and widening out at much as 60 miles during its course toward the Canadian line). More than one-third of it lies within the State of Minnesota; the remaining portion is in six counties comprising the eastern boundary of North Dakota.

The summer visitor is immediately struck with the nearly level topography of the area (ideal for mechanized farming), the rich black color and the depth of its fertile soils.

Climate, past and present, accounts for many striking characteristics of Red River Valley soils and their performance. Comparatively low moisture supplies in centuries past were hardly sufficient to support a general forest vegetation; they were, however, extremely favorable to the growth of numerous grasses. These grasses have been the source of humus imparting the black color to all soils of the region.

While adequate for the accumulation of large quantities of black organic matter in the surface soil, moisture supply of only 20 to 24 inches a year has not been sufficient to leach it to any great depth. Long winters blanket the land with snow to help keep natural surface soil fertility intact for use by plants during the spring and summer months when most of the area's rainfall occurs.

The decade 1870–80 was significant in terms of settlement, public policy, and the development of transportation and markets. The Northern Pacific Railway extended its lines westward. The St. Paul & Pacific (now part of the Great Northern) reached Barnesville, Minn., in 1870. By 1880, Jim Hill was successful in having the Great Northern lines built through the State and Red River Valley. The eastern part of old military reserves was officially thrown open to homestead entry.

By 1883, much of the better arable land of the Red River Valley was already taken up by settlers and its development as an area producing small grains and flaxseed begun.

How large are Red River Valley farms? Average 1950 size of farm approaches 400 acres (all farms). Four hundred and eighty acres appear to be the size most prevalent, interspersed with many half-section farms and a relatively small number which are 640 acres or larger. In gross farm income from all sources, Red River Valley farm operators have averaged a little more than $8,000 in recent years, with the common pattern slightly higher than $10,000.

How about potatoes? Where, when and how do they fit into the land-use picture of the Red River Valley? Historically, commercial potato production came into the land-use picture to stay with the turn of the twentieth century. Before that, ambitious starts were made only to fold up in the face of high freight rates and imperfect knowledge of the potato market.

Early growers sought a row crop that would (1) help to clean up weed infested land for wheat, and (2) another cash crop that could be produced, handled and marketed at a time not in conflict with the production and harvesting of small grains and flax.

Potato acreages grew slowly until new technology following World War I enabled Red River Valley growers to expand commercial production rapidly. By 1919, acreage was only 83,000. By 1929, it had increased to 130,000, then to 140,000 acres in 1940, and finally reaching an all-time acreage high of 191,000 in 1943. By 1945, acreage had dropped back to 175,000 from which 23,460,000 bushels were produced. Since then, potato acreages have tapered off to the lowest level recorded within the span of the past quarter of a century; even so, potato production on North Dakota farms has held right near the 20,000,000-bushel mark in recent years. The same general pattern may be assumed to hold for Minnesota portions of the valley.

What takes the place of displaced potato acres? Sixty-seven thousand acres of dryland sugarbeets are now grown in the Red River Valley (about two-thirds on the Minnesota side of the river). In the southern section of the valley, corn, soybeans, and sugarbeet acreage has expanded at the expense of potato acreage over a period of 25 years. In the northern zone, these other row crops have also expanded but have replaced potatoes to a lesser degree than in the southern zone.

More and more, commercial table stock potato production has tended to concentrate in the northern zone of the Red River Valley where the combination of land, climate, and producer-handler know-how has made for a community of potato men determined to hold and strengthen their position in the potato market place. With a half century of potato experience behind them, an aggressive State seed department on the alert to vigorous seed stocks, a sympathetic research and extension program expanding its service in production and marketing problem solving, and the benefit of land and climate in which potatoes naturally fit into the overall organization and management of the farm—it seems likely that Red River Valley potatoes may continue to be reckoned with in the market place for quite a while.

The valley now has more than 500 trackside potato storage and processing plants, including some of the newest and most modern in the United States. Potato acreage range from 20 to more than 1,000 acres per grower, averaging 50 acres, with a large production of certified seed. Cobblers, Triumphs, and Pontiacs are principal varieties, although many newer varieties are coming into prominence and research goes on constantly to develop others particularly suited to the region.

The future? The Red River Valley Potato Growers' Association, the Potato Research Center, the Research and Demonstration Farm, and the cooperation extended by the land-grant colleges and Department of Agriculture with the potato industry suggests that there will be a future. Accent from here will be on meeting the demands of discriminating consumers and looking well to the costs and marginal efficiency of satisfying consumer demand in our production, harvesting, handling, and marketing policy and practice

With patience, hard work, and courageous planning the Red River Valley seeks an answer to what the future holds for it by 1960 that may be made compatible with the interests of producers and consumers alike. Progress in that direction is now under way.

The Last Phase

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, this article by Edna Lonigan speaks for itself:

THE LAST PHASE
(By Edna Lonigan)

I

General MacArthur's triumphant journey from Tokyo to the Halls of Congress is a political earthquake. But the line of cleavage is not between Republicans and Democrats. It is between the people and the mysterious entity called the Fair Deal.

The Truman administration started out as an era of good feeling. Those who did not like the New Deal were glad we had a homespun Missouri Democrat in place of Roosevelt. They liked his looks, his Midwestern accent, his unexpected dignity in dealing with Congress, with the press, and with the chiefs of foreign nations.

The new President took up the task of international conferences where Roosevelt dropped it, and then, after Potsdam, said what most Americans wanted to hear, that he would go to no more such meetings.

But it soon became apparent that he followed Roosevelt's policies, and he clashed with Congress over price control.

Disillusionment with Soviet Russia set in and, when England announced that she could no longer support her commitments in Greece, we took over, under the Truman doctrine, promising to oppose military force with force, if any nation was threatened by the U. S. S. R.

The Greek-Turkish program changed rather suddenly into the Marshall plan for economic—not military—aid to all Europe. That evolved into a military alliance, then into arms for Europe, and finally into the plan to send troops to garrison duty there. But though we spent billions, Europe remained helpless against Communist assault.

Meanwhile China fell. We evacuated Korea, and announced that Formosa was not important to our defense line in the Pacific. Plans were made instead to extend the Marshall plan to a billion people in Asia and Africa. Then the Communists moved in to fill the military vacuum we had left.

The President decided to enter the war. After bloody fighting the general who had snatched victory from defeat was summarily dismissed. An outraged people bore him in triumphal procession halfway round the world. The President was booed in a Washington ball park.

It does not make sense.

II

Obviously something is needed to explain this strange performance—something more than mink coats, deep freezers, or Pendergast politics.

There is a simple explanation. It is to be found in a speech of Earl Browder's which is reprinted in a report of the Committee on Un-American Activities in March 1944.

Browder told the American Communist movement it was to abandon the Communist Party and set to work especially through the trade unions, to form a mass organization with members throughout the United States.

The PAC under Sidney Hillman carried out the plan laid down by Browder. Of course 90 percent of the trade-union members did not suspect that the Soviet Government had planned their organization, their policies, and even their publications.

The purpose of forming this mass organization was to build "national unity," to preserve the "gains" of Tehran. It was to unite everyone—workers, farmers, managers, even financiers—in a drive on the Fascists and defeatists, those who doubted that the alliance with Soviet Russia could continue into peacetime.

Stalin and his advisers realized at Tehran that Roosevelt was dying, and that they must choose his successor, and get him elected, or they would lose all the gains the Hisses and others had won. The Soviet leaders also knew that Roosevelt had smashed the Democratic Party, and that whoever mustered the strongest political power could take it over and run it, under the old symbols.

The Communists then built up a network of local political machines in each congressional district, formed first about the labor unions, but gradually drawing in intellectuals, farmers, women, and religious groups. This was the familiar popular front, with which the Communists had softened up France under Blum, before the Nazi-Communist attack.

Truman was chosen as candidate for Vice President by Sidney Hillman, at the suggestion (according to Jonathan Daniels in his recent book, A Man of Independence) of Max Lowenthal, who had known the Senator from Missouri for years through congressional investigations of the finances of the railroads.

The organizers of this coalition were ordered to abandon their revolutionary slogans and to concentrate on uniting all groups except the reactionaries, in order to better destroy the enemies of unity with the U. S. S. R. Their particular hates were Hoover, Farley, Byrnes, Forrestal, and MacArthur.

William Z. Foster reported to the Cominform early in 1950 that this plan had succeeded far beyond all expectations. Its followers included members of all religions, and social classes.

This pattern of the Popular Front is the only concept that will explain the strange history of the Truman administration. If you examine our foreign policy, our unusual military ineptitude, each of our Presidential and congressional campaigns, the vagaries of our labor leaders, and the spread of defeatism and enervation in our literature, the pieces all fit. They fit the military needs of the Soviet Union, to divide us, to sow defeatism, and to make us spend ourselves into bankruptcy.

III

The American people have not had a government of their own since 1945. They could not get anything constructive accomplished in foreign or military affairs because they had no government to do it for them.

Their Government has been captured from within, by a few secret agents in key positions, as Norway was captured by a few Nazi agents placed in key positions by Hitler before his armies struck.

It is time we stopped talking of our present Government with words that apply only to an American Government. We need a new language to describe the Government we have today.

We do not have a President in the American sense, because there is no longer a balance between executive and legislative power. The office has grown until it doth bestride the narrow world like a colossus. We do not have departments or bureaus in the American sense, because Congress does not define their duties or set limits on their power. In a government by law, it is essential that the legislature, which does not benefit by adding bureaus or extending their power, should create and define all Government agencies, as Madison pointed out in the Federalist Papers. We do not have a budget or appropriations in the American sense. When money is managed by the Government, all figures are lies.

Our present-day Government is like a great banyan tree, towering high above everything, and sendings arms out to start new roots in organizations we still think of as private—the labor unions, colleges, women's clubs, churches, foundations, and business associations. This combine of public and private agencies, directed by a small inner group now has almost complete control over the flow of news, ideas, and discussion in the press, movies, radio, and moving pictures, and the press of private organizations. It does not crudely forbid freedom of discussion. It merely jams the press and the other media with banalities written or whispered by its hired ministry of enlightenment.

The American people never thought about how to manage such a combine. They did not know it was operating under the outward signs of their own kind of government. The Soviet leaders knew. They knew in 1943 they must take it over before we woke up.

IV

Defeat and total eradication of the Popular Front party in the United States is the first condition for any hope of peace, or of survival of the United States as a Nation.

The opposition party so far has suffered only heartbreaking defeats. They are like Thor in the German fable, who put forth prodigious efforts to eat all the meat in the trough faster than his opponent, only to find his opponent consumed meat and bones and the trough itself. Thor did not know he was fighting not a mortal, but Loki, God of Fire.

The Popular Front in the United States cannot be defeated by any normal political strategy or party policy. It is a military organization to be defeated only as any usurping government is defeated by organizing the resistance.

Until a few weeks ago, the people were apathetic or cynical, there were no visible leaders, and all communication was blurred by the Government's propaganda skill.

Suddenly the President dismissed our foremost general, the people poured a tidal wave of letters and telegrams upon Congress. MacArthur's course led straight as an arrow to the Waldorf Towers, from which Herbert Hoover had been valiantly trying to arouse opposition to the sellout of our country. Now we have an aroused Nation and potential leadership.

The line of political cleavage is now clear—between a foreign policy that fits Soviet military needs and one that puts American security uppermost. At home the same cleavage runs between a governmental pyramid the Soviet agents can pentrate, and the simple American Government that foreign agents cannot manage. Congress has in the power of the purse the means to tear down the Bastille.

The Truman administration will use every ounce of its tremendous power to discredit MacArthur. They will try to break his heart as they did Forrestal's. Will they win? As "Not merely gossip" asked last week? Can leaders and the people together defeat the machine?

The answer turns on one fact. In the resistance every fighter counts. No one else counts. Every editor, every reporter, every clergyman, every club officer, every man in the street, must take his place in the ranks and do what is nearest him to win this battle.

If we fail ——.

The Coal Industry in the Modern Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LESTER C. HUNT
OF WYOMING
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, for a great many years, in fact ever since his membership in this body, my colleague, the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] has manifested a great interest in the development of America's natural resources. More especially has he been interested in the great coal resources of this country and of our State. In 1943 he introduced a bill to authorize the United States Bureau of Mines to construct and operate demonstration plants that gasoline can be made from coal and oil shale.

For this work my colleague secured an appropriation of some $30,000,000, and it has now been demonstrated in these plants that gasoline can be made from coal at a cost of 4 to 5 percent more than making gasoline from petroleum.

My colleague delivered an address in Cleveland last evening before the American Mining Congress Coal Show, the subject of his discussion being the coal industry in the modern crisis.

I request unanimous consent that this splendid and informative address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COAL INDUSTRY IN THE MODERN CRISIS

(By Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY)

For the third time in the twentieth century the whole world hovers on the brink of a global war, although the first year of the second half of this century is less than 6 months old. We who have lived in any part of this century need no one to tell us the terrible cost of war in human life and suffering. Veterans' hospitals scattered broadcast throughout the land, in which the soldiers of two World Wars are being treated tell the story of our failure to abolish war. Now we seem to be drifting helplessly toward a third global conflict in which, if it occurs, we know that the great discoveries and inventions of science and technology will be used to destroy millions of lives, to lay waste the habitations of men on every continent, and to cause new soldiers to become patients in these same hospitals and in others yet to be built.

BUILDERS OR DESTROYERS

Is it the destiny of the people of America to participate in such a struggle or have we the intelligence and the will to demonstrate to all the peoples of the world that peace can be achieved? That war can be avoided? And that freedom for men can be permanently established as the way of life for all mankind?

Are we to be builders or destroyers? These questions must be answered by this generation. If the peoples and the leaders of other nations are unable to point the way to peace, must we also be condemned to confess that we are unable to show the world how men can build a permanent peace?

I know of no better forum in which to raise this question than at this session of the American Mining Congress. The answer must be made now because if we turn from building to destroying no one knows better than those who are assembled here that no mind can conceive the measure of destruction which will be wrought if we permit a third global conflict to come. I say there can be no better forum than this because those of you who are assembled here know from personal experience what has been done in the United States to raise the standard of living and security for the people of this country by the intelligent use of natural resources. But you know also what a terrible toll war takes, not only upon the human resources of a nation but upon its material resources. During this twentieth century we have dug the minerals from our hills to scatter them broadcast throughout the world in war. The Mesabi Range in Minnesota was the greatest deposit of iron ore in all the world. Discovered 100 years ago it provided the raw material from which industry made the iron and steel through the use of which this country became the leading industrial nation of the world. Yet, during the 6 years of World War II, we took from those hills one-fifth of all the iron ore that had been extracted from them since iron was discovered there 100 years ago. Millions of tons of the iron and steel made from this ore has been shot away or is rotting away in foreign lands.

Again, in the Korean war we are paying not only with the lives of American soldiers, but we are also paying with American minerals which could be used to build a greater future for this and for coming generations. Instead, it is being used for the destruction of the lives of the soldiers who are involved in the conflict as well as the lives and homes of the noncombatant inhabitants of the Korean peninsula. Approximately 1,000,000 tons of steel, aluminum, copper, zinc, and other minerals that have been fabricated here into bombs and shells and bullets are being showered upon that hapless peninsula, and we know now whatever may be the termination of the war Korea cannot recover in another century from the destruction that has already been wrought in 10 months.

"The anger of man worketh not the justice of God." It is patience, tolerance, intelligence, charity, and, above all, faith in our own ability to use the resources with which nature has endowed us to show the whole world how the builders can in fact abolish the destruction of war.

PEACE THROUGH WISE USE OF RESOURCES

No nation in history was better endowed with natural resources than this, and, because this Nation was founded by men who had faith in freedom, we have made it possible here for the intelligence of the individual to be applied constructively to the utilization of these resources. The ingenuity of the free men who roved at will throughout this continent has achieved the greatest material progress ever registered and has developed here a social culture in which social and economic justice for the individual has been raised to levels never before attained. This has not been accomplished without waste and without sad mistakes. We have not always taken advantage of the opportunities we have had, but the record of what has been done points unerringly to great opportunities yet remaining, if we do not lose faith and surrender to fear.

It was because of my conviction that the future holds vast possibilities for the development of our natural resources in building constructively for peace that throughout my service in the Senate I have been urging better and more intensive utilization of them. It was this I had in mind when in 1943 I introduced the bill to authorize the United States Bureau of Mines to construct and operate demonstration plants to show how liquid fuel can be made from coal and oil shale. These experiments have already proved that the commercial production of liquid fuel is attainable from our huge deposits of both coal and shale that are known to exist in this country. Indeed, it is indicated that gasoline can now be made from coal at a cost of only 4 cents to 5 cents more than from petroleum, and this estimate takes no account of income to be derived from certain byproducts. It is unnecessary to tell this audience what this means for the future of America and the future of the world—provided we can avoid being compelled to use the energy sources with which this country is endowed for the destruction of human life in a third world war.

Of course, the fact that we have this new source of unlimited quantities of liquid fuel means national security in the sense that it equips us to defend ourselves even in modern war against any attack. It means more than that because it enables us to show the world that here in the United States dwells a people who have no design to seize the natural resources of any other people and who have no ambition whatsoever to establish imperialistic control of the world or any part of the world for the exploitation of its inhabitants.

AMERICA THE RICHEST IN NATURAL RESOURCES

It seems to me that the leaders of the coal industry can set a fine example to the leaders of all other industries if by intelligent utilization of our coal resources we can set an example to the peoples of other lands to do likewise. We can prove that there is no ground for fearing that natural resources will be exhausted and the people rendered unable to support themselves. That fear has been entertained by peoples from the beginning of time. Dr. Max Ball, distinguished oil geologist, testifying before the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs last March, reminded us that in the early days of the Roman Empire the Romans were worried that the copper mines of Cyprus and Spain would be exhausted and that they would be without the essential mineral from which their bronze weapons were made. Here in the United States for more than a generation experts have been predicting the exhaustion of our supply of petroleum, but our petroleum reserves are greater today by far than they were when the first prediction was made early in the century that the Nation would soon run out of petroleum. Even with the increase of our petroleum reserves, the demand for fuel in the United States is so great that it is necessary now to supplement these reserves by greater utilization of coal.

COAL: THE NATION'S BASIC FUEL

Fortunately, no one can predict that our coal reserves will be exhausted, because it is a scientific fact that coal is our largest available source of fuel, that it cannot possibly be exhausted at any imaginable rate of consumption for more than a thousand years, and that within the boundaries of continental United States lie practically one-half of all the known coal reserves of the world. We know that coal is rich in byproducts and that there are many productive ways of using it besides burning it in its raw state under a boiler. It is an invaluable source of chemical products as well as of energy supply, and yet we have been accustomed to hearing the coal industry called a sick industry and we have been accustomed to being told in the press that coal is being pushed out as a fuel. That is not the fact. We are consuming in excess of 100,000,000 tons more coal every year now than we were at the turn of the century and we are mining coal much more efficiently than we were at that time. The people of the United States are using more energy than at any previous time. Our population has doubled in the last 50 years, but the energy resources we have enjoyed have more than quadrupled. We are consuming more coal, more oil, more gasoline, and more hydroelectric power, and every citizen of the United States living today has twice as much natural energy working for him as did the individual in 1900.

Coal pushed wood from the parlor stove, from the kitchen range and from the locomotive during the nineteenth century. It has been finding competition from oil and gas in recent years so that it no longer supplies as large a percentage of the total energy consumption of the United States as it once did, but it is still a most vital source of energy and it can be made more so.

In 1905, 460,000 men were working in the mines producing 315,000,000 tons at the rate of 3.24 tons per man per day. In 1949, 433,000 men were producing 438,000,000 tons at the rate of 6.43 tons per man per day. In 1949 this coal, though it exceeded the production of 1905 by 100,000,000 tons, represented only 39.8 percent of the Nation's energy consumption, as compared with 86.9 percent in 1905. The utilization of coal has not kept pace with the energy demands of the people, but because of its extraordinary nature, because of the products which can be made from it, the opportunity is now presented to the industry to make a greater contribution than ever before to the industrial and economic needs of the people. This can be done without displacing any other energy resource so long as we continue to improve the economic status of the people, for there is no known limit to the demand for fuel and energy which will develop in an expanding economy. Maximum employment and good wages under good working conditions for all workers create an ever-growing demand for all the products of industry.

The greatest handicap that mankind has suffered in all past centuries has been the conviction of some people that there is not enough to go around and that, therefore, the masses of men must be exploited in order that the exploiters may live in luxury and security. It was this fear that brought Mussolini and Hitler into power. It is this fear which builds the slave camps of Siberia.

HUMAN INGENUITY: OUR BASIC RESOURCE

The economic progress of the United States has demonstrated that the fear is utterly groundless and that a future of peace and plenty awaits all mankind provided only that we unite to improve the utilization of the natural resources with which the planet upon which we live is filled to overflowing. Man has never failed to find, to produce, and to use the resources he needs. When one commodity becomes scarce, human resourcefulness has been able to replace it. This is history. This is the story of science. This is the story of industry, and coal, the inexhaustible deposit of energy, affords the men and women who are engaged in its production and utilization a grand and glowing opportunity to prove how freedom and cooperation can build a peaceful world of progress and justice. Bear in mind that I said freedom. The glory of America is that it has preserved freedom for the individual. The continued development of coal and every other natural resource depends upon the maintenance of freedom for the individual because, after all else has been said about the material riches of the world, the greatest natural resource is the heart, the mind, and the industry of a free man. So I would like to see the progress of the coal industry carried on by the maximum utilization of individual initiative.

THE PLACE OF SYNTHETIC LIQUID FUELS

That is what I had in mind when in February 1948 I introduced amendments to the then-pending tax bill to provide a 27½ percent depletion allowance and accelerated amortization to stimulate the investment of private capital in plants designed to make synthetic liquid fuel from coal. The amendment was not adopted by the Eightieth Congress. I know of no reason why coal used for such a purpose should not have as great a depletion allowance as that granted to any other mineral. I understand that the Ways and Means Committee of the House has tentatively decided to raise the general depletion allowance for coal from 5 to 10 percent, but the social and industrial gains for all the people of the United States will be so great if private capital can be induced to invest in the synthetic-fuels industry that, in my opinion, special consideration should be given to the private investment that may be made for the extraction of oil from coal. I shall offer the amendment again.

When I introduced the synthetic-fuels bill authorizing the Bureau of Mines to construct and operate demonstration plants, it was not intended to be a first step toward putting the Government into industry, but only a necessary step to test the scientific methods by which liquid fuel is made from coal and shale and to conduct the operations that would tend to prove whether or not the product would be competitive commercially. Public research is a benefit to all and the operations of the United States Bureau of Mines in its tests of the possibilities of making liquid fuel from coal and oil shale have justified every dollar which has been expended.

WILL PRIVATE ENTERPRISE DO THE JOB?

The time is here, however, for private capital to act, for coal deposits are to be found all over the country and the public demand will soon begin to arise for the construction of Government plants if private initiative does not take the lead. The public-land States have great coal reserves. My own State, Wyoming, has greater reserves of bituminous and subbituminous coal than any other State and it is only natural that the people of these areas should want to see such resources developed.

The alternatives are plain. We shall have free private competitive enterprise at work making liquid fuel or we shall have Government doing it. We shall have it done locally by the coal industry and by the users of coal putting up their own capital to build the plants, or we shall have the pressure continue to have the Government enter the field.

When the Defense Production Act was under consideration during the last session of Congress, I appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency in charge of the bill to urge the inclusion of language that would provide Government cooperation with private business to stimulate "the expansion of capacity, the development of technological processes, or the production of essential materials" needed for the defense program. The provision was written into the law and it is now possible, therefore, for the Government through contracts for the purchase of materials needed in the national defense to cooperate with private firms and corporations engaged in the production of such materials. This provision of the Defense Production Act, which I urged upon the committee, includes specifically "liquid fuels for Government use or for resale." Thus, it is clear that by the enactment of the synthetic fuels bill, which I introduced in 1943, by the enactment of the Defense Production Act of 1950, and by the consideration which is now being given to accelerated amortization and an increased depletion allowance which I suggested for the first time in February 1948, the way is being cleared for private capital to enter this field. It remains only for private capital to take the initiative.

CENTRALIZED INDUSTRY INVITES ATTACK

There is another consideration which must be borne in mind, namely the great need for the decentralization of industry. The threat of atomic warfare shows how unwise it would be to build new liquid fuel plants in those areas of the country in which heavy industry is already concentrated and which naturally would be the primary target for an enemy in war. Let no one have the slightest doubt that these industrial centers are now pinpointed upon the maps in the Soviet headquarters in Moscow.

The hydrogenation of coal affords a new method of producing critical materials needed in war. We are short of benzine, toluene, as well as xylene, chemicals which are invaluable in the production of explosives and aviation gasoline. Sulfur, another commodity in which the United States is in short supply, and pyridene are chemicals which can be produced as a result of the hydrogenation of coal. The conditions therefore exist in the defense program for the construction of liquid fuels plants. It would be highly desirable and highly intelligent to make certain that such defense plants would be constructed in areas remote from those in which so much of our industry is presently concentrated.

ECONOMIC FREEDOM FOR NEW INDUSTRY

Then, too, decentralization involves the avoidance of concentrated economic control of this great new potential industry. Economic concentration through fiscal or managerial control is another element that stimulates the demand for Government to enter the field. The basic cause of the present international controversy is the conviction of the masters of the Kremlin that the capitalistic world cannot avoid monopoly. Our belief in the American system of competitive free enterprise should therefore impel us to exercise every precaution to make certain that this new industry shall be developed in the American way, namely, that of free competitive enterprise. The acts which have been passed by the Congress and the tax law now under consideration create the opportunity for the construction of needed new plants in regions outside of the concentrated target area and free from concentrated economic control.

Only habits of thought stand in the way. We have been accustomed to have coal shipped in its raw form great distances at great expense to the factories in which it is consumed. How much more sensible it would be to utilize the coal in the area where it is mined, thus avoiding the great expense of our traditional methods of transportation. The synthetic fuels development makes this possible without loss to the transportation agencies. The commodities shipped into a growing community around a liquid-fuels plant would offset the loss of business in the reduction of the raw coal shipped out, and for such shipments there would be substituted the outgoing carloads of the products, gasoline, fuel oils, chemicals, etc., resulting from the hydrogenation development.

Fears of loss arising from progress which charges old habits have never been realized, as the industrial and economic growth of this country amply demonstrates. When the standard of living of the masses is raised, new markets are created for every industry and a liquid fuels plant would be a direct benefit to every other producing or transporting industry. This becomes apparent when it is realized that liquid-fuel plants would operate on a 24-hour schedule 7 days a week and would thus create a huge new demand for the production of coal. It is estimated that a plant capable of producing 10,000 barrels of liquid fuel a day from coal would need a daily mine capacity of about 7,600 tons produced from mines operated not less than 240 days in the year. This development would also make possible improved conditions for the miners for, after all, the human aspects of every industry are paramount in importance. Living standards must be maintained at the highest possible level so as to permit a fuller utilization of the unlimited resourcefulness of the individual.

The first obligation of America in this world crisis is to keep itself strong, and the citizen who would see the American way of life thrive in the present world conflict of ideologies must be able to see that all we are fighting for is opportunity for the individual. The Communist says that the individual cannot, in this scientific age, control either his political or his economic destiny, but must be content to become the pawn of the state. He who would sustain the American ideal of individual supremacy, the principle embodied in the Bill of Rights of our Federal Constitution, the principle which underlies our oft repeated talk about the maintenance of free enterprise, must make up his mind to defend the right of the individual to take advantage of every opportunity that the advance of science and technology provides. If we are to keep America strong enough to become an example to the people of the world, it must be an America in which the individual has this opportunity. It is not sufficient that the citizen shall be politically free. He must also be economically free. This is the great opportunity which is presented to this generation of Americans. We can, if we will, win both political and economic opportunity and freedom for all men everywhere. Men will be free in every nation and on every continent when we show the way. There is no iron curtain that can exclude from any people anywhere the knowledge of the gains that can be achieved for every individual in a nation which enjoys freedom.

They Too Pay Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. McCARTHY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Swift County (Minn.) Monitor for April 27, 1951:

THEY TOO PAY TAXES

During the past several weeks this newspaper has published a series of advertisements sponsored by the Minnesota Associated Businessmen, Inc., wherein cooperative and mutual corporations have been depicted as being nontaxpayers.

We accepted these advertisements for publication because we feel that the columns of a newspaper should be open to free expression of ideas and opinions whether we are in agreement with those ideas and opinions, or not. It is a fundamental policy, inherent to the democratic institutions of our country.

In allowing free dissemination of ideas, a newspaper also has the responsibility of correcting misstatements of fact and to challenge ideas and opinions which, in its opinion, are detrimental to the public welfare.

In the series of advertisements mentioned, we have a good example of what we mean in the foregoing statement of policy. We published them, but we do not agree with the idea they convey. They are misleading. They convey ideas concerning the tax status of cooperative and mutual corporations that are not substantiated by the facts.

Specifically, these are some of the errors of fact we find:

1. "You pay more taxes because Congress continutes to allow a favored few big businesses (meaning cooperatives) to pay little or nothing."

One of the biggest cooperatives in this area is Midland Cooperative Wholesale. The little or nothing that Midland paid in income, real-estate, and personal-property taxes for the years 1947 through 1949 was more than $800,000. In our own community we have cooperatives that are listed year after year among the highest taxpayers.

2. The cooperatives are called big business.

It is true that regional cooperatives, made up of scores or even hundreds, of local associations, have impressive accumulations of assets and do a big volume of business. But, in the sense that Americans think of it, they are not big businesses. If all the cooperatives in the country were combined, they would not equal, in assets or business volume, the size of any one of a number of giant American corporations. Furthermore, since when is bigness a crime in the American scheme of things?

3. "Congress lets them escape nearly a billion dollars a year in income taxes by granting them special exemptions."

This statement has been flatly contradicted by an investigating committee of the House of Representatives. The fact is that only one-sixth of the cooperatives in America qualify under the law as being exempt from paying income taxes. These are agricultural cooperatives, and the congressional committee found that, in the case of these relative few that are exempt, the aggregate amount of income retained is relatively small. No appreciable amount of revenue would accrue to the Government if income taxes were levied on these amounts. Five-sixths of the cooperatives pay income taxes on exactly the same basis as other corporations.

4. The ads would have the public believe that cooperatives are expanding on tax-free profits.

Cooperatives expand on the savings and investments of their member-owners just as other businesses expand on the invested savings of their owners.

Here in Minnesota we have seen the great advantages that have come to our State and to our communities because our farmers have had the good sense to organize cooperatives. Within the last 15 years we have witnessed electrification of rural homes all over America by farmer cooperatives. By bringing a vitally needed service to rural people, they have enhanced the individual income of farmers, and have provided billions of dollars of business for business people in towns and cities.

The result, income-tax-wise, has been, and will continue to be, a broader base for income-tax levies both for the farmer and the businessman who profits by the farmers' purchases of electrical merchandise and services. Other taxes that any other business pays must, of course, also be paid for all real and personal property the electric cooperative owns. Surely, there is no lessening of tax revenues in a deal like that.

The late J. V. Weber, when editor and publisher of the Murray County Herald at Slayton, saw the issue clearly. He wrote in the Herald of January 31, 1946: "Cooperatives have made great contributions to general prosperity. They have made Minnesota one of the great egg, butter, grain, and livestock States, and through their abiding interest in 4-H Club and similar work, they have made farm life more attractive. They have done a great job; they have saved their patrons money; and they have enlarged the vision of most rural people."

Close to the Center

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Citizen-News, Hollywood, Calif., for May 11, 1915:

CLOSE TO THE CENTER

Congressman DONALD L. JACKSON calls attention to the contrast in the reactions of some people to the congressional investigations into subversive activities.

Congressman JACKSON, from West Los Angeles, is a member of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. In his weekly letter he says:

"Your Representative was verbally flayed this week in an editorial written by Les Claypool, political editor of the Los Angeles Daily News.

"The editorial took exception to the manner of questioning employed by us during the recent appearance before the House Un-American Activities Committee of actor John Garfield. The sum of Mr. Claypool's editorial seemed to be that we were persecuting Mr. Garfield and seeking to convict the actor through 'guilt by association.'

"Other complaints have been received recently condemning us for attempting to whitewash Garfield and others. With the Daily News dissenting on the one hand, and a prominent far-right columnist disapproving on the other, it could be that we are close to the center line.

"No protest is made by the liberal wing when an Alger Hiss calls Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, and two Justices of the United States Supreme Court as character witnesses in an effort to prove his innocence by association, but mention a long list of Communist-front organizations and activities with which a star, director, or writer has been associated, and immediately there rises to high heaven the wail of guilt by association.

"Some days ago the committee was listening patiently to the arrogant and contemptuous statements of a recalcitrant witness before the committee. He had refused to say anything at all with respect to his association with Communist-front organizations, but he did bridle and fume at the following question asked by your representative:

"'Did you ever belong to a Fascist group known as the Silver Shirts?'

"The witness was vehement in his denial of membership and fairly frothed at the suggestion that he might have held membership in the group. We then asked:

"'Did you ever belong to the Communist Party?'

"The answer to that one was a flat refusal to answer the questions on grounds of self-incrimination and a denunciation of the committee generally and the members specifically.

"'Thought control' about which the antagonistic witnesses make such a great fuss, is a wonderful thing to rant about when questions are asked which might lead to a charge of perjury, but when the sky is clear and no legal consideration bars the way to wrathful answer, stand by for fury."

Congressman JACKSON, it appears, has an excellent understanding of Communists.

De Gaulle in New Bid for Power

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEON H. GAVIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Constantine Brown, from the Washington Evening Star for May 15, 1951:

DE GAULLE IN NEW BID FOR POWER—WOULD INCLUDE GERMANY IN WESTERN EUROPE DEFENSE IN REALISTIC PROGRAM TO SPEED PREPAREDNESS

(By Constantine Brown)

The stormy petrel of French politics, Gen. Charles de Gaulle, is making a serious bid to return to power as head of the government this summer.

The French elections are scheduled for June 17. All parties are determined to put up a serious fight to reduce the membership of the Communists in the new National Assembly. The Communists in the past have been the largest single political group in the Assembly.

Most non-Communist politicians are fearful of General de Gaulle, who is stubborn and uncompromising in matters of national defense.

At present he is believed to be the only French political leader who can approach the problem of Europe's defense realistically. In conversations with a number of Americans, General de Gaulle appears to present a far more constructive program to hasten preparedness than any other French politician.

He is said to favor strongly the following program:

1. The inclusion of Germany in Western European defense on a far more equitable basis than previous French governments have indorsed it. He is less fearful of a resurgence of Germany's military might. While not discounting German military revival, he believes in first things first.

General de Gaulle apparently is convinced that we shall have a war in a very short time if present conditions persist in Europe. The only deterrent to Russia is a strongly rearmed free world. Diplomatic solutions, attempts at cooperation with Moscow and appeasement in whatever form are no longer of avail and, in his opinion, will result only in an increase of the Kremlin's demands.

The threat to the free world, he says, can be lessened only by a real show of strength and determination to meet force with force. Under such conditions France's fears of its neighbor across the Rhine should be subordinated to the actual advantages which can be obtained by creating a sovereign Germany, which would eagerly join in the West's defense effort.

2. In the same vein, General de Gaulle believes strongly in the inclusion of Turkey and Greece in the Atlantic Pact. His thinking is military rather than political. So far, the French and British Governments—for reasons which are still obscure to the average observer—have prevented these two Mediterranean nations from joining the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, in spite of the pressing requests from Ankara and Athens. This stubborn refusal has given the Turks the impression that the great powers have in mind some appeasement proposal to Russia at the expense of the Turks.

General de Gaulle apparently does not follow the tortuous thinking of the diplomats when he favors inclusion of Turkey and Greece in western defense. The only thing he has in mind is that these two countries combined have trained military forces in being which exceed considerably that of the entire NATO.

3. General de Gaulle is reported also to favor the inclusion of Spain in the Western European defense system. He appears less interested in the totalitarian form of government which exists across the Pyrenees than in its manpower potential.

As a soldier he places political ideologies in time of near war far behind the military necessities of the free world. Spain has never threatened France militarily. Spain is strongly anti-Communist. These two considerations are ample for this Frenchman to believe that the neighbor across the Pyrenees, with an army of some half million men under arms, should not be left out of Europe's defense coordination.

4. General de Gaulle is said to have expressed strongly the view that France and the other western nations are marking time and are not doing all in their power to mobilize their military potential. The politicians who have headed the French Government since the crisis became acute still hesitate to increase the compulsory military service from 18 to 24 months. General de Gaulle is said to be determined to force this increase if he becomes head of the French Government.

These revolutionary views of General de Gaulle will be strongly opposed by the non-Communist parties, which in the past have contributed greatly to the slow-down of French rearmament. Their inactivity has been followed by the other nations of continental Europe, to the distress of General Eisenhower.

While public opinion in the United States has exercised a sufficient pressure to force the administration to change its tactics in regard to European rearmament, the present Governments of France and Britain have been the major handicaps in the inclusion of Spain, Turkey, Greece, and Germany in the defense set-up.

The State Department met the criticism of being too ideological at a time when aggression by Russia may be expected any day by saying that it could do nothing, since Paris and London were irrevocably opposed to further broadening of NATO.

A Cynical View That Doesn't Pay Off

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TOM STEED
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. STEED. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the Oklahoma City (Okla.) Times, of May 10, 1951, is timely because it deals with a subject which is important in the long-range planning for this country. Upstream soil conservation, which has never received proper emphasis because of the stronger pull of funds into the so-called big dams program, must sooner or later be increased if we really accomplish the job we need to do. Also, since so many big dams already have been built, this upstream conservation program becomes more important as it is now needed to lengthen the lifetime of these dams.

The editorial follows:

A CYNICAL VIEW THAT DOESN'T PAY OFF

A considerable number—probably a majority—of the influential citizens of Eufaula oppose the building of the proposed dam near that city. They can't see any percentage in creating what the promoters of the dam call a "silt trap," at the same time putting out of cultivation more than 100,000 acres of their best bottomlands, to begin with, and additional thousands of acres upstream on the Canadian rivers which will be gradually ruined because of the backwater effect of siltation and the flooding of upstream bottomlands. They know that the theory of a sportsmen's paradise on a muddy lake has turned out to be a phony in the Madill-Tishomingo area of Lake Texoma, and will be repeated around Eufaula and McAlester.

The Indian Journal, the Eufaula newspaper, has strenuously opposed the building of the dam in the past, and a few days ago it carried another editorial deploring the bad effects of the proposed project.

However, in concluding the editorial, the newspaper expressed a feeling of despair and cynicism, as follows: "Farming no longer builds big towns, it seems. Prosperity goes to those towns and cities into which the Government pours taxpayers' money, Eufaulans' money, and small towns of this area have seen precious little of it."

This point of view is unfortunate, and should be corrected by a realistic calculation of economic factors.

The soil, over a period of two or three decades and from there on into the future, is the basic resource and economic foundation of all towns and cities, even New York. Ultimately no city can grow if the tributary soil is unproductive. The small town feels the lack of good soil first, but ultimately all communities suffer. Otherwise you might see big cities in the Idaho deserts.

Madill and Tishomingo people were highly elated when the Texoma project was promoted, on the theory that the vacationists and fishermen would make them prosperous. They have been sadly disillusioned. In addition to the failure of the sportsmen's paradise, they now keenly feel the disappearance of the rich bottom lands which used to pour farm produce into their markets.

The spending of Government money for labor, and the priviledge of boarding the labor force during the building of a big dam is like a shot in the arm. It creates a temporary illusion of prosperity, but when the dam is finished, the workers pick up their sacks of potatoes and go away, and the local businessmen find that concrete and steel walls don't buy automobiles, groceries, or overalls. Then it is realized that the most precious resource of all—the soil—has been badly reduced in area, and there is nothing to take its place. There's no guesswork or theory about it—the proposition is as plain as ABC.

No city or town in Oklahoma can afford to labor under the delusion that it can live without a background and tributary territory of good farmland. Any number of instances can be shown to prove that when the soil goes, everything goes. Even the industrialized cities can't take it, for eventually they have to sell their products to other communities that depend more directly on the soil. Shot-in-the-arm prosperity makes pleasant dreams but the hangover is terrible.

The California Eagle, an Old Newspaper With a New Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to include in the RECORD some very interesting comments by Dr. Ralph J. Bunche, as reported by Mr. Bob Ellis in the new California Eagle. Along with the news story, I am including an editorial from the new California Eagle printed in the first edition of the paper following a change of ownership which brought in as publisher a very able leader, Mr. Loren Miller, of Los Angeles. The California Eagle is an old paper which, like the legendary phoenix bird, is commencing a new life. It has a new owner and a changed viewpoint.

The California Eagle is devoted primarily to the interests of our Negro citizens, but the new publisher's conception of the role of a newspaper rises above race or class and encompasses all phases of good citizenship. The editorial, signed by the new publisher, is a wholesome and a refreshing statement of inspiring American ideals. All of us who cherish a truly free and honest American press welcome and wish success to the new California Eagle.

The above-mentioned articles follow:

[From the Los Angeles (Calif.) Eagle of May 3, 1951]

BUNCHE SAYS: "LIMITED WAR SAVES LIVES"—APPEASEMENT ISN'T PEACE, U. N. MEET TOLD

(By Bob Ellis)

"Don't confuse peace with appeasement," Dr. Ralph J. Bunche warned Presidential Adviser W. Averell Harriman and leading Los Angeles citizens Sunday at a dinner for the Nobel prize winner sponsored by the American Association for United Nations.

While newsreel and television cameras filmed Dr. Bunche before a flower-decked table at Romanoff's Restaurant in Beverly Hills, the director, Trusteeship Council of the U. N. continued quietly: "There will be much less misunderstanding about the United Nations if Americans realize the U. N. is in the business of preserving peace—not peace by appeasement but by means of honorable negotiation."

Admitting that there is a growing dislike for the United Nations in America, Dr. Bunche lashed out at the "blind emotional cynics."

"People must understand," he continued, "that while a war is limited there is a chance to stop it and save lives. The U. N. was able to do this in Israel and in Kashmir and we must continue to try to end the war in Korea."

In what was interpreted as a reference to the MacArthur controversy, Dr. Bunche said: "Victory is not needed in war. There is only a need to stop war." * * *

Speaking calmly, with a slight hesitation before his sentences, Dr. Bunche emphasized, "Fewer lives will be lost in a localized or limited war than in an atomic war. People must understand that and not lose their heads."

"It is in the American tradition to seek conciliation. Negotiation is an honorable word. We must all remember that the United Nations is the last hope of peace in our world."

[From the Los Angeles (Calif.) Eagle of May 3, 1951]

HERE'S WHERE WE STAND

The California Eagle has changed hands. Loren Miller has assumed the position of publisher.

Mrs. C. A. Bass no longer has any interest, direct or indirect, in this newspaper; she has no voice in its editorial, news, or advertising policies. Her staff has been entirely replaced.

This change in ownership will result in a sharp break with The Eagle's immediate past and a repudiation of its stand on many issues.

The Eagle will seek to reestablish the proud position it once held as the spokesmen for the Negroes of Los Angeles and of California.

The primary aim of this newspaper will be to print the truth in its news columns. We shall try to report faithfully and completely what Negroes are doing, what they are thinking, and what is happening to them, and about them.

Out of the belief that realization of democratic ideals offers the fairest promise for complete equality for all citizens in all phases of American life we shall pursue an editorial policy designed to assist in preserving and extending the democratic way of life.

We shall support legislation—Federal, State, and local—which is aimed at wiping our racial inequalities in every aspect of our national life. That means we favor FEPC on Federal, State, and local levels, anti-lynching legislation, anti-discriminatory laws and ordinances of every kind and the full range of measures comprehended in the President's Civil Rights proposals.

We shall support organizations that have as their purpose the realization of democratic goals through removal of racial barriers in the political and economic affairs of America. That means we shall offer unstinted support to the NAACP, the Urban League, the Women's Political Study Clubs and similar groups.

We shall support such institutions as churches, the Red Cross, the YMCA, the YWCA, and kindred groups, which aim at the improvement of the general lot of all citizens.

We shall support Negro business institutions, and all other business or industrial organizations that follow the ideally American practice of offering employment and advancement on the job without reference to race, or religion, or color.

We shall support labor unions out of the belief that Negroes, the preponderant number of whom are workingmen and workingwomen, cannot secure adequate wages and decent working conditions unless they are organized into unions of their own choice.

We shall support candidates for public office whose platforms and records indicate support of the objectives which we endorse.

It is only fair to add that our support of the democratic system will not blind us to its shortcomings nor deter us from seeking its improvement. By the same token, we shall not spare criticism of individuals or organizations when their conduct merits it.

The affirmative program we have just outlined carries with it a pledge of opposition to opponents of our aims.

We shall oppose communism, and oppose it vigorously and with every means in our power, because its triumph would mean the destruction of the democratic system to which we are committed. That means that we shall oppose Communists and their stooges, Negro and white, in their attempts to win converts to their cause, or win political office, or assume leadership in civic and community organizations.

We shall oppose racial discrimination and its handmaiden, racial segregation, and all individuals and organizations which countenance or connive at discrimination or segregation.

Negroes have many problems other than those growing out of their racial status. Like other Americans they are, or should be, concerned with international relations, with adequacy of national defense, with problems of local government, and with social reforms of a general nature.

Laying aside details for the moment, we shall generally support the United Nations, extension of social security, adequate care for the aged, a housing program to afford decent shelter for all, and a military policy based on the realities on the world situation. We shall insist on preservation of the civil liberties guaranteed in the Constitution.

In municipal affairs we shall support every move for better transportation, better schools, and a generally higher level of police protection. We shall support measures to curb juvenile delinquency, and public health programs designed to lower death rates and stay the ravages of disease.

It is plain enough that this ambitious program cannot be realized without the support of the people of this community.

We must have readers.

We must have advertisers—and we can keep advertisers only if our readers respond to their advertisements.

We must have the support of those institutions, organizations, and individuals to whom we have made this pledge of support.

This editorial, then, is both a statement and an appeal.

It is a frank revelation of our aims.

It is just as frank an appeal for popular support.

We have undertaken this venture out of a profound belief that Los Angeles deserves a better newspaper than it has had for the past 2 years. We want to give you the kind of a newspaper that Los Angeles deserves.

If you agree that this city does deserve a better newspaper and that our program as outlined here promises such a newspaper, we urge you to help us realize that goal—by subscribing to the Eagle or by buying it at your nearest newsstand, and by telling your friends about us.

If you're in business we want your advertising, and if you're not you can help us by patronizing those who do advertise in the Eagle and by requesting the firms with which you do business to advertise with us.

We want your frank criticism, too.

We want you to tell us about your problems and what you think we can, or ought to do about them.

Out of the cooperation between the staff, and you as readers, we can together fashion a newspaper that will hasten that good day when the democratic system fulfills its promise of equality for all men.

LORENZ MILLER.

Tribute to Finnish Maritime Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER FERGUSON

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me paying tribute to the Finnish maritime industry, and to the sons of Finland, whose integrity of character makes them such outstanding citizens of our country, and of my State of Michigan in particular.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRIBUTE TO FINNISH MARITIME INDUSTRY

Recently I was privileged to be among those invited to the harbor in Alexandria, Va., to attend a reception for a shiny new 414-foot ocean-going motorship, the Finntrader, here on its maiden voyage from the Republic of Finland. It is a modern, streamlined freighter, with superbly fine quarters for 12 passengers, and capacity for 6,000 tons of cargo. It is owned by Finnlines, Ltd., a subsidiary of Enso-Gutzeit, the largest producer of pulp paper and wallboard in Finland.

It wasn't so many years ago that Finland got started as an independent Nation, following the First World War when it divorced itself from the crumbling empire of the czars. It set up a constitutional government and remains today the only one of the many postwar governments of that day to survive in its original form. All the others have disappeared or are disguised as free units under Communist totalitarianism.

We of America are proud of Finland. We are proud of her fealty to democratic principles; we are proud of her bravery under fire; we are proud of her integrity and honesty in meeting her obligations. It was a worth-while act on the part of the United States to pass the bill, of which I had the honor to be a cosponsor, which diverted future debt payments by Finland on her First World War obligations to the education of students and the interchange of scientific and technical information. That program is proceeding satisfactorily, and the future will show the true and lasting value of it.

To return to this new evidence of Finnish enterprise, the Finntrader: It is an eye-filling sight. It rides well, says the master, Capt. Einar Marander. "Our maiden voyage was unique because it was uneventful," the captain explained. He said the ship rode so well that no one got seasick, even those who had never been at sea before.

The ship was launched early this year in Holland, where she was built according to Finnish plans. Finntrader was christened by Mrs. Greta Skogster Lehtinen, wife of William Lehtinen, managing director of Enzo-Gutzeit. Mrs. Lehtinen, a noted designer of textiles, planned the entire decorative scheme of the interior of the vessel. Her picture hangs proudly in the main saloon.

The plans of the company, I am told, are to construct three more similar ships. Orders for two have already been placed with Dutch shipyards. The provisional names of the two will be Finnmerchant and Finnvoyager. These new units in an expanding Finnish merchant marine bring to light the brilliant history of the Finns in maritime annals.

For years, Finnish sailing ships were the glory of the seas. Used in the wheat trade primarily, they were trim and speedy and plied the seven seas before the winds. Some of the greatest sea legends revolve around the tales of these Finnish windjammers.

In the 1850's and 1860's, our own Pacific coast records show that five out of every seven sailing masters in the booming gold-rush trade were Finns. San Francisco named a street for them. The maritime history of the Pacific would not be complete unless we mentioned the fact that two Finnish admirals, in the Russian service, were governors of what is now Alaska in the days before we purchased that territory from the Russians. Their headquarters were at Sitka. One was Admiral Adolf Etholin, called the "builder of Alaska," and the other was Admiral Johan Humpus Furuhjelm. Etholin served in the 1840's and Furuhjelm in the early 1860's.

Now, with Finland as an independent republic, the maritime capabilities begin to show themselves again, and Finland's expanding commerce makes a new start after the disasters of two wars with Russia. Commerce over the seven seas, says President Lehtinen, will be their motto.

We, of Michigan, are proud of the Finnish traditions of personal honesty, industry, and forthrightness, which has made them such valuable settlers in our own countryside and such good American citizens.

Finland, too, can be proud of the record these Finns have made in the New World, participating in and helping maintain our American institutions.

Necessary Bills

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM STEED

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. STEED. Mr. Speaker, sooner or later Congress must face the growing demand that some action be taken to tighten controls on certain of our relief programs, and one of these is the proposition that persons receiving certain public assistance be removed from the protection of secrecy.

The following editorial from the Tusla (Okla.) Daily World points up a lot of public thinking these days on this subject and indicates a strong interest in legislation now pending before the Congress. I present this editorial here because I feel it contains merit:

Two highly controversial bills, which have been introduced in Congress, would amend the Social Security Act to permit States to make welfare department records a matter of public information. The Federal Government pays approximately one-half of the money for old-age assistance, aid to the blind, aid to dependent children and general assistance. For States to receive these grants, observance of the Government's order keeping assistance records confidential is compulsory. Several States, however, are considering legislation to publicize the relief rolls. It will require an act of Congress to change the protective phrase of the Social Security Act. Opponents of the proposed legislation contend the indiscriminate publishing of welfare information would be humiliating to the majority of worthy welfare recipients. Supporters of the legislation seem to have the stronger argument. They rightly contend if this information is made public it will help to eliminate the many chiselers and improve the efficiency of State welfare departments. Publicizing the relief rolls would prove extremely beneficial.

German War Criminals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter dated May 1, 1951, addressed by Frederick C. McKee, chairman of the Committee on National Affairs, to the editor of the Christian Science Monitor, and published under the heading "Nuremberg commutations." The letter deals with commutations of the sentences of 79 German war criminals.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NUREMBERG COMMUTATIONS—WAR CRIMINALS

To the Christian Science Monitor:

The recent commutation by High Commissioner McCloy of the sentences of 79 German war criminals convicted of heinous crimes against humanity is alarming. Among the criminals, of whom 21 now escape the death sentence and 34 are set free, are Nazi officials who planned and executed Hitler's murder program, who directed a campaign of wholesale slaughter in the occupied areas, and who committed atrocities in the concentration camps. These sentences had previously been confirmed by General Clay upon the advice of counsel of impeccable integrity and competence.

The Advisory Board on Clemency for War Criminals, appointed by Mr. McCloy, heard only the lawyers representing the convicted criminals, representatives of the prosecution not being allowed to participate. In recommending the reduction of sentences they nevertheless pointed out that they were not entitled to grant relief beyond that warranted by mitigating circumstances and fair consideration of individual situations. They further stated that clemency may be an encouraging example, but a mistaken tenderness toward the perpetrators of mass murder would be a mockery. It would undo what Nuremberg has accomplished if in the end we were guided entirely by considerations of sympathy or generosity. Executive clemency does not exist to that end.

But the fact is that these commutations are a mistaken tenderness toward the perpetrators of mass murder, constitute a mockery of what Nuremberg has accomplished, and are dangerous for the following reasons:

1. They tend to throw into doubt the entire basis, procedure, and judgments of the trials conducted by the United States military tribunals at Nuremberg. Although both Mr. McCloy and the members of his clemency board defend the Nuremberg trials, it would have been more appropriate to sustain the results of the trials by confirming rather than by upsetting the verdicts. In granting the commutations expediency appears to have been a factor in seeking the favor of those elements in Germany whose devotion to democracy is suspect.

2. At a time when it is contemplated that Germany be granted greater independence, to reduce the sentences of the perpetrators of inhumanities, many of whom are now able to return to public life, hardly encourages the democratic elements in Germany.

3. The commutation of the sentences of Nazi war criminals has alarmed our allies among the democratic nations of Western Europe and among the believers in democracy in the countries behind the iron curtain.

4. If these commutations were intended to placate German opinion in the effort to make Western Germany a bulwark against the very real threat of Soviet aggression, such a policy of expediency does not accomplish its purpose and leads to other evils. Reports already indicate that the Germans are not satisfied with the extent of the commutations and are urging the release of all war criminals. The United States cannot safely copy the Russian technique of currying favor with former Nazi leaders, for these criminals are basically totalitarians, and hence more sympathetic to the totalitarian east than the democratic west.

Chairman, Committee on National Affairs.

Attitude of British Toward America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The British," written by Bruce Barton and published in the Palm Beach (Fla.) Post-Times of April 15, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BRITISH

(By Bruce Barton)

Dr. George Riley, the famous osteopath, was once invited to meet George Bernard Shaw, a devotee of osteopathy.

They had hardly shaken hands before Shaw burst into bitter vituperation of America.

Dr. Riley stood it for about 3 minutes and then cried out: "Stop that. You ought to be ashamed of yourself. How dare you, a man whose food and clothes and roof-tree are principally paid for by the money of American book buyers and playgoers, how dare you say such things about a country and a people of which you are so absymally ignorant. I never knew such impudence."

Shaw shut his mouth. A look of amazement came into his eyes, but with a glint of admiration. He told a friend afterward: "That man Riley is one of the most interesting people I ever met."

Too many British authors and lecturers have accepted our hospitality—often lavish and effusive to the point of servility—taken their winnings and gone back home to write and talk scurvily about us.

Too many of the British people as a whole, jealous of our prosperity, are unfriendly at heart. For years they sold us the idea that, except for the protection of their fleet, we would have been helpless. But they never said from whom their fleet was protecting us; and in our Civil War, when our need of help was most desperate, their seapower, instead of helping us, tried to destroy our merchant marine.

Yet I admire the British. They write the English language better than we—we have no Shakespeare, no Milton. Their administration of justice is swifter, cheaper, and more dignified. In the conduct of foreign affairs they are so much smarter that it just isn't funny.

Indeed, one of my distinguished lawyer friends, a long-time subscriber to the London Spectator, tells me that by reading it he has been able to predict 6 months in advance just what our State Department would do—the British loan, the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, etc.

Lately, Russia has been making our foreign policy. When she lets out a blast, we promptly blast her back. When she nudges the North Koreans into starting a rumpus, we obligingly reply with our whole Army and Heaven only knows how many billions of dollars, while she loses not one soldier or one ruble.

"Dancing to Russia's fiddle is getting us nowhere. We might better go back to letting the British manage us. They know their way around, especially in the Orient, where they operated for more than 150 years at a handsome profit.

"Many of us have another idea—that we ought to have our own American foreign policy. But since, to make any sense, this would have to based on America first, it seems to be out. Every other nation can be for itself first. But not the United States. The mere suggestion is branded 'un-American'."

The Beef Price Roll-Back

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial referring to the beef price roll-back, which appeared in the St. Paul Pioneer Press on May 12, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Speaking to his press conference, President Truman said that the beef price roll-back will be enforced. He dismissed the protests of the spokesmen of the livestock industry with the observation that they are like all others who scream when their toes are stepped on. He said that if there is to be a beginning with controls it might as well be right there.

Would that the issues raised by the livestock industry could be put aside so simply. President Truman begs the question by avoiding the issue. The livestock people do not, of course, like to be singled out for this kind of treatment, but the essence of what they are saying is that this attempt to roll back the price of one meat commodity, will not have the result for which the administration hopes.

Beef prices are high because there is money enough in the hands of consumers to buy beef. Unless measures are taken that reduce the pressure of demand, the result of the roll-back will be either to drive the livestock industry into production of other meats, or to divert a large part of our beef production into black market channels.

The consequence of the first result will be that there is less beef, and the administration will be compelled to take the next step, which is rationing, if there is to be a fair distribution of the available supply among all who want it.

The consequence of the second possible result will be that beef prices will remain high, and the existing marketing, processing and distribution system will be disrupted, with vast waste of the various secondary food and byproducts that are produced by the highly developed factory methods of our great packing plants. This is to make no mention of the fact that the highly refined system of Government inspection and grading goes out of the window when the processing of meat animals is diverted from the regular channels into fly-by-night local slaughterhouses in every nook and cranny of the livestock country.

Despite Mr. Truman's bland confidence that the roll-black can be enforced, this second result is the one that is likely to be predominant, though there will also be a considerable contraction in the production, the feeding and finishing of cattle. The Government did not succeed in enforcement during the war and it is in a weaker position for the job today than it was then.

It does small good to denounce some people for going into black market production and slaughtering and others for patronizing such sources of supply, though the denunciation is deserved. Neither does it contribute anything to solution of this problem to say that it is confession of national moral delinquency to point out the probability of a breakdown in enforcement of such price controls, if they stand alone.

The whole point of the protest of the livestock industry is that a beef price roll-back in the absence of basic measures to remove the causes of inflation through drastic taxation, harsh commercial credit control and rigid wage controls, will not work. Treating a symptom, and one isolated symptom at that, leaving a thousand other avenues for excess buying power to take, is doomed to failure.

The St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "The Seaway and the Waterway," appearing in the Chicago Tribune for May 3, 1951, relating to the effect of the St. Lawrence seaway on the Chicago plans for developing traffic on the Illinois seaway. It is interesting to note that this editorial raises exactly the same points regarding our sovereignty over Lake Michigan as those to which I first called attention in my statement to the House Committee on Public Works on April 12 of this year, which was reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 18.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SEAWAY AND THE WATERWAY

The Buick Motor Division of General Motors Corp. has announced plans to build a multimillion-dollar plant for the assembly of jet aircraft engines near Willow Springs. The plant will receive its fuel, both coal and oil, by barge on the Chicago sanitary and ship canal.

On the banks of the same canal two huge power plants are under construction. One is the Commonwealth Edison Co.'s $70,000,000 Ridgeland generating station, already in partial operation. The other is the Will County power plant of the Public Service Co. of Northern Illinois near Lemont. These plants, too, will receive their fuel by water.

Industry thus is recognizing the importance of the Illinois waterway, although few persons in Washington seem to know or care that it exists. Administration leaders instead are yammering for the billion-dollar St. Lawrence seaway project, and Secretary of State Acheson, in his testimony for the project, referred to the objectionable diversion of Lake Michigan water into the canal that makes the Illinois waterway possible. Acheson also remarked that the diversion issue was settled by the 1930 Supreme Court decision.

This is what might be expected from Truman's Secretary of State. He would like to see Lake Michigan made an international body of water, even though the lake lies wholly within the United States. Trustees of the Chicago Sanitary District properly retorted that the diversion issue is far from being settled, that it can be reopened at any time by Congress, and that it ought to be reopened.

Chicago has met all the requirements of the 1930 Supreme Court decision, spending many millions of dollars on sewage-treatment works. It is now plain that the diversion limit set by the Court is insufficient for the drainage cana and waterway and that an increase would have negligible effects on water levels in the Great Lakes.

The Lakes-to-Gulf waterway must be protected. One way to do so is to insist that the agreement between the United States and Canada for construction of the St. Lawrence seaway specify that adequate diversion of water from Lake Michigan be guaranteed in perpetuity for operation of the Lake-to-Gulf system.

With such a provision in the agreement, the argument that the seaway project is essential to the national defense would have more validity.

Planning Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. MARTIN Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter dated May 10, 1951, addressed by Charles Scott Williams to the editor of the Williamsport (Pa.) Sun, discussing the results of planning on United States foreign policy.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 10, 1951.

To the EDITOR, WILLIAMSPORT SUN,
Williamsport, Pa.

DEAR SIR: Although General MacArthur has retarded some of the policies of General Marshall and the State Department planners, it is imperative that our Nation receive a change of blood, inspiring a change of thought, with an injection of character.

This is the only way we can be successful in abolishing war through world government.

Since these planners have been in power—Russia was recognized by them in the thirties—among other things the following has happened:

1. The Russian Communists have taken over Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, Bessarabia, Manchuria, Poland, Bulgaria, Hungary, Austria, Rumania, part of Germany, part of Finland, Czechoslovakia, and China. We raised no voice of protest, and as to Poland and Manchuria, we cooperated.

2. Our soldiers were halted 15 miles from Berlin to allow the Russians to capture this important city, and our planners scoffed at Churchill's idea of attacking through the Balkans, this would have allowed our Armies to occupy the Balkans.

3. Berlin was divided into zones, with the consent of General Marshall, who was on the scene at that time, and we now have to travel through Russian territory to go to the American zone of Berlin. Insulted, we had to use an airlift to feed our Berlin Germans.

4. We withdrew all support from our friend, Kai-shek, allowed the Communist Chinese, with the aid of Russia, to absorb China. Our General Marshall attempted to get Kai-shek to form a coalition government with the Communists, and when Kai-shek refused to do this, and refused to hand over Manchuria, these State Department planners were angered. MacArthur has said that you can no more mix the Communists and Nationalists, than mix oil and water. Our planners should have known this, as the Russian Communists did not even allow our planes to land on their soil when they were our allies.

5. Russia was given an important part in the Japanese peace treaty, and was handed control of Manchuria, despite the fact that the European war was finished at that time and an early end to the Japanese war was expected. Not a Russian shot was heard in the Japanese war.

6. Our planners put us into Korea, withdrew us, returned us, and now, we, and the South Koreans, representing the United Nations, have to furnish 85 percent of the troops. The other United Nations deal with the enemy.

7. These planners have us involved in a major war within 5 years of World War II, in which we Americans have had casualties as great as our casualties in the first year of World War II; this Korean war has already lasted longer than the time it took the Americans and their allies to defeat the Germans after we landed in Normandy.

8. Our country has spent billions of our national wealth in assisting countries, who now, because of trade, or otherwise, write a set of rules for the Korean war in which we are not allowed to bomb bases of aggressors, nor blockade the enemy. Our Lycoming County has had more casualties in this war than the casualties of many of our allies.

9. Our planners were so negligent that the Russians were allowed to steal the atom bomb and other secrets of the Nation; Communist sympathizers have been allowed in high places.

We are now in worse shape than when these planners began. Perhaps some of them wanted it this way.

Our everlasting thanks must go to General MacArthur. Since he centralized the thoughts of the people on our plight, the following has happened:

1. The British are tightening control of their ports with respect to war material and aid to Chinese Communists.

2. Our Government has publicly declared that Formosa will not be turned over to the Communists, and that America will object to the seating of Chinese Communists in the world government.

3. Military assistance is being sent to Formosa.

4. An airfield near the Manchurian border has been bombed.

5. The Russians have withheld aid to the Chinese Communists in their latest aggression.

It is important that we keep this matter above a party basis. However, no longer can those garbed in the cloak of the administration's past thinking say "This is our course" and expect our representatives, or the people, to blindly follow. Our way of life is based on the freedom of the individual and the dignity of man. It is now time for us to step forward with those who believe in our way of life. In so doing, we cannot besmirch our principles, nor can we think of our own safety while our boys are dying in Korea.

Yours sincerely,

CHARLES SCOTT WILLIAMS.

Who Took the Record at Wake Island?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEO E. ALLEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include an article from the Chicago Tribune under date of May 7:

WHO TOOK THE RECORD AT WAKE ISLAND?

CHICAGO, May 4, 1951.

You can take it from a court reporter of 32 years' experience, and some standing, that the young woman who says she took down the MacArthur-Truman meeting at Wake Island is just plain lying

In the first place, no court reporter worth the name would take on such a task as trying to report the verbatim conversations of a flock of men seated in another room, and every court reporter in the United States with 2 years' experience will say the same, and laugh.

In the second place, the most experienced court reporter in the world just wouldn't know who was saying what, even if he could hear what was being said from that distance.

In the third place, it is a well known fact among court reporters that they must be as close as possible to the people doing the talking, and most certainly must have the ability to see the person talking to know whose name to put before a given remark. A distance of 20 feet from any fast talker renders his speech so difficult that an experienced court reporter, if he knew in advance he would be confronted with such a task, would refuse the job, even if he were paid the going rate in Chicago.

How, then, can any one say that a strip of a girl, beautiful, too, just picked up her pencil, luckily had a pad of penciled paper, had no assignment to do the job, is not a verbatim reporter (or she would be a stenographer, believe me), and just out of the sheer love of writing shorthand 100 words a minute beyond her speed, took on a reporting task that no seasoned court reporter in the United States would assume under like circumstances?

Nuts, says every court reporter in America—2,000 of them. And nuts, says every office stenographer in America—100,000 of them. All of us, pros and amateurs alike, would run from the job. But she just thought it seemed the natural thing to do. Say, "stenos" of America, was that the human thing to do?

Who had her lie like that?

A. E. CARVER.

CHICAGO, May 4, 1951.

The fact that a State Department employee took notes, unknown to General MacArthur, at the Wake Island conference in October, proves they were attempting to find some excuse at that time to get rid of him.

The stenographer did not just happen to be there, nor just happen to take notes. They planned it that way.

PATRIOTIC AMERICAN.

A Couple of Straws in the Wind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Anne O'Hare McCormick from the New York Times of May 9, 1951:

ABROAD—A COUPLE OF STRAWS IN THE WIND

(By Anne O'Hare McCormick)

Last week when the United States presented to the United Nations a resolution calling for an arms embargo on Communist China the proposal had a cold and critical reception from Great Britain, Australia, and other nations opposed from the first to applying sanctions to the aggressor in the Korean war. These nations were reluctant even to call the Peiping government an aggressor, and their reluctance, paradoxically, was based on the same reasons that impelled the administration to turn down General MacArthur's recommendations to bomb the Chinese bases in Manchuria. They feared it might extend the war and would certainly slam the door on any hope of ending it by negotiations.

Whether or not this hope has been abandoned, the attitude of these Powers has changed in the last few days. Reports from the United Nations indicate that opposition to the resolution has evaporated and that it will probably be passed by the Additional Measures Committee and submitted next week to the General Assembly.

BRITISH TRADE WITH CHINA

At the same time Sir Hartley Shawcross, president of the British Board of Trade, replied to questions in the House of Commons on General MacArthur's charges that great quantities of war materials have been passing into Communist China through Hong Kong. Sir Hartley admitted that both Britain's and Hong Kong's trade with China increased in the first quarter of 1951. He explained, however, that goods of direct or indirect military importance were "totally prohibited," and added that in view of the failure of the good offices committee of the U. N. to obtain a settlement in Korea plans for further action were being discussed with the United Nations, the United States, and the colonial governments that export rubber and other raw materials to China.

There is no question that cutting off commerce with China would be a severe blow to British trade and would endanger the life of Hong Kong as a British colony. But "loyalty to the United Nations must be the keystone of our policy," comments the London News-Chronicle. "If the United Nations should decide to impose economic sanctions on China," says the London Times, "or if, as a result of further negotiations, the British Government and people were finally convinced that no alternative policy was possible, this country would take every step to render the blockade as effective as such a blockade could ever be."

This is a straw in a veering wind. Another straw is the swing toward the American point of view regarding negotiations with Moscow that has developed out of the interminable argument with Mr. Gromyko in Paris. Our reservations on the value of a foreign ministers conference before the west is militarily stronger in relation to the Soviet Union irritated the British and the French. They were convinced that the Russians wished to talk and that our open doubts about the efficacy of "another try" at this time blocked a possible approach to a settlement. We went along, and the American deputy in Paris has cooperated fully in the effort to open the way; he has come up with dozens of suggestions to end the deadlock and made no move to break up the meeting. After 10 wasted weeks, it is the French and the British who are discouraged and talk of adjournment.

American foreign policy has been under such a barrage of criticism at home and abroad that it is pleasant to perceive signs that our allies are edging toward our side in areas where their misgivings about our policy are greatest. We are listening these days to something new in history—a great power arguing with itself, in a loud and solemn voice, about what it will do or will not do in a crisis that involves the future of the world. In the reverberating thunders of this extraordinary controversy, it is just possible that other nations as well as ourselves are learning to understand better the issues and the risks that lie before us all. When the powers that opposed it change their minds about embargoing arms to China, when the British and the French are forced by the Soviet tactics in Paris to agree that Russia is not ready to negotiate any question, it means that time and events have worked to vindicate our policy and bring our allies nearer to our estimate of the world situation.

A COORDINATION OF POLICY

This shift of position is not big enough to close the gap between opposing views. Nor is it altogether the effect of the negative attitude of Moscow and Peiping toward any form of negotiation. The British have been assured by Charles E. Wilson that the United States does not intend to hog all the raw materials essential to keep war and peace production on something like an even keel. Furthermore, they are beginning to be as worried as we are by the steady deterioration of Anglo-American relations.

The continental nations, on their side, are increasingly concerned over the strain between Britain and the United States. The British will have no part either in the Schuman plan or the project for a European federation. Hence, Dr. Stikker, Chairman of the Council of Europe's Committee of Ministers, begins to talk of a European-Atlantic Union as a way of making Britain the link in a bicontinental alliance. What the signs add up to is that Western Europe is beginning to realize that the Atlantic alliance has to prove itself on both sides of the ocean. To coordinate a multinational policy is as important to its strength as to coordinate a multinational army.

Changing Pattern

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. McCARTHY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post for May 14, 1951:

CHANGING PATTERN

The "mores of the community" which have so frequently been made a pretext for the continuance of racial segregation are not immutable. They are undergoing an accelerating change. But change takes place only under the impetus of leadership; it takes place when community leaders have the resolution and intelligence required to break new ground—the kind of resolution and intelligence shown the other day by members of the District Medical Society. The society voted to admit qualified Negro physicians to membership. The action deserves, we think, community commendation.

The exclusion of Negroes from the Medical Society in years past has been a reflection of prejudice where it should be least tolerated—that is, among scientists. And of course the example set by the doctors, precisely because they are so highly respected, has been followed in less enlightened quarters. The change of direction they have now initiated will exercise, we are confident, a powerful influence toward the development of a healthier, more rational community pattern. We hope the doctors will follow it up by efforts to enlarge the meager opportunities for Negro medical students to receive training in local medical schools and hospitals—and so to become qualified for membership in the Medical Society.

Address of Hon. Page Belcher, of Oklahoma

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. CARROLL REECE
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech by Hon. PAGE BELCHER, of Oklahoma, to the Republican National Committee in Tulsa, Okla., May 11, 1951:

I want to join with my colleague, George Schwabe, our national committeeman, Bailie Vinson, and His Honor, George A. Stoner, in welcoming all of you folks to our great State of Oklahoma. We hope and trust that your stay here will be pleasant as well as profitable.

It is more or less a time-honored custom for speakers to open a speech with a humorous story. I am sorry, but in the very limited time that I have at my disposal I cannot indulge in humor. In addition to that, with America facing this terrible crisis, I feel too deadly serious to want to tell a funny story if I knew one. In my opinion, America is facing one of the gravest crises that have confronted this Nation in all of its history. The decisions that are made within the next few months may well determine not only the future of our Nation but the future of the world as well.

That the people of America are fully aware of the seriousness of the situation is demonstrated, I think, by the fact that 2,000,000 communications reached the Members of Congress in the first 72 hours after the dismissal of General MacArthur. Much as the American people resented the dismissal of General MacArthur, I think it was but the final straw that caused a blow-off of steam that had been generating in their minds for many months. As many people wrote to me, "This is the final blunder;" "This is the straw that broke the camel's back;" "I cannot keep still any longer." The American people were already aroused over deep freezes, mink coats, collusions between gangsters and public officials, deficit financing, unnecessary Government expense, lack of integrity in Government, as well as many other things that had tried their patience. Their tempers were aroused.

There are good people in this country who feel that in the interest of unity everyone should submerge his own convictions, and, right or wrong, line up behind the commander in chief. Unity is a great thing, but unity behind the wrong cause has caused the destruction of more nations than any other one thing in the world. There was unity behind Hitler—there was unity behind Mussolini—apparently there is unity behind Stalin. If the signers of the Declaration of Independence had believed more in unity than in the strong convictions which they had that freedom was worth dying for, we would now have Clement Attlee as prime minister, and we would be a part of the British empire. God save the day that we have unity in this country behind an administration that is more interested in the preservation of England's foreign trade with the Chinese Communists than in the safety of the boys in Korea or the preservation of America. If that constitutes unity, may God give me none of it.

Are our boys dying for a cause, or are they dying to protect British commerce with the Communists in order that the Labor Government may continue to buy elections with socialized medicine and Government handouts? Even the common people of Great Britain are getting tired of their Socialist government, and the Labor Party is just hanging on by the skin of its teeth. I heard one man say he was getting tired of hearing the Republicans complain that our allies are doing nothing. I told him the statement that our allies are doing nothing is wrong. Great Britain sold $40,000,000 worth of war materials to the Chinese Communists in 1 month. During a 9-month period in 1950, there were 120,000 tons of rubber sent to Red China. You surely would not say that Great Britain was doing nothing.

The people of America, in my opinion, are crying for courageous leadership. They want a political party with a purpose. They are willing to follow a leadership with ideals, courage, and integrity. I pray that in the interest of saving America the Republican Party will give to the people of this Nation that kind of courage and leadership. The Republican Party has the greatest opportunity in all of its history, not only to win a great victory in 1952 but to be the instrumentality through which the greatest Government ever conceived by the mind of man may be preserved for posterity and the world saved from communism. In my opinion, the Republican Party can win a great victory in 1952 if we as a party are worthy of being entrusted with the future of this country.

The American people want the truth. The American people can stand the truth. The Fair Deal way of winning votes has been with promises. The people don't want promises—they want facts. One of the most peculiar things about the great backing MacArthur has received is that he has promised nothing. He doesn't ask to lead us to a promised land. He gives no assurance of peace, even less of prosperity. He does not promise good prices, full employment, or security. He merely says that we are in a desperate predicament, and people go wild with excitement and cheering.

This is a contrast to the current standards of winning elections, and the Fair Dealers are bewildered. Washington, at Valley Forge, could inspire his ragged soldiers to even greater sacrifice. Lincoln could face up nobly to disaster. Churchill could call for blood, sweat, and tears. The people following this leadership were fighting for ideals, not Government hand-outs or RFC loans.

Throughout all history great waves of moral regeneration come from the common people. I hope and pray that the leadership of our great party may catch the inspiration and offer the kind of leadership the people hunger for. I hope we shall quit trying to out-promise the Truman administration and will offer the American people honesty in government, sincerity of purpose, and an adherence to Christian principles. May God give us the strength and the courage to provide the leadership which will save this Nation in its darkest hour, to lead it on to greater heights, and to preserve the last and best hope for all of humanity.

Address of Dr. Umphrey Lee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. RICHARD BOLLING

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, May 2, Dr. Umphrey Lee, president of Southern Methodist University, of Dallas, Tex., delivered a thoughtful and significant address at the annual dinner of the United States Chamber of Commerce. Dr. Lee's speech, which follows, goes to the heart of some of the most serious problems this country faces:

The subject of this meeting has to do with our freedom, and no more timely topic could be discussed. You will not think me irreverent or merely facetious if I begin by quoting an old nursery rhyme.

"Little Jack Horner sat in a corner
Eating his Christmas pie;
He put in his thumb and pulled out a plum
And said, "What a smart boy am I."

I do not quote this to criticize young Mr. Horner's production methods, although some might think his extraction process a little crude. The point I would like to make is that he missed the essential fact of his situation.

What young Horner thought was important was, of course, his own action in taking the plums out of the pie. It seems not to have occurred to him that the really important thing was that he had a pie that had plums in it. Literally, he had been handed the plums on some kind of a platter.

I mention this only as an illustration of what I want to say to you. The greatest treasures of this our land are those which this generation did not invent, did not procure and some of which we have not even been able to preserve. If we can stop admiring the ingenuity with which we have been availing ourselves of these treasures long enough to ask ourselves where they came from and how we are going to keep them, we may perhaps do ourselves and our posterity much good. I am not competent to speak to you about the natural resources of this country which have made our material wealth, but I do want to say something to you about some of the spiritual treasures for whose existence we are no more responsible than we are for the coal and the iron and the oil.

One of the greatest of our spiritual legacies is this freedom you have been talking about. It is somewhat disconcerting to look back and see how freedom has developed with us.

The people who came to this country in its founding days were people who wanted freedom, and they wanted freedom because they had had something else. They knew what it was to live under governments which regulated the details of a man's life, which decided what kind of societies he could belong to, how he would earn his living and how he would conduct himself. When we come to consider how we are going to preserve our American liberties, we must recall that our present generation is a generation that has always known our kind of freedom and therefore does not have as great a concern for it as for other things which this generation has not had. We have not had peace. We have not had security—therefore we long for peace and we long for security. If we had, as our fathers, experienced the tyrannies of an overbearing government long enough and in sufficient severity, we might be as passionate for liberty as they were.

Moreover, our fathers who wanted freedom had a chance to find it and develop it in a big country. It is impossible for us today to appreciate what it meant in the first decades of this country's history for a man to be able to move out of one neighborhood into another, out of one part of the country into another, to leave, if he desired, the civilized settlements and go to the frontier. We know, of course, that a man oftentimes did not better his condition but he thought that he could, and the ability to change his conditions by moving was one of the most important things that happened to people in these early days. By moving to a less settled community a man found himself with less inequalities. Birth meant nothing, wealth meant very little since there was no wealth. The kind of liberty that we have now was developed in a country where a man could get up and leave an old community if he did not like it.

The fact that this was a big country meant also that men did not have to live in constant contact with neighbors who might be irritating or dominating. Men prized their independence and resented interference with their private affairs. As the cowboy poet put it, "I like my fellow man the best when he is scattered some."

Our liberty grew also partly because of what our people did not have. One of the greatest of living British historians, in speaking of eighteenth-century England, said that English liberty in that period owed more to the lack of communications than to Magna Charta. Until the latter part of the nineteenth century communities in the United States were so isolated from each other that of necessity they developed an independent spirit and the habits of freedom. One hundred years ago it would have taken so long for a directive from Washington to have reached Texas that whatever local problems the directive might have aimed to settle would have been disposed of before the message reached its destination, supposing that the Texans would have paid any attention to it when it did arrive. No one for a moment suggests that you can have liberty only in a land with poor communications, but the kind of liberty that we have grew up partly because we did have poor communications. No central government can operate in the fashion of modern governments without modern means of communications. And now that we have these means there will never again be an opportunity for communities to develop a spirit of self-government and habits of our kind of freedom unless they have them to begin with.

This country was also favored by the fact that there were large bodies of water on each side of it. From 1812 until this present hour there has never been an invasion by a foreign power unless, indeed, we are to remember one or two crossings of the border by Villa and his bands. We have had our wars, and terrible wars some of them have been, but for almost the entire nineteenth century we were free to deal with our continental problems without foreign interference. What this meant is that in this country men have had a chance to develop their ideas and to form their habits without having now and again to repel some foreign invader who sought to impose a different way of life.

What I am saying is that our liberties have developed under certain peculiar conditions, conditions which will never happen again in the history of the world unless, indeed, some major catastrophe should wipe us all out and we should have to crawl up again from the caves and the jungles toward civilized life. I believe this to be true, but I also believe that we can keep the essential parts of our freedom if we are wise enough and courageous enough. To do this will be difficult because we are not aided by those fortuitous circumstances which aided our fathers. We no longer live in a land where a man can change his situation by moving from one community to another. One community is much alike another now, and while economic reasons may cause a change, there is not much chance that man in moving from one community to another will move into a land of greater freedom and less inequality. Neither is it probable that men in our time can live in such isolation that they are compelled to work out their own problems without recourse to some central government. Nor will ever again on this earth be a people so remote because of natural barriers that they are secure from invasion by predatory nations.

In short, as we have inherited freedoms for which we did not labor, so also, in a sense, did our fathers. It is true that they wanted freedom and worked mightily for it; but it is also true that they found themselves in a land where freedom was the natural way of life. We, their successors, however, live in a world which seems designed to promote dependence, instead of independence, subservience instead of liberty. If, then, the material conditions under which our kind of freedom naturally flourishes—that is, lots of room, poor communications, isolation—are gone, what can be done to preserve this great inheritance? You have doubtless heard much of this specific remedy, that bit of legislation to be passed or to be repealed. Let me respectfully make some observations on certain fundamentals.

When we talk about freedom we usually talk about individual freedom, the right of John Doe to do this or that. Unquestionably, this is central in our liberties, as the Bill of Rights testifies. But this freedom is impossible in any sense which we Americans would recognize without a further freedom: The freedom of John Doe and of Richard Roe and of any other citizens to join themselves together for worship, for instruction, for pleasure, for profit, or for any other purpose not inconsistent with public safety or public morals. The freedom of association, of societies, or—in the technical sense—the freedom of corporations is an essential and absolutely necessary part of our liberties.

If John Doe wants to join a singing society composed only of red-headed men, that is his privilege. If he wants to worship God by standing on his head every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday from 9 until 10 a. m., that is his privilege, so long as he does not disturb his neighbors. If he wants to join with others to promote the theory that the moon is made of green cheese, that is his business. The right of free association, within the limits necessary for public welfare, is a part of our liberties.

There is no need to pretend that this, or any other liberty is absolute. If ever anyone believed that all restrictions could be removed and some beneficent providence would make all men just and honorable, it would seem that recent congressional investigations would make such faith a little difficult to hold. In simple truth, no one in this world ever did have absolute freedom.

One of the most distinguished lawyers who ever lived in our city was a man of great humor and some eccentricities. In his old age he was one evening playing some game with his cronies when one of the old men said, "Colonel, I expect we had better be getting home." The colonel assured his guests that they need be in no hurry and the game was resumed. A little while later another old man said, "Colonel, I think we had better be going. Your wife won't want you to stay up so late." The colonel drew himself up and said, "Gentlemen, I would have you know that I am Caesar in my household." Just then the colonel's wife looked around the side of the door and said, "Gentlemen, I hope you will stay just as long as you want to stay. The icebox is in the kitchen and you'll not disturb anybody at all. As for Caesar—he is coming to bed."

Nevertheless, an essential part of our freedom is that the associations to which men belong are supposed to be, insofar as is consistent with public safety and public morals, free. Let me quote from a distinguished Englishman who, nearly 40 years ago, wrote a work that ought to be better known in this country:

"You are not merely John Doe or Richard Roe, but as John may probably be a member of the Christian church by baptism, a Doe by family, an Englishman by race; all three are social institutions which have grown into you. In addition to this, you are a member of a school, an alumnus of a college, a sharer in this club, a president of that, and so forth. All these groups and unions have their effect, and limit and develop your life, make you do, or refrain from doing, what otherwise you would not, and insofar prevent you being a free and untrammeled citizen of the state. * * * It is largely to regulate such groups and to insure that they do not outstep the bounds of justice that the coercive force of the state exists. It does not create them; nor is it in many matters in direct and immediate contact with the individual."

The sense of stability and security which you and your family have does not come primarily from the fact that you recognize yourself to be a member of the American people or the American Nation. The sense of stability and security which you have is largely a result of the fact that you belong to a family, to a club, to a church, to a union, to some voluntary organization which, as the Englishman that I quoted said, is regulated by the state but is not created by the state.

Yet we are neglecting the voluntary societies whether they be business or professional, fraternal or religious, because in this country we are concentrating upon two things. In the first place, almost all that we hear about is the preservation of individual rights. In the second place, we are neglecting the preservation of our voluntary associations because we are thinking of only one voluntary association and that is the association which we call a business organization.

I trust you will believe that it is because of my devotion to American freedom, which includes my firm belief that American business ought to have as much freedom as is possible in our kind of world and with our kind of population, that I say to you this thing: Unless we preserve the freedom of other voluntary associations it will be impossible to preserve free economic institutions. There are simply not enough stockholders in this country to preserve business associations unless they are a part of a larger whole. Let me illustrate.

There are three times in a man's life when he is particularly susceptible to influence—when he is young and ambitious, when he is sick and despairing, when he is old and helpless. There was a time when at each one of these periods a man was relieved by the voluntary action of his neighbors. That time has passed. There is hardly a hospital in this country that is not being built partly or entirely by Federal funds. The aged are now the care of the Government. It seems to be entirely possible that in a short while the entire care of man's bodily wants, when he is sick and when he is old, will be in the hands of Government agencies. I sincerely hope that I am wrong about this, and I hope that our dear friends the doctors will improve their public relations sufficiently that they can convince the American public of the great need of retaining a free medical profession. But it is already true that in sickness and in old age American men and women turn to the state. If the doctors lose their fight, then two of man's neediest hours will be taken care of entirely, not by voluntary associations, but by the state.

I said that one of the times when a man is most susceptible to influence is when he is young and ambitious. I am amazed to learn that most businessmen do not seem to know that in higher education in this country exists one of the greatest strongholds of freedom from governmental control. This country, almost from its beginning, has had a dual system of higher education. Alone among the nations of the world, we have had both State-controlled colleges and universities and privately controlled colleges and universities. It has given us the advantages of a State system and the independence of a private system.

This country began with a dual system; it has continued a dual system. And I find to my astonishment that many people are utterly unaware of it. They think, for example, that the only nongovernmental colleges and universities in this country are first, the Ivy League, secondly, a few small denominational colleges which are preserved for old times' sake. The truth is that 48 percent of all college and university students in America are in institutions not governed by the States, and there was never as much as half of the college and university students in State institutions until after World War II with the consequent growth of existing State institutions and the building of new ones.

The control of our colleges and universities by different groups, some of them semipolitical if not altogether political, some of them by voluntary groups of various kinds, has worked for the betterment of our total education. The interplay between the two groups has been for the good of each, and we do not believe that we shall be the better if this difference ceases to exist. All institutions that deal with the public are subject to pressures. The private institution is subject to pressures from the social system of which it is a part. It is inevitable that institutions which depend upon gifts from people who have accumulated capital or who have earned capacity should make those institutions a little less critical than they perhaps should be of the economic system that exists. On the other hand, the State institution inevitably is subjected to political pressures with which the private institution does not have to contend. But the existence of two kinds of institutions, each taking care of approximately half the college population of this country, is healthy. Many of us believe that it is very helpful for half of the college population to be told that if they desire to outstrip their contemporaries in preparation they must pay out of their own or their parents' pockets for that privilege.

But in education also private enterprise is losing out. With higher costs, with the disappearance of great wealth, and consequently of great patrons of education, and with competition from the apparently boundless pockets of State treasuries, the nongovernmental institution has come upon parlous times. And where can the independent educational institution turn?

On all sides the answer is being given: The State. It may be that the sources of income upon which private institutions have depended will dry up, that there will be nowhere to turn except to the Government. I do not need to attribute any sinister motives to anyone when I say that one of the greatest influences for promoting the spirit of freedom and of independence in this country will disappear when half of all college and university graduates are no longer educated at their own expense and at the expense of a liberal business community, in an atmosphere untroubled by political pressures.

What I am trying to say to you is that we cannot preserve the liberty of the individual without preserving also the liberty of associations, of societies, of corporations. And we cannot preserve just one kind of association. If we bring up the next generation in a country in which health, education, charitable relief, and old age are taken care of by the Government, you need not expect that business will be made a grand exception. You cannot be saved by yourselves. If independent education goes under, if the free professions go under, you haven't a chance.

There is something else that ought to be said. Freedom is expensive business: especially does it exact a high moral cost. Let me try to explain what I mean.

Just before World War II, a distinguished Italian historian said that all society is held together either by iron fetters or by silken threads. What he meant was that there are essentially two ways to have order: One is by the police state, the other is by dependence upon the moral character of a people. If a people agree that they will have elections at certain times, and that they will respect the results of those elections, you can have order without guns and bayonets. If the majority of people voluntarily obey the laws, you can have police to take care of the criminal fringe, and you have order. But there is no middle ground. If you have freedom, you must have true men.

This is why such disclosures as we have had in recent months sicken all those who love freedom. But there is something even more sinister in recent disclosures than the corruption of Government. No man ever sold influence in government unless someone bought it. No government official, no army officer ever retired to take a high-salaried place in some business which had benefited or could benefit by his influence unless that business invited him. If we expect to clean out government we must clean out our own house.

I can speak without restraint to you because, of course, no one within these walls has ever been guilty of business immorality. But decent American business must help change some habits in American society as a whole if we are going to do anything about Government immorality. And it cannot be done by laws alone. The moral climate must be changed. Every dishonest man in this country is helping to destroy our freedom. When we can no longer depend upon men's honesty, then we have no recourse but to the police. In other words, when honor is gone there is nothing left but the all-powerful state.

If we make up our mind in this country that the only question is what is legal, and that any morality that demands more than the law requires is foolishness, then there is no need to complain when some government announces the law of the dictators, that is, that the government is the only judge of what is right and wrong. If we make up our mind that we can tolerate liars and thieves in business and ordinary society, we need not complain when we get them in Government. The Government in Washington will rarely be better than the government in the separate States or in the city of Podunk; and the Government in Washington will never be more moral than the American home. There is no use in talking about old-fashioned liberties unless we can restore the old-fashioned virtues on which these liberties were founded and on which alone they can stand.

There is nothing lacking in this country but the knowledge of what we want to preserve and the moral character to preserve it. We are supreme in military power, we are supreme in natural resources, we are great in a free tradition. There ought not to be any question of our future. A little more than 34 years ago this country declared war upon Germany and thereby entered World War I. The next morning after we declared war on Germany, a Canadian officer who had been at the front since the beginning of the struggle spoke to some graduate students in an eastern university. The officer was a Canadian novelist whose books are now forgotten. But none of those who heard him that morning will forget his first words. When he came before this little group of students, the Canadian officer said, "Gentlemen, this morning I do not know when the war will end but I know how it will end." If America can be returned to her primitive integrity in business, in Government, and in social life, we may not still be able to predict the time when the present struggle between freedom and slavery will end, but we can know how that struggle will end.

A Crucial Question

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WINFIELD K. DENTON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following article entitled "A Crucial Question" which appeared in my hometown paper, the Evansville Courier, in Evansville, Ind., on Sunday, May 13, 1951:

A CRUCIAL QUESTION

In one of the most remarkable and momentous hearings in the history of free peoples and their institutions, the differences and the points of agreement between General MacArthur and Secretary of Defense Marshall, representing the administration, have been clarified.

The area of agreement between General MacArthur and General Marshall is large. Both agree that Formosa should be held at all costs, that Red China should never be admitted to the U. N.

General MacArthur did not join the Hoover Fortress America camp. He stands, it is quite clear, on the internationalist side of Senator TAFT. He has rejected the words of those who say we made a mistake in going into Korea last summer. He grants that Europe is a vital defense bastion and it is difficult to see how his internationalist thinking can be reconciled with the Chicago Tribune which sponsors him for President.

It seems clear enough to us that General MacArthur spoke his own mind in all that mass of testimony and opinion he gave a Senate committee. He didn't fit it into anybody's political pattern.

But the major difference—and that is what all the argument simmers down to—remains between General MacArthur and General Marshall. It is over the immediate conduct of the Korean war. MacArthur wants to widen it and try to knock China out and thereby avert a clash with Russia.

Marshall wants to limit the war, so long as we have control of it, and avoid now a world war which he believes would start in China and spread to Europe quickly, in case MacArthur's program were carried out.

A major point in considering the attitudes of the two men, it is quite clear, stems from the jobs the two men have had to do. General MacArthur's job was in the Orient. General Marshall's has been to consider the over-all picture, with all the factors in the defense of America and the free world before him for continuous appraisal. The limited attitude with which General MacArthur approaches the Asiatic conflict was illustrated in his own testimony. When asked what plans he had in mind to defend the United States in the event his theory was wrong and a widening of the war in Korea brought Russia into the fray, he said that was outside his jurisdiction, or words to that effect.

Some idea of the problems of the Joint Chiefs of Staff—men who are obligated to look at all the factors involved in this perilous period—is found in the report of the research and policy committee of the Committee for Economic Development. This is a group of outstanding businessmen who several years ago set up an organization to carry on research about our greatest problems and make nonpartisan and objective surveys and reports to the people. It has won a great measure of respect.

In discussing some of the economic aspects of achieving North Atlantic security it says:

"From the point of view of European security, the main significance of the Korean war lies in the altered assessment of Soviet intentions which it has necessitated. If the Politburo is willing to induce or allow a larger ally, Red China, to become involved as the aggressor in a large-scale fight with the United States and other U. N. forces, despite a real risk of general war, might the Russians not be willing to resort to armed force to gain their objectives in Western Europe? We can only consider that the Soviet willingness to risk a general war in Europe has increased. Accordingly, the United States must ask itself what costs it must bear, and what risks it must assume, in order to deter, and if necessary to oppose, Soviet aggression against Western Europe.

"The United States could perhaps survive the collapse of Western Europe and its delivery into Soviet hands. This proposal, however, is one which no reflective American can contemplate without dread and foreboding. Even in terms of the coldest strategic calculations, the extension of Russian hegemony over Western Europe would give the Russians access to potential military assets of incalculable value—the vast industrial capacity of Western Europe, millions of trained industrial workers possessing a degree of skill unmatched in the Soviet Union, and many of the best scientific and inventive brains in the world. The fall of Western Europe would open up the prospect of Soviet control of European colonies, dependencies, and affiliated territories in other parts of the world. Considering that American reverses in Korea caused people in other countries to doubt the ability of the United States to halt the spread of communism, it requires little imagination to foresee the strength of the wave of the future psychology which would also sweep the world in the event of the Soviet conquest of Western Europe. The Russians would then be in an excellent position of using tactics of psychological warfare and internal subversion in driving to neutralize or dominate many of the countries remaining outside the Soviet orbit, and thus largely to isolate the United States—strategically, diplomatically, ideologically, and economically."

Thus it is easy to see that General Marshall and the Joint Chiefs of Staff feel that the Korean conflict has increased the likelihood of Russia in the near future committing aggression in Western Europe. And they fear that if we get involved too deeply in the Orient, Russia will strike in Western Europe.

This is the crux of the whole argument between General MacArthur and the administration.

MacArthur already has brought about a stiffening of not only our attitude but the attitude of our allies toward Red China. There is going to be an economic blockade—something that should have been invoked last winter when the Red Chinese entered the conflict—against the Chinese.

But the main argument may be water over the dam next week or the week after next. The Russians and the Red Chinese may decide to widen the conflict on their own. A new Chinese drive is in process of preparation and the U. N. forces are expecting the intervention of a real enemy air force for the first time. If that happens, undoubtedly the orders to bomb Chinese air bases in Manchuria will be given.

So far, under the ground rules both sides have been observing, the enemy air power has been a rather negligible factor in the war. We have had undisputed air supremacy, although it has been known right along that the Russians have several hundred modern planes in that part of the world.

As a result of this second great debate the Russians know everything we are thinking about. They know about our fears and our plans. They know we want to limit the struggle in the Orient until we gain enough time to become stronger and to build up a defense force in Western Europe. For the cold-blooded planners of the Kremlin the obvious course of action would be to strike before we are ready, and get us involved as deeply as possible in other places before moving in Europe.

The only real deterrent to immediate action undoubtedly is still the atom bomb superiority of this country. How long that is to be a sufficient deterrent is a crucial question of our times.

Korean War Policies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. HARRISON
OF WYOMING
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. HARRISON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, I wish to protest the continued appeasement which is evident in the administration's policies in the conduct of the Korean war.

I use the term "war" advisedly. It is well known that our Chief Executive has described Korea as a "police action." But I maintain that whatever the term applied, the men who are fighting and dying there cannot distinguish the difference. In either case, no matter what we call it, those men still are undergoing the rigors of war, are suffering the miseries of war, and are dying the death of war.

Now, I do not consider myself a warmonger. I am a veteran of World War I, and I know from first-hand experience what war can do to individuals and to nations. To me, nothing is more horrible than war; there is nothing that I dislike more. I do not look with favor upon the necessity of sending young men into battle. This has become necessary through a series of "secret agreements" between our Nations' leaders and those of foreign powers, through a variety of blunders which I will not enumerate here. They have been dealt with in detail upon many occasions, on the floor of this House.

My purpose today is to register my most vigorous protest at the defeatist attitude taken by some of our administration stalwarts in recent statements.

This country of ours grew strong, became one of the world's great powers, through generations of standing on our own feet. We progressed through good times and bad by guiding our own destiny and by building up international prestige through years of painstaking diplomacy.

Early in the life of this Nation, we were warned against forming entangling alliances. In recent years, we have been so entangled in foreign alliances that we have been led to the very brink of national disaster.

Some of these alliances were formed in good faith and with the full knowledge of the American people. Others—insidious ones—were negotiated in secret, without the knowledge of the people, and definitely not to the best interests of this Nation.

We cannot undo what has been done, be it good or bad. Our plight now is one of finding the way out of the maze of entanglements and back to the true course set for the Nation by our forefathers.

This way is not by the appeasement route.

Our leaders tremble in fear that we will affront our former ally, "Good Old Joe" Stalin. They quake in their boots at the reaction of present allies to our national policies. They are afraid of the effect of efforts to bring the Korean conflict to a speedy and victorious conclusion. They favor a stalemate in Korea, a sparring for time—and all the while more and more American boys are dying on bloody battlefields in a foreign land.

Sparring for time, for whom?

Certainly, our national military strength will be increased at our present rate. But so will that of other powers whose design is our destruction. We will be buying time with American lives, time which will be of as much benefit to real and potential enemies as it will to us.

Already we have well begun the course to national bankruptcy, one of the primary objectives of our potential foreign adversaries. There seems to be no inclination, on the part of the administration, to halt this headlong flight to economic ruin. Rather, efforts are being accelerated to continue buying disrespect from foreign nations, supposedly our allies in the struggle for freedom.

Administration spokesmen insist that a firm, victory-seeking policy in Korea will bring down the wrath of the Soviet Union. To that, I say "rubbish." The Soviet Union, if she intends to wage world war III, will do so in her own time and in a place of her own choosing. Only the Kremlin can accurately predict the future in this regard.

It may be that General MacArthur's beliefs, if put into active use, would hasten world war III. Perhaps not. This much is certain: That this country of ours did not gain its strength and international prestige by cowing like a whipped cur, its tail between its legs and licking the hand that struck it. Neither have we been spoiling for a fight. We simply have faced the issues squarely, and met them fairly.

Now is the time to again face the issues, to determine a course which will bring true peace—not one of appeasement and continued waste of American lives. It is all well and good to talk of the tremendous losses suffered by Red China. It is not Red China's losses with which American parents are most concerned. They are concerned, and rightfully so, with the loss of American lives.

In short, I do not like our present administration's defeatist attitude, its fear complex if you will. They are so instilling fear in the American public through statements in the press and on the radio, that public and military morale alike will suffer.

They are afraid the United States will have to go it alone in Korea. Just what do they think we have been doing, in substance? This country has supplied virtually all the manpower and materials involved in the Korean conflict, aside, of course, from the South Koreans themselves.

I call for a reversal of policy, for determination of a policy which will make the fullest use of our resources to speed the Korean conflict to victorious conclusion, with the least possible loss of American lives and expenditure of American means.

I urge a return to the traditional American self-reliance. We owe it to the men who are on the fighting fronts to restore the truly American way of doing things. We must assure them that they are not earning victory on the battlefield only to have the peace thrown away once more. In the past we have won the battles, but we have failed miserably at the peace table. We must not let this reoccur.

National Federation of American Shipping, Inc., Takes Exception to Letter of Comptroller General

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. HART
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert herewith a letter addressed to me by Mr. Frazer A. Bailey, president of the National Federation of American Shipping, Inc., in which he takes exception to a letter addressed to the Honorable ALBERT THOMAS, chairman of Subcommittee on Independent Offices of the Appropriations Committee, and inserted by the latter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on May 7, 1951, by the Comptroller General of the United States:

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF AMERICAN SHIPPING, INC.,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1951.

The Honorable EDWARD J. HART,
Chairman, Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE HART: I have just finished reading in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 7, 1951, beginning at page A2549, a letter addressed to Congressman ALBERT THOMAS (Texas) by the Comptroller General of the United States which is preceded by a tabulation of ships said to have been chosen at random by the Maritime Administration and alleging to show the acquisition cost to the owner, the amount paid by the Government for charter hire, and the amount paid to the owner when the vessel was sunk.

The schedule gives such a distorted picture of the true relationship of the facts that we feel constrained to call the matter to your attention. Without taking each individual item and tracing it through to a conclusion (which we will be happy to do if you so desire) may we point out the basically misleading impression which must necessarily be gained by contrasting the data shown in the schedule.

It would be assumed that the purpose is to demonstrate that a vessel which cost the owner the modest sum stated was chartered to the United States Government for the period shown at a very high rate of charter hire, and that upon loss of the vessel, presumably from war hazards, the owner recovered a relatively large sum.

Nothing is stated to show that these vessels were under "time charter" except the small letters "t/c" which by reference to a line in the heading of the schedule is indicated to mean "time charter." Nothing is stated to show that the term "time charter" means that the vessel owner supplies not only the vessel but a full crew, including its wages, food and sustenance; repairs to maintain the vessel in operating condition; engine, deck and steward's stores, excepting only fuel and fresh water; and overhead management to take care of the procurement of those items supplied by the shipowner. Looking at the rate per month shown, it will be noted that the charter hire rate is slightly in excess of $1,000 per day. At the rate of pay for sea-going wages during the period stated, the daily crew wages would have amounted to almost one-half of that sum without taking into account food, repairs, stores, management costs, etc.

Therefore, if the reader were to assume, as he has a perfect right to do, that the schedule relates the cost of the vessel to a charter hire rental for the same vessel, the conclusion would be enormously distorted.

Further, the schedule shows a column headed "Estimated cost to the owner." The assumption of the reader is naturally that this is the amount paid by the shipowner to the Government for a surplus war-built vessel of World Wars I or II. From my personal knowledge of some of the few ships included in this list, such is not the case. Further, in the case of at least one of the vessels which was purchased from the Government as surplus from World War I, the vessel was bought as part of a fleet of 21 ships with a contract to operate the fleet for a period of 10 years over four trade routes found to be essential to the foreign trade and commerce of the United States and certified as such by the Maritime Commission. The cash consideration paid by the purchaser was considered by the company (and I was one of its directors at the time) to be only a part of the cost of the vessels. The obligation to run a year-round service over 4 routes with 21 vessels for 10 years was by them considered a very substantial part of the acquisition cost. True, ocean-mail contracts of that period were subsequently secured to equalize at least in part the competitive disadvantage of American and foreign ships plying those routes, but there was no assurance that the operating losses would not substantially exceed the cash consideration paid. While on this point, may I say that it would be a fair inference from the tone of the data supplied by Mr. THOMAS that this was a negotiated deal and that the Government was induced to sell the vessels at a ridiculously low price. The fact is that at least as far as the vessel with which I am familiar is concerned, the fleet of 21 ships and the contract obligations were all put up to public bidding, well advertised in advance, and the Government obtained the highest market value for the property which it was offering.

Now as to the column headed "Amount paid for loss," which is assumed to be the liquidation of the Government's obligation to the owner due to the sinking of the vessel through war risks and hazards. The charter party between the Government and the shipowner for the use of these vessels provided that in the event the vessels were lost the Government was obligated to pay the shipowner the constitutional remuneration of "just compensation." Further, as the date of loss shown will reveal, the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 was in existence and the so-called enhancement provision, under which the amount so paid is not to be enhanced by the causes necessitating the taking or use, was in effect, and therefore no war-inflated values could have been or were paid for these vessels. This enhancement clause is a provision which is not applicable by law to any other public property taken by the Government in the course of the prosecution of the war, and destroyed while in the Government's possession. In all other cases "just compensation" value as of the time of loss represents the sum to which such property owner is entitled. As far as the circumstances are concerned, instead of making out a case against the shipping industry, it is possible to show that this industry was discriminated against with respect to the taking of private property for public use.

Mr. THOMAS appears to relate only those factors which tend to prove a predetermined conclusion. He does not say to you that the charter hire rate shown for these vessels was substantially below the rate of hire currently being paid in the world market for similar ships. I would have to check the charter market of the period, but it is my impression that the figure is about two-thirds of the prevailing charter hire rates of the period. He also does not tell you (and it could hardly have slipped his memory, as Mr. BONNER brought it to his attention within the last 4 days) that rather than a showing of excess payments as just compensation for vessels taken for public use, the courts have awarded as to all vessels for the period, and not just the selected few which Mr. THOMAS cares to enumerate, 160 percent of the just compensation values offered by the Maritime Commission but refused by the owner and carried to the courts for determination.

There are a number of instances stated in the Comptroller General's letter which by contrasting the figures shown would tend to alarm the reader. However, as no names of companies or vessels are shown, we cannot give you an accurate statement.

The Comptroller General says that the Government inevitably sells in a buyer's market and buys in a seller's market. This is true, but the cause thereof is interesting. For the reason that we do not maintain an adequate merchant marine to carry our commerce and to provide military auxiliaries for national defense, it is necessary for the Government to engage in gigantic shipbuilding projects of an expensive—yes, extravagant—nature to meet the exigencies of war. Naturally these become surplus at the termination of the emergency and create what the Comptroller General chooses to call a "buyer's market." When the Government requires vessels, it is inevitably a period of international stress. Shipping is one of the first industries to feel the effect of war or preparation for war. Vessels are in demand to assure the accumulation of critical or strategical materials; vessel values and user rates necessarily rise. It is during such times, when these emergencies affect the United States, that the seller's market, to which the Comptroller refers, comes into existence.

The shipping business is necessarily a complicated and technical one. It is difficult for the public and even for many Members of Congress to understand these intricate matters. We have seen the time when they confuse members of the industry itself. It would be greatly helpful if persons who assume the role of critics would be careful to avail themselves of all the surrounding data and to present it in the proper perspective.

In the hope that we may at least make a start toward a frank and forthright understanding of at least some of these matters, we would appreciate it if you would have this communication placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD if, in your opinion, it merits it and would serve a useful purpose.

Sincerely yours,

FRAZER A. BAILEY.

Net Working Capital of Corporations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of May 7, 1951:

NET WORKING CAPITAL UP $5,700,000,000 IN 1950 FOR BIGGEST GAIN SINCE 1947—$75,800,000,000 TOTAL REPORTED BY SEC WITH CURRENT ASSETS AND LIABILITIES RECORDS AT $150,500,000,000 AND $74,700,000,000

WASHINGTON, May 6.—Net working capital of corporations in 1950 increased $5,700,000,000, largest annual gain since 1947, to $75,800,000,000, according to the largest estimate made public today by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Current assets of corporations rose $21,900,000,000 to a $150,500,000,000 record while current liabilities also reached a new high of $74,700,000,000.

The increase in working capital was recorded in the first 9 months of the year, the last quarter showing a slight decline, the report said. Current assets in the last 3 months increased by about $7,400,000,000, but current liabilities increased by a somewhat larger amount.

The increase in current assets in the last quarter of 1950 was accounted for by a $5,000,000,000 increase in inventories a $2,100,000,000 increase in receivables and a $400,000,000 rise in holdings of Government securities.

A $4,300,000,000 increase in notes and accounts payable, a small increase in other liabilities and a $3,200,000,000 addition to Federal income-tax liabilities accounted for the rise in current liabilities in the final quarter of 1950.

In addition to the $5,700,000,000 increase in working capital in 1950, the report estimated that corporations invested $16,800,000,000 during the year in plant and equipment. To finance this combined total of $22,500,000,000 in expansion, corporations secured about $3,700,000,000 from external sources. Net new bond issues amounted to about $2,000,000,000 while stock issues added $1,700,000,000. Internal sources—depreciation accruals and undistributed profits—provided the remaining $18,800,000,000 for corporate expansion last year.

Are the Industry Advisory Committees of the National Production Authority Hamstrung?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. OSTERTAG
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert in the RECORD a copy of a letter I have just received from Mr. Lyman A. Beeman, president of Finch, Pruyn & Co., manufacturers of printing and converting papers. Addressed to Charles E. Wilson, Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization, the letter records Mr. Beeman's resignation from the industry advisory committee of the Ground Wood Paper Manufacturers, and sets forth his reason for so doing. If Mr. Beeman's experience is typical of the way industry advisory committees are being treated by the National Production Authority, the Congress should indeed determine forthwith whether this situation is ineptness or a studied attempt toward Government dictatorship of business.

Mr. Beeman's letter follows:

MAY 8, 1951.

CHARLES E. WILSON,
Director, Office of Defense Mobilization,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WILSON: I have felt great security in your acceptance of responsibility in Washington and I wish to aid you in every way in our national emergency. To discharge this patriotic duty, I accepted an invitation to membership on the Groundwood Paper Manufacturers Industry Advisory Committee of NPA.

This committee met last Tuesday and I was astounded to have Mr. Nathaniel Rafler, Industry committee adviser, refuse committee members, either individually or as a whole, the right to have legal counsel of their own. He furthermore told us we were to have no secretarial, technical or other aid or advice. No minutes of meetings were to be kept, except as the Government chose to write summaries. When protest was made Mr. Rafler told us if we didn't like the conditions he would suggest we resign.

The conditions are such as to make the committee impotent for constructive effort. I could not help but draw the conclusion the National Production Authority had no intention of organizing its Industry Advisory Committees as honest, fair and efficient aids in administering controls. Since the meeting I have discussed and thought about the matter very carefully and it is difficult to decide whether this situation is ineptness or whether it is a step in a studied attempt toward Government dictatorship of business. In either event it is my obvious duty to resist no matter what the danger to me personally or to our company.

It is, therefore, with great hesitancy and after due consideration I realize the only way I can resist is to resign from the committee.

Very truly yours,

FINCH, PRUYN & CO., INC.,
LYMAN A. BEEMAN, President.

The Battle for Peace—Remarks by Secretary of the Air Force Thomas K. Finletter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE L. HAYS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, sometimes we become so absorbed in the conflicts and the tensions of our day that we forget to look to history for an understanding of them. The present, which leads inevitably to the future, is the product of the past, and not always unlike it. We may turn, therefore, to the past for guidance. History may suggest, when wisdom fails us, how to meet the great troubles that beset us and keep them from becoming destructive wars.

I am impressed, Mr. Speaker, by the grasp of history consistently displayed by that erudite, philosophic and able man who, to the good fortune of our Nation, serves his country as the Secretary of the Air Force. Recently, in a speech made before a group of educated men, Thomas K. Finletter gave further proof of his knowledge of history, his deep concern with world affairs, and his concept of the task that lies before us. I refer to Secretary Finletter's speech on Thursday of week before last after receiving the Guggenheim honor cup for 1951, presented by the University of Pennsylvania Club of New York.

The events to which Mr. Finletter turned for an illumination of today's events are not, however, ancient. They occurred in Ethiopia in 1935 and in the Rhineland in 1936. Citing them, and the great war that followed them, Mr. Finletter asks:

> Who can say what might have happened, what great precedents might have been established, how aggression might conceivably have been nipped in the bud, and World War II avoided, had the collective power for peace of the League been used on those two great occasions.

The events of today which Italy's conquest of Ethiopia and Hitler's militarization of the Rhineland illuminate are taking place in Korea, but with a difference that is fundamental. The member nations of the League of Nations failed to face up and resist acts of aggression 15 years ago, even though the aggression was committed against one of their own members. Mr. Finletter did not, but might have, referred to the moving and prophetic farewell speech of the Emperor of Ethiopia as he surrendered Ethiopia's seat in the League of Nations and went into exile. As the Emperor predicted, a greater war followed. But the free nations of the world today denounced the aggression in Korea. Through the medium of the United Nations they are fighting to sustain the great principle that aggression is illegal, and that the preservation of democracy as well as peace demands that aggression be suppressed. They are taking positive action to avoid a world war.

Pointing out the differences between the aggression of 1935 and the aggression of 1951, and how we are meeting it, Mr. Finletter said:

> Our military objectives thus are in aid of these two great principles—our search for peace and our determination to be strong until we get it. Particularly is this so in the Korean war. Indeed, it is the fact that this Korean war is not a war of the ordinary type which makes its conduct so difficult and so delicate. For the purpose of the Korean war is peace.

And Mr. Finletter continued:

> The battle for peace in Korea is not yet won. We are in the midst of the most troublesome phase of that great event. How we conduct ourselves and the determination and patience we show will decide the manner in which history will record this great event. The issue of collective action for peace through the United Nations is at stake.

But Mr. Finletter warned:

> It is not just in Korea that military action is playing its part in carrying out these great purposes of our foreign policy. Our large build-up of military forces and the strengthening of the military position of our allies, with the sacrifices that this will require from the American people, also are a part of the bigger purposes of our national policy.

Mr. Speaker, this thoughtful speech by Secretary Finletter should serve to clarify our thinking on problems of gravest concern. Instead of being confused by the debates going on today, we should find in them leaven to raise our hopes, to strengthen our faith, and our determination. The build-up of our Army, our Navy, and our Air Force is for the sole purpose of supporting our national policy in seeking peace and in maintaining a position of strength which will most effectively lead toward the achievement of peace.

It is a source of hope, and encouragement for the Nation that the man in whose hands rests the responsibility for the build-up of the Air Force can survey the current unrest, review the present debate and assert:

> There is a chance that our program for peace will succeed.

But it is a challenge to the rest of us, that Mr. Finletter should conclude:

> I believe that we must increase and double our efforts in the search for peace.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent heretofore granted, I include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the remarks of the Secretary of the Air Force Thomas K. Finletter after receiving the Guggenheim honor cup for 1951.

The remarks are as follows:

I shall talk to you this evening about the Air Force and, more particularly, about the way in which the work of the Air Force is fitting into our over-all policies in international relations.

There are at the moment two main activities of the military services which are and must be closely tied in with our foreign policy.

In the first place, we are engaged in a serious war in Korea, and this war, as I shall try to explain, is of a special kind involving complex and important considerations in our international relations.

Secondly, the Air Force, along with the other services, since the beginning of the Korean war nearly a year ago, has been engaged on a program of major build-up of the basic Military Establishment. The nature of this build-up is one which much be directly related to the aims of our foreign policy.

In times such as these when the country is not in an all-out war for survival—for Korea is not that, no matter how grievous the sufferings in that war—our military operations and planning must necessarily be subordinate to and in aid of our major political objectives.

This is not true to the same extent when the country is engaged in an all-out war (such as World Wars I and II) where there is a struggle to the death, where the issue is survival.

Even in an all-out war it is the Commander in Chief, a civilian, who is the highest authority in the executive branch on all matters, civilian as well as military. But military considerations then assume a particularly high importance. However, they must remain in closest consonance with our international political objectives. The principles for the peace settlement must be drafted. And even during the war there is room for political maneuver such as trying to divert allies from the enemy, to obtain allies for ourselves, to attempt to break the enemy's determination to resist (as in the case of Wilson's 14 points), and politically directed economic measures—all destined to weaken the enemy. In short, military considerations, under the direction of a civilian Commander in Chief, assume much higher importance during an all-out war.

But when the country is at peace, or in a betwixt-and-between time such as the present when we are not engaged in full-out war with our survival at stake, military operations and programs must be even more subordinated to considerations of foreign political policy.

This is especially so at the present time and in the case of our own country. Until recently in history the most that the foreign policies of the democracies hoped to do was to stave off the happening of war for as long as possible and to establish those relationships with other countries which would put one's own country in the best possible position for a war, if unhappily, one should come.

Not until the great American initiative of the League of Nations under Woodrow Wilson did it become one of the tasks of the foreign policy of the free world to seek the permanent and effective elimination of war as an institution.

Indeed, during the period of the family dynasties before the French Revolution, war was but an extension of foreign policy. And unhappily this has continued to be the case with the great aggressors of modern times.

The United States with the position of world leadership which has been forced upon it, fortunately has an entirely different concept. Its purpose is not only to stave off war for as long as possible and to persuade as much of the world as possible to agree with it in its search for peace, but also our country has, I believe, despite the difficulties that often seem insurmountable, determined to work through the United Nations to seek the elimination of war as a method of handling disputes between the nations.

The United States has not accepted the proposition that all-out war is inevitable. Perhaps you may say we are naive about this. Perhaps, as is sometimes pointed out, we are new at this business of world leadership and perhaps, you may say, that when we get a little older we will acquire the cynicism which has produced the unending series of wars which 6,000 years of history shows.

I do not believe so. I do not believe that we are going to adopt any such cynical point of view. Perhaps because of the protection which we have enjoyed—until recently, until the development of air power—back of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, or perhaps because of something in the spirit of the people of this country, we are going to try to change the rules and to use our leadership at least to make a try, and perhaps to succeed, in establishing a reign and rule of peace in the world.

This, I believe, is the attitude of the country. I do not believe that we are making the sacrifices in Korea with any feeling that these sacrifices will be in vain. Certainly the attitude of the Government is that all-out war is not inevitable, that we are going to do everything we can to get rid of it as a human institution, and that for all the odds against us and the intractability of some nations, we have a real chance to succeed.

This, I believe, is in the American tradition. It is not our custom to say that things are impossible. I believe that we will put the same effort into seeking peace as we have in the terrible sacrifices of war.

Time and again you will find the fact that peace is the primary business of the United States stated in our announcements of official policy. These are not just generalities, pious hopes of unattainable ends in which one does not believe. Specific proposals are made—proposals which when and as other nations are ready and willing to accept the idea, can be a base and a workable agenda for carrying out a regime of enforceable peace.

The record starts with the Atomic Declaration of November 1945, when the President of the United States and the Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom and Canada put forward a specific plan for enforced disarmament of the modern weapons of mass destruction.

The record goes on through the United Nations Assembly resolution of January 1946, the Secretary of State's committee report on atomic energy of March 1946, and down to the most recent statement of the President of the United States before the Unied Nations on October 24, 1950, when he proposed the following as an aspiration of our country—an aspiration which could be the greatest gift to civilization one could think of if it were to become the accepted policy of the nations:

"We intend to build up strength for peace as long as that is necessary. But at the same time, we must continue to strive, through the United Nations, to achieve international control of atomic energy and the reduction of armaments and armed forces. Cooperative and effective disarmament would make the danger of war remote. It would be a way of achieving the high purposes of the United Nations without the tremendous expenditures for armaments which conditions in the world today make imperative.

"Disarmament is the course which the United States would prefer to take. It is the course which most nations would like to adopt. It is the course which the United Nations from its earliest beginnings has been seeking to follow. * * *

"Years of effort have served to bring to the attention of all nations the three basic principles upon which any successful plan of disarmament must rest.

"First, the plan must include all kinds of weapons. Outlawing any particular kind of weapon is not enough. The conflict in Korea bears tragic witness to the fact that aggression, whatever the weapons used, brings frightful destruction.

"Second, the plan must be based on unanimous agreement. A majority of nations is not enough. No plan of disarmament can work unless it includes every nation having substantial armed forces. One-sided disarmament is a sure invitation to aggression.

"Third, the plan must be foolproof. Paper promises are not enough. Disarmament must be based on safeguards which will insure the compliance of all nations. The safeguards must be adequate to give immediate warning of any threatened violation. Disarmament must be policed continuously and thoroughly. It must be founded upon free and open interchange of information across national borders."

This is one great line of our policy. Parallel with it is our determination to be strong in a world in which these great plans for peace have not yet been accepted.

But the matter of being strong is one which ties in with and is in aid of the purpose of peace. Our strength is not for aggression. It is to create a military posture which will provide no incentive to aggressors to attack us and may perhaps persuade them that war would be unprofitable and that peace should be put upon the agenda.

Our military objectives thus are in aid of these two great principles—our search for peace and our determination to be strong until we get it. Particularly is this so in the Korean war. Indeed it is the fact that this Korean war is not a war of the ordinary type which makes its conduct so difficult and so delicate. For the purpose of the Korean war is peace.

Let us try to put this action of the United Nations in Korea in historical perspective. I believe that when history is written the obvious comparison will be made between the Korean war and the events of Ethiopia in 1935 and in the Rhineland in 1936.

You will remember that those two events are now regarded as the critical points when the League of Nations had to decide whether it was to go forward or backward, whether it was to become an effective agent for the suppression of aggression or whether it was to become an impotent debating society. The decision was that it was to become impotent. The reason was that it failed to face up to and resist those acts of aggression.

You will also remember how, in looking back, it has been pointed out that determined action by the League of Nations would have stopped the Ethiopian aggression and how the troops of Hitler had their orders to withdraw in the face of determined action by the victors of World War I to enforce the principles of collective security upon which they had agreed; and how this action was not taken. Who can say what might have happened, what great precedents might have been established, how aggression might conceivably have been nipped in the bud and World War II avoided had the collective power for peace of the League been used on those two great occasions.

When we come to Korea I believe that history will look back and say the free world had learned the lesson of the period between World Wars I and II and that when the new Ethiopian and the new Rhineland took place by the aggression of the North Koreans in Korea this time the free nations stood up, and through the medium of the United Nations fought to sustain the great principle that aggression is illegal.

The Korean war has been grievous. Great and heart-breaking losses have been sustained and are being sustained. It is a great trial for this country, which is bearing the heaviest burden, and for our fellow members of the United Nations whose sons also are being killed and wounded in this terrible business.

The battle for peace in Korea is not yet won. We are in the midst of the most troublesome phase of that great event. How we conduct ourselves and the determination and patience we show will decide the manner in which history will record this great event. The issue of collective action for peace through the United Nations is at stake.

We need the greatest patience and the greatest character both for ourselves and our allies if we are to bring this Korean war to a conclusion consistent with the purpose for which we decided to enter it. It is said sometimes that we are an impatient people, that this is not the sort of thing that we can do well. I think that it is probably true, if we fail to state and to recognize our purpose in Korea. But I believe that, understanding the great purpose and the enormous stakes for our country which are at play, we will show the determination and the patience to see the Korean war through and to keep up the fight for peace.

It is not just in Korea that military action is playing its part in carrying out these great purposes of our foreign policy. Our large build-up of military forces and the strengthening of the military position of our allies, with the sacrifices that this will require from the American people, also are a part of the bigger purposes of our national policy.

This build-up is a coordinated effort of the Army, Navy, and Air Force. Since I am associated with the Air Force, I shall speak for a little about the Air Force's role and plans in this build-up which is so important a part of our national policy.

Our Air Force has four main commands back of which is all the rest of the Air Force establishment; but it is these four commands who are the active agents, the end product as it were. All of these commands are being built in such a fashion as to fit in with these double purposes of our national policy—to seek peace and to maintain a position of strength which will most effectively lead toward the achievement of that peace.

These four commands are the Air Defense Command, the Strategic Air Command, the Tactical Air Command, and, serving these three, the Military Air Transport Service which provides the great lines of logistic supply by air.

I hope I have made it clear that the Air Force, as well as the other services, is doing its best to fit in and to aid our national policies.

Let me conclude by making two points about all of this great effort. The first is that the maintenance of our posture of defense is expensive and will put a heavy burden on the American economy and on the American taxpayer. I believe that we will have to maintain a high level of military spending until such time as our efforts for peace show results.

Our ability to maintain this military posture, and to pay for it, will require the same characteristics of patience and determination as we must apply in the battle of Korea.

We will have to accept these high expenditures regardless of the immediate variations of the international scene. The maintenance of our military posture must be a fixed and stable policy, not yielding on the one hand to sudden worsenings on the international front, and, on the other hand, not falling prey to unjustified optimism caused by minor and temporary improvements on the international scene. We will have to make up our minds what kind of a military establishment we want. We must not leave this decision to events or to the decisions of other powers.

The second point I would make is that there is a chance that our program for peace will succeed.

I know that the situation could not look much worse than it is now. But nevertheless I believe that the peoples of the world everywhere are so anxious to get rid of war that there is some chance that in time their will will prevail.

But more than that, even if we were convinced that the situation looked completely impossible it would not be in the American tradition, I believe, once we have determined we want to get this great end of the elimination of war, to make no effort to try to get it simply because it looked hard to get.

I believe we must reject all cynicism in this matter of seeking peace.

I believe we must not think of the odds against us any more than a soldier thinks of the odds against him when he attacks a strong point.

I believe that we must increase and double our efforts in the search for peace.

History of I Am An American Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following excerpt from an address delivered by Charlotte Baruth, president of the Charlotte Baruth Association, at a banquet in her honor given by the members of the veterans' service organization which bears her name:

CHARLOTTE BARUTH. You are my true and loyal friends, and I love you with a full heart. Your friendship and teamwork mean more to me than I can describe in words.

The third Sunday in May is almost here and somehow, tonight, I have a feeling that I should say something about the simple fact that we are gathered here in friendly assembly. None of us was forced or coerced to be present. No secret police watches or listens. We can express ourselves freely and without fear.

How fortunate we are to enjoy the seven rights of American democracy: The right to live, work, worship, assemble, petition, speak, and vote.

Throughout history, men and women of purpose and conscience have found ways and means of meeting together, regardless of consequences: witness the catacombs, the hedgerows of Ireland, the ghettos of Europe and Russia's Siberia, all of which have revealed stories of death and worse than death. What a contrast in glorious America.

In this year of grace, 1951, it seems fitting for me to give you a brief history of one example of the American way of life. More than one of our seven cherished rights are demonstrated by a movement which started just before World War II. It has to do with living, assembling, and speaking in this great country of ours.

I might explain to you that I am especially familiar with this movement, if that's the right name for it, because Benjamin Edwards Neal, a long-time friend of the Baruth family, is the one who originated it. We call him Uncle Ben, as does most everyone else.

I want to tell you about how this American tradition started and how it quickly found a place in the hearts of America. First, I'll make a prediction of things to come, based on past records and with the proviso that the weather is clear and warm.

I predict that on the third Sunday of this month, one of the grandest spectacles ever witnessed in the United States will be staged at the Mall in Central Park. More than a million Americans will join in patriotic festivities, renewing their pledge of allegiance to the flag.

I also predict that in cities, towns, and hamlets throughout the Nation, more citizens—big, little, old, and young—will assemble in public places on May 20 than ever before in the history of our country.

To me, this is very significant. In some sections of the world, listening to a radio broadcast can prove hazardous. In contrast, here in America, there will be an outpouring of citizens who will assemble voluntarily; speeches will be broadcast and uncensored; no one will be banished or jailed for expressing his opinion.

The occasion I speak of, as all of you know, as I Am An American Day. The thirteenth annual observance will take place this month. It has already been proclaimed by the President of the United States, by governors and mayors throughout the and.

I Am An American Day is designed to honor new-voting citizens: native-born who have reached the age of 21 and foreign-born who have been naturalized during the past 12 months. Its basic purpose is to impress these new, full-fledged citizens with the seriousness of their obligations in this free country. With the public as witness to their induction, the ceremony is a thrilling and unforgettable experience.

Sponsored nationally by the act of Congress and the I Am An American Foundation, the celebration in New York is sponsored jointly by Mayor Vincent R. Impellitteri and the Journal American newspaper. In less serious times, the attendance at the Mall has exceeded the million mark. Given clement weather, all attendance records are expected to be broken in this year of decision.

I am sure you will be interested to know how I Am An American Day happened to be born into this troubled world. It so happens that I have had the opportunity of reading excerpts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and also from Los Angeles papers where it originated: the Times, Examiner, Herald-Express, News, and the Hollywood Citizen. Naturally, my interest in these background stories was influenced by the fact that our friend, Uncle Ben, is the founder of I Am An American Day.

It was in the prewar era of 1938–39 when the Fascist leaders of Germany, Italy, and Japan were whipping the minds of youth into a frenzy of national fervor and warlike spirit, that Benjamin Edwards Neal (our Uncle Ben who was born in Texas and was then living in California) conceived the idea of I Am An American Day. He felt the need of a campaign to fight complacency and inspire the Nation to a greater sense of patriotism.

Although attention was focused on the new-voting citizens, the observance attracted Nationwide attention and its spread throughout the country is without parallel in our history.

The first I Am An American Day was observed with ceremonies in Hollywood Bowl on June 12, 1939, with the enthusiastic cooperation of local government agencies, church, education, civic, patriotic, and women's groups. Newspapers, newsreels, and radio carried the story to all parts of the Nation.

In early 1940, at the invitation of Senator A. B. Chandler, Mr. Neal, and Edward Arnold, Hollywood's Mr. President, who succeeded Uncle Ben as head of the I Am An American Foundation, went to Washington—not at Government expense—to testify about the first I Am An American Day before a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee of which Senator Chandler was chairman. Also a member of that committee was the present ranking minority member, the Honorable ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin.

The joint resolution, authorizing the President of the United States to issue an annual proclamation setting aside the third Sunday in May as I Am An American Day, was unanimously approved by the Congress, thus converting a local celebration into one of national proportions in less than 12 months. Subsequent growth has been equally unprecedented.

Before leaving the subject of this fine American story, I want to give you two or three side lights. I happen to know that I Am An American Foundation never put on a drive for contributions. The small group most interested took care of the net expenses. And when the invitation came to have the story of the first celebration told to the Judiciary Committee, Edward Arnold paid almost $5,000 out of his own pocket for this expense.

Another interesting side light is the fact that, while Mr. President, or rather Mr. Arnold, was in Washington, MGM called him back to Hollywood for retakes on the ending of his latest picture. For the first time in his life Mr. Arnold traveled by plane and then later returned to Washington by train. Incidentally, when that picture finally was released the original version was used.

In giving the history of I Am An American Day I should also pay tribute to Mr. Manny Strauss, genius of publicity and public relations, who showed Hollywood a thing or two about making news in the early stages of this celebration. Uncle Ben has told me many times that he stands at salute to Emm Ess.

Uncle Ben has told me also how deeply indebted he is to Capt. Watson B. Miller, executive assistant to the national commander of the American Legion, for assistance to him and Edward Arnold in guiding them through the mysteries of Capitol Hill.

Uncle Ben has an album called Book of Good Neighbors which has many interesting photographs of I Am an American events. Especially interesting to me was one showing the page boys of the House and Senate gathered in the Senate reception room with Senate Majority Leader Alben W. Barkley, Minority Leader Charles R. McNary, and Congressman Harry R. Sheppard, who represented the House of Representatives. The expressions on the faces of these page boys as they staged a miniature I Am an American celebration was truly something for the book.

The first network stories about I Am An American Day, even before it became national, were told on News and Views by John B. Hughes and by George Jessel.

I Am An American Day is America's day of rededication. How fortunate we are to have the privilege of saying, "I am an American."

Time To Think and Not Throw Words

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. M. G. BURNSIDE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial comment by

Paul Calvin Payne which appeared in the Presbyterian Life, Philadelphia, Pa., on May 12, 1951:

TIME TO THINK AND NOT THROW WORDS

Out of the suffering of World War I came these lines:

"Now you who live must do
A harder thing than dying is,
For you must think
And ghosts will drive you on."

It is calamitous that decisions on which the future of America and the world depend are being approached in an atmosphere dangerously charged with emotion. Emotional thinking is never clear thinking. As Nehru put it, in an interview with Norman Cousins, "People hardly think nowadays. They throw words at each other."

In an atmosphere supercharged with such emotional tensions, General MacArthur, at the time of this writing, has just given his notable address before the American Congress. Reactions are pouring in by radio and press. As one newspaper put it, "He spoke, as he emphasized, not as advocate of any partisan cause, nor as one pursuing political aspirations, but as an American who is trying to serve his country."

What is all important now is that the issues which he presented be freely discussed and that differing points of view be offered, as General MacArthur himself said, "without rancor nor bitterness."

It is especially important that they be discussed within the church, by thoughtful Christians whose views differ. To rule out such discussion, or to slap it down by labeling as pinks, fellow travelers, or Communists, those whose opinions differ from our own is to leave the discussion entirely to secular interests, who, through radio and press, are currently discussing them with appalling rancor and bitterness and recrimination. It is asking too much to expect wisdom or truth to emerge from such an atmosphere. Under these conditions people don't think; they throw words at each other.

If there is any hope of clearing the air, it rests in the readiness of persons committed to the Christian way of life to discuss these highly charged issues in the full exercise of Christian charity toward others who hold opposing views. We are united in our opposition to the Kremlin and all its works. We want no part of it. Let us not then join in the service of Moscow by allowing ourselves to be divided into opposing camps because of our differences—at the moment, over the methods by which Communist aggressions can be checked. Above all, let us avoid as the plague the temptation to vituperation, for such practice precludes all possibility of any intelligent facing of vital issues.

These issues far transcend personalities, and it is a positive disservice to stoop to attribute sordid motives to the President or to General MacArthur.

The general does not go along with those who have been urging that we "cut our losses and get out of Korea." He differs "from those who would 'scuttle' Europe by withholding troops and retreating to the Western Hemisphere and a few outlying bases."

This does not mean that there are not profound differences between General MacArthur and the administration, but the speech before Congress reduced them to "differences regarding the means of giving effect to principles on which there is agreement."

These differences raise two questions: 1. How deeply should we become involved in military commitment in Asia? 2. What would be the consequences of our taking unilateral military action, contrary to the expressed judgment in the United Nations?

On the first point General MacArthur does not believe that bombing Manchuria would bring Russia into the war, or that increasing our military commitments in Asia would weaken our position in Europe. He characterizes such judgments as "defeatism" and continues, "If a potential enemy can divide his strength on two fronts, it is for us to counter his efforts." He is careful to say, however, "The Soviet will not necessarily mesh its actions with our moves." Russia, however, is bound by treaty to declare war on any nation attacking China. Also, the general did not think China would invade Korea last fall, in spite of the ominous massing of Chinese forces north of the Yalu.

There is no evidence that military authorities are convinced that we can, as of today, defend Europe if it is attacked. If the bitter choice were necessary, Russian occupancy of the Ruhr would pose a far greater immediate danger to us than continued Communist domination of China. Russia is not now committed on any front. She has complete freedom of action, while we are restricted in proportion to our commitments in Korea. The question as to whether indefinite stalemate in Korea is the only alternative to world war III is one which no one can answer. Nevertheless, if we label as appeasement all efforts to effect any kind of a compromise settlement, we are dangerously near the assumption that, unless all settlements with the Communists can go our way, we are prepared to embark on a third world war.

As to the second question at issue, the policy as of today indicates that the bombing of Manchuria would be opposed by all our friends and allies in the United Nations, and would offer to that body the choice of disruption or surrender to American domination. In either case the result would be calamitous. If it brought on war with Russia, we would find ourselves in a conflict in which we had alienated the sympathies of the rest of the world. The greatest political victory the Kremlin could win would be thus to break up the United Nations and isolate the United States. We dare not let our sense of power betray us into the illusion of omniscience. We must respect the judgment and feelings of the other free nations of the world. In a struggle where power is so evenly divided, our ability to do this may well spell the difference between ultimate victory and defeat.

According to the report just released, General MacArthur told President Truman and other conferees that he saw little chance of Red Chinese intervention in Korea. He believed only about 50,000 or 60,000 Chinese could cross the Yalu River, and if they tried to attack toward Pyongyang, he thought they would be slaughtered. There was talk of getting troops back to Japan by Christmas.

We know, of course, that the general was wrong. The troops didn't get back to Japan at Christmas, and a lot more than 60,000 Chinese Communists have crossed the Yalu River, as our men fighting bitterly at the front today can testify.

Yet General MacArthur is now quoted as saying that the Wake Island reports have "just about as much bearing on the problem of Korea today as would a report on the military operations of Bunker Hill." And his aide, Maj. Gen. Courtney Whitney, has presented the statement that the question of Chinese intervention was basically a political one and quite beyond the reach of General MacArthur's military intelligence.

These statements prompt several significant questions: If Chinese intervention in Korea was basically a political question, is not the question of Russian intervention in case of Manchurian bombing and a second front on the Chinese mainland even more basic politically?

If he should not have been expected to pass on Chinese intentions, why should his predictions now about Russian intentions be classified by Republicans as authoritative?

If his intelligence officers were so handicapped in getting information about the Chinese Communists, how is it possible for the general to be so positive about conditions on the Trans-Siberian Railroad and Russia's inability to "launch any predatory attack from the Asiatic Continent?"

We would also remind all the people that some of General MacArthur's more energetic and emotional friends are trying to work both sides of the street. They say he is both a great soldier—as he is—and a supreme authority on minds and methods in the Far East.

But they also say that if political calculations in his statements go wrong, he is not to be held accountable, for he is a military expert.

The point is that we cannot have it both ways. If the general, in addition to being a wise military leader, is presented as an authority on international politics in Asia, he cannot be relieved of responsibility when his judgment is proved to be wrong, as in the case of Communist China. That is why we say thoughtful Americans must wait for all the facts and information before deciding what is the best course to pursue in the Far East.

Wait for All the Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD BOLLING
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous consent granted me, I include an interesting editorial from the Tampa Morning Tribune, Tampa, Fla., of May 4:

WAIT FOR ALL THE FACTS

Those Americans who are sincerely desirous of obtaining all the facts regarding our broad policy and military strategy in Korea, China, and the rest of the Far East will not jump to hasty conclusions just because General MacArthur testified yesterday. They will remember that General Marshall, members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and other witnesses will appear before the Senators.

Moreover, they should set down some of yesterday's statements and predictions alongside other recent statements and happenings. Take this matter of the Wake Island conference.

Second Connecticut March

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include a most interesting and varied history concerning the famous Connecticut Second Regiment March. It is taken from the May issue of the Connecticut Guardsman which is published monthly by the Information Division of the Adjutant General's Department,

State Armory, Hartford. It is the official publication of the Connecticut Military Department headed by the Adjutant General, Maj. Gen. Frederick G. Reincke, and its editor is Maj. Earl C. Branniff.

As the article outlines, there are two versions about the origin of the march, the first being of more direct concern to Connecticut, and the second implies a condition precedent in order to attend a Presidential inauguration in Washington. The article follows:

SECOND CONNECTICUT MARCH HAS INTERESTING, VARIED HISTORY

The curiosity of a Virginia newspaperman resulted in considerable research and finally a good deal of information on the famous Second Connecticut March. The stirring march, ever the outstanding favorite of Connecticut military and other bands, also is associated with the State. Likewise it has become a popular theme song for several radio programs originating in Connecticut. During the course of the research it also was learned that the music was set to words and was adopted by some high schools as their school song.

Miss Marjorie E. Case, at the Connecticut State Library, found most of the pertinent information about the march and in relaying the information still further light was thrown on the famous musical melody before the report was forwarded to Virginia.

The march was composed by D. W. Reeves and copyrighted in 1877. A copy in the library contained a large picture of a military leader on the outside cover. At first it was thouhgt that the picture was that of the composer and leader of the American band in Providence, R. I. It was learned that he was one of the most outstanding if not the outstanding band leader of his time.

DEDICATED TO SECOND

The picture on the cover, it was later learned, was that of Col. Stephen R. Smith, then commander of the Second Connecticut Regiment, Connecticut National Guard. He was a New Haven man who died in 1889 at the age of 53 after having served as adjutant general of the State. The march was dedicated to "Colonel Smith and the men of the Second Connecticut Regiment."

Information available at the State library indicated that the Second Connecticut Regiment was a fine military organization in those days and had an excellent band; members traveled around to many eastern cities where they drilled and paraded. It also was indicated that the unit also was well known outside of Connecticut.

The militia brigade of four regiments, including the second, spent a week in encampment at the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia in September 1876 and from news accounts made quite an impression there. Among other excursions of the Second Regiment was one to Boston and Providence in June 1878. It was the opinion of researchers that the march may have been written for the centennial appearance for the anticipated trip to Boston and Providence.

PICTURE DISPLAYED

Warrant Officer Anthony R. Teta, bandmaster of the One Hundred and Second Army Band at New Haven, agreed with the date and name of composer and furnished the information that a large picture of Band Leader Reeves is on display in the bandroom at New Haven and is the source of a good deal of interest on the part of visitors to the room.

Mr. Teta would not disagree with the conclusion reached as regards the occasion of composing the march, but said that he was inclined to go along with another version of the origin of the famous piece of martial music. Mr. Teta said that the other version was to the effect that after a presidential election it was the desire of Colonel Smith and members of the regiment to march in the inaugural parade in Washington. The authority to go to Washington was on one condition and it was that Mr. Reeves would compose an original and stirring march to be played in the parade.

LITTLE TIME

When the condition was made known to Mr. Reeves he had little time left, but according to the same version of the origin, he supposedly sat down, went to work and completed the piece within a week's time.

The election in 1877 was that of Rutherford B. Hayes, following the 8 years of U. S. Grant. So that version could not refer to the Hayes inauguration as the march was popular in 1876. It is doubtful that it could have referred to the inauguration of Grant, because a casual reading of the history of the New Haven Grays shows no mention of a trip to Washington although there is an account of an excursion to Washington about that time.

AT CENTENNIAL

The Gray's publication throws some more light on the subject but not conclusively enough. Included in its pages, however, is mention that the New Haven Grays sought and eventually was given the right to represent Connecticut at the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia and was led by the American Band with Reeves as bandmaster, so it is possible that the right to represent the State may have resulted in the condition of the march.

The New Haven Palladium of Friday, September 1, 1876, in describing the departure of the main body for Philadelphia, told of marching through the streets of New Haven to the railroad station. It was in connection with this event that the Second Connecticut March was first mentioned in the volume of the Gray's History. The Palladium story included the following in the parade description: "The streets were filled with friends of the regiment who waved adieu to the departing soldiers. The American Band played the Second Connecticut March which is growing very popular."

WORDS PUBLISHED

In addition to being an outstanding supervisor and teacher of music in the Hartford public schools, the late Ralph L. Baldwin assembled a group of classical selections for use of high school choruses and glee clubs. To stimulate interest in arias, he frequently changed words to produce a lighter and more popular appeal among high school students. Included in the volume in use over 25 years ago was a stirring version of the Second Connecticut March. It apparently was popular with students because some in Connecticut and Massachusetts adopted the number as a school march for use at football games. Some schools used the published words without reference to the particular school in much the same fashion that the West Point cadets unofficially adopted the Sons of Toil and Danger for a contemporary operetta.

While there may be some vagueness as regards some phases of the history of the Second Connecticut March torch bearing members and ex-members of the One Hundred and Second Regiment who maintained that the Second Connecticut is the second oldest regiment in the world, second only to the Coldstream Guards. The History of the Grays however, is a little more modest on the subject reporting in connection with its arrival in Philadelphia that it was "one of the oldest regiments of the Centennial Legion." Organized in 1816, the Second Regiment continued as such until it joined other troops in the Civil War. In 1865, when the Connecticut Militia was reorganized, the unit continued as such until 1917 in World War I when it was redesignated the One Hundred and Second. During the war it was split to form the One Hundred and Sixty-ninth and One Hundred and Seventieth Regiments. The One Hundred and Seventieth was redesignated the One Hundred and Second in 1924 and continues as such today as a part of the Forty-third Division.

Rent Control at Oak Ridge

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD H. BAKER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a copy of a bill which I have today introduced in the House to amend the Housing and Rent Act of 1947 so as to provide for control of rent charged by the Atomic Energy Commission at Oak Ridge, Tenn. We have all heard of the parent who told his son, "Do not do as I do; do as I tell you to do."

It seems to me that this admonition describes the attitude of the sovereign toward Government-owned housing which the Government and various agencies thereof rent to citizens throughout the United States. I see no justification for rent control applying to property owned by taxpaying citizens of the Nation and not applying with equal force to the Government itself. Since Oak Ridge is located in the district which I have the honor of representing, and since the rents were increased 10 percent there about a year ago and now a new 28-percent increase has been announced, I feel that the Housing and Rent Act of 1947 and any substitute therefor should apply to all Government-owned rental property and especially at Oak Ridge. There should be outside independent appraisal and determination of what constitutes fair rental on these Government-owned rental properties and that the usual elements which are applied in determining fair rentals and fair return on investment together with the purposes for which these Government units were built should all be taken into account.

Accordingly, I have today introduced the following bill:

A bill to amend the Housing and Rent Act of 1947 so as to provide for control of rents charged by the Atomic Energy Commission for housing accommodations at Oak Ridge, Tenn.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 204 (1) (1) of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947 (50 U. S. C. App. sec. 1894 (1) (1) is amended by adding after the first sentence thereof the following new sentence:

"The Housing Expediter shall by regulation or order establish maximum rents for all housing accommodations in the vicinity of Oak Ridge, Tenn., which are owned by the United States and rented or offered for rent by the Atomic Energy Commission to its employees."

Strasbourg Seeks a Link With Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Anne O'Hare McCormick from the New York Times of May 14, 1951:

STRASBOURG SEEKS A LINK WITH WASHINGTON

(By Anne O'Hare McCormick)

The old town of Strasbourg has taken on a new animation since it became the capital of the Council of Europe, 2 years ago. It is a border city; the bridge over the Rhine connects France and Germany and the German landscape on the other side is dominated by the incongruously lacy spires of the massive red cathedral. Strasbourg is like the cathedral—a sober, solid place with an overlay of lightness.

But Strasbourg is no longer just a city on a contested frontier. It is a city looking beyond frontiers, a pioneer in a political wilderness. The eighteenth-century architecture still dominates, despite the modern buildings erected to replace the battered shells left by the war—Marshall plan houses, they are called—or to accommodate the European Parliament, but the eighteenth century, heyday of dukedoms, principalities, and little states, is deader in Strasbourg than anywhere else in Europe. So is the Franco-German conflict. Too little stress had been laid on the fact that it was on this bitter boundary, within the month, that West Germany was received into the council and the Schuman plan was endorsed by an 80-to-7 vote. It may be said that the famous Strasbourg clock is the first on the Continent to tell the new time.

THE GOAL OF THE MOVEMENT

So far, to be sure, the Assembly is more a symbol than a real force. In 2 years it has merely turned an idea into an organization, and this organization is without power to legislate or make policy. It cannot take practical steps to bring about the unity it seeks. At the current session it even took a step backward by shelving the plan for federation in deference to British opposition to any surrender of sovereignty. A federal union, on the pattern of the American Union but looser and more limited in scope, is the goal set for the European movement by continental leaders like Paul Reynaud, Paul-Henri Spaak, and André Philip.

There is a great grass-roots feeling for unity, and the plan will not be given up. Much has to be done, however, before it can be achieved, and if the members of the assembly concentrate meantime on concrete measures to break down barriers and develop broad lines of common policy, national frontiers will be leveled by degrees, without frontal attack. In fact, they are being leveled. The enormous difficulties in the way of the Benelux free trade area, for instance, are far from being surmounted, but nobody in Belgium, Holland, or Luxemburg is now willing to go back to the former system.

The three countries in the pool have discovered that their trading and bargaining position is much better as one unit than as three. Instead of losing they have gained economic power. The Schuman plan faces even greater difficulties, but in the long run—assuming it has a long run—the rewards on the economic side alone will more than compensate for the sacrifices.

On the political side, of course, even as an idea the project is like a gust of fresh air in a closed room. The same may be said of the Council of Europe. Obviously it attempts too much, falls into the habit of old parliaments in being too diffuse and too talkative. It discusses forming a European army when it is clear that nothing can be done about it while the western powers are hard pressed to fulfill their obligation to provide forces for the Atlantic Treaty army. And it fails to come to grips with problems it might exert pressure on governments to deal with. One of these is the urgently dangerous problem of the refugees and deportees, piling up in Germany like an ammunition dump waiting to go off.

Nevertheless Strasbourg expresses an impulse that cannot be brushed aside. No one should discount the power of symbols. The arguments that echo in the Council of Europe today don't get far in practical terms, but at least they are on a new them; they drown out the stale disputes of yesterday. For the first time in a century, the scarred old border city is talking about the Rhine as a bridge instead of a dividing line.

AN INVITATION TO CONGRESS

And in tabling the idea of federation for a while the assembly is growing more rather than less ambitious. Saturday, by a unanimous vote, it invited Members of the United States Congress to attend the fall session. The speeches for the resolution acknowledged the moral support this country has given to European union and the resolution itself stressed the advantages of a public discussion of their common problems and dangers between the Representatives of Congress and the European assembly. This is a new idea and certainly has its points as a means of clearing up the misunderstandings that befog the international atmosphere.

But probably another reason is behind the desire to forge a link between Strasbourg and Washington. The feeling is common among continental leaders that Britain is literally behind the times in standing against or apart from the currents that run toward new forms of political cooperation and larger economic mergers, and beyond that lies the belief that Britain will not join Europe because she fears that it will weaken her ties not only to the Commonwealth but to the United States; therefore linking the Council of Europe to the United States is one way of drawing Britain into the circle. Furthermore—and this is the decisive reason—as soon as the nations of Western Europe begin to think seriously of unity they realize that their union is not big enough. The men of Strasbourg are feeling their way to becoming a part of an Atlantic union.

Legislation Affecting the Postal Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. AYRES
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech of Hon. FRANK T. BOW, of Ohio, delivered before the northeast Ohio district, National Association of Letter Carriers, Wooster, Ohio, May 12, 1951:

It is a pleasure to speak to members of a group that plays as large a part in the lives of all the people as do the postal workers.

Receiving mail is one of the things in life that we look forward to with keen anticipation. I am sure all of you who have delivered mail to the homes of the cities in this area have seen this anticipation. You have seen it in the face of a boy who runs to meet you, eagerly hoping his Hopalong Cassidy genuine pearl-handled revolver is in your bag. You have seen it in the quiet hope of the retired worker who is expecting his monthly check, or the mother hoping for a letter from Korea. You have all experienced the enthusiasm with which you are greeted when that gun, check or letter does arrive. I hope all of you have found satisfaction in that enthusiasm, for each of us must receive something from his job besides his pay.

There is no group of Federal employees as old in point of service to our Nation as the United States postal workers. There is no group of employees in or out of the Federal service who can justifiably point with greater pride to their record of steadfast, loyal, and efficient service to the Nation.

Yours is a history much older than that of the Federal Government itself, for your service existed before the Federal Constitution was adopted. The Post Office Department can trace its history back more than 200 years to the day in 1737 when Benjamin Franklin was appointed postmaster at Philadelphia. Some years later, in 1753, he acquired the lofty title, "Co-Deputy Postmaster General of the British Colonies in North America."

What is more important to us today, however, is the fact that on July 26, 1775, Franklin became our first Postmaster General and went on to lay much of the foundation for the development of the present United States postal system.

In this development over the past half century the National Association of Letter Carriers has played a prominent and important part. In my opinion, the value of your service to our postal system and to our Nation cannot be overemphasized. Since the founding of the association in Milwaukee in August of 1889, you have had twin objectives, namely, service to the American people, and service to your members. These objectives cannot be separated. They are intimately intertwined and in serving one you must also serve the other.

During the 61 years since the founding of your association, very few of your achievements have come easily. One of the first major tasks that the new organization faced was to secure compliance with the eight-hour law for postal workers which Congress had passed in 1888. Strange as it may seem in 1951, it was actually necessary to resort to court action to compel the Post Office Department to grant the letter carriers their rights under the 1888 statute. That the founders of the association had the courage and the determination to assert these rights is a tribute to their far-sightedness and to the firmness of their purpose to build an organization that could attain the legitimate goals of the postal workers.

During the period from 1889 to 1921, your association time and again was forced to overcome the determined opposition of hostile Postmasters General, gag rules which prohibited not only yourselves but all Federal employees from direct contact with Congress through their duly elected representatives, as well as other formidable obstacles. That the association was successful in the long run is illustrated by the fact that in 1912, the Lloyd-La Follette Act, the Magna Carta of postal organizations, was approved.

Since 1921, however, when Will Hays became Warren G. Harding's first Postmaster General, the men who have held this Cabinet position have had a uniformly friendly attitude toward National Association of Letter Carriers. Since 1921, the influence and prestige of your organization has steadily increased. The realization of the need for high morale among post-office employees and that the administration of the Department calls for teamwork on the part of everyone seems to have become an established pattern during the 30 years since Will Hays set out to correct the shortcomings in employee-Department relationships in the Post Office.

I want to discuss with you this evening some of the bills now before either the House or the Senate which are of interest both to the association and to you as individuals. I say "some of the bills" because up to now at least 50 have been introduced in the Eighty-second Congress which certainly are of some interest to either yourselves individually or to your association as a whole. In the time we have this evening, it would be impossible to consider the provisions of 50 bills, as you well know, but we can and should consider briefly the provisions of the more important ones now before Congress.

H. R. 244 and similar bills give all employees in the postal service who are six grades or more below the top automatic grade in their class a $600 annual increase in salary. Those employees who are less than six grades below the top automatic grade in their class will receive a $100 increase for each grade they are below the top automatic grade. In addition, all employees will receive a 17-percent increase of their new salary rate.

In the case of clerks or carriers (the largest group of postal employees, numbering about 300,000), there are presently 11 automatic grades representing a $100 increase each, and clerks and carriers progress to the next higher grade each year. These grades are reduced to five under H. R. 244. The new salary grades would correspond in salary to the present salary grades of 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, plus the 17-percent increase. Clerks or carriers now in grades below grade five will go to the new grade of the same number, which, under the new schedule, will be $600 higher than at present. Those in grades 6 to 11 will be placed in the new grade 5, which salary is the same as the present grade 11.

A clerk or carrier who today enters the service as a substitute at $2,670 a year would, under the bill, enter the service at $3,825.90. Clerks or carriers in grades 1 through 4 would thus receive an increase of $600 plus 17 percent. Clerks and carriers in the new grade 5 would receive an increase of 17 percent.

Next come H. R. 337 and S. 190. These similar bills revoke the controversial order of the Postmaster General published April 18, 1950, curtailing delivery and other postal services.

There are 13 bills similar to H. R. 337 and S. 190.

In the field of retirement legislation, two bills have been introduced which amend the Civil Service Retirement Act to increase annuities of retired employees by 33⅓ percent of the annuity they are now receiving, or by $500 annually, whichever amount is smaller. These bills are H. R. 233 and S. 926, and of course are of most interest to postal workers who have already retired.

Another bill on retirement legislation, and perhaps the most important I shall mention this evening, is S. 995. Its provisions are quite technical.

First, it increases the annuities of all employees on the retired rolls by $120 plus $12 for each two full months that have passed since the annuity began and the date S. 995 goes into effect if it becomes law. However, the total increase cannot be more than $360 and the total yearly annuity cannot exceed $2,400. This means that any retired employee who has retired 3½ years would be entitled to the full increase, provided his annuity remained within the $2,400 limit.

Second, S. 995 increases the annuities of survivors by $120 and the annuities of children, in the case where there is one child, to $720. When there are more than one, the amount cannot exceed $1,440.

These first two provisions refer to employees who have already retired.

As to those who retire in the future, S. 995 sets up a new formula for computing the amount of the annuity. This new formula provides for 1 percent of the highest 5-year average salary plus $30 multiplied by the number of years of service. The present law provides for 1 percent plus $25.

Next, S. 995 increases the annuity for children by providing a minimum of $750, but in no case shall the total annuity, where there are several children, be more than 40 percent of the employee's average salary.

S. 995 has an important disability provision. An employee who retires on disability would receive either the amount of annuity provided under the regular formula, if that amount is greater, or an amount equal to either 40 percent of his average salary or the sum obtained by increasing the total service of the employee to the number of years he would have had if the date of separation was at age 60, whichever is the lesser amount.

S. 995 makes a number of other changes in the present law, for example, lowering the optional retirement age from 62 to 60 after 15 but less than 30 years of service.

As I said previously, the provisions of S. 995 are complicated. Nevertheless, it should be of interest to each of you because if passed, the provisions of the retirement law would be greatly liberalized.

Another bill of great interest to those of you who wear uniforms is H. R. 179. It provides an allowance of $100 annually to each Federal employee required to wear uniforms whenever it is impracticable for his agency to furnish them. The agency is also required to be responsible for the cleaning and repair of uniforms, but if this is impracticable, the employee would be given an additional $25 annually.

There are four bills whose provisions are similar to those of H. R. 179.

Two bills of great interest to all postal employees are H. R. 243 and S. 411. They provide 26 days annual leave instead of the 15 you now have, and 15 days sick leave instead of the 10 you now receive.

A bill which is of primary interest to the association is H. R. 571. It provides for the recognition of the right of officers and representatives of Government employees' national organizations representing a majority of the employees of a department, agency, or subdivision, to present employee grievances, to confer with administrative officers on matters of policy affecting working conditions, to solicit membership, collect dues, and so on.

Another bill, H. R. 1353, establishes a minimum space requirement for post-office stations operated in any building leased by the United States.

Lastly, two bills of great importance to every civil servant of the United States Government are H. R. 418 and S. 412. Both these bills provide for optional retirement after 30 years of service.

Just before leaving Washington I discussed some of these matters with Congressman ED REES of Kansas, who is the ranking Republican member of the committee having this legislation under consideration. I think you all know ED REES to be a real friend of the postal workers for Bill Dougherty said not long ago to a group in Washington, "More benefits were received by postal workers during the Republican Eightieth Congress under the leadership of ED REES than at any other time in the history of this country."

I asked Mr. REES why we had not had some action on some of these pending bills in the committee. He told me that although the scheduling of the bills was up to the chairman of the committee, who is a member of the majority party, but nevertheless, it is the custom that such bills are considered after consultation with members of the Post Office Department, the Civil Service Commission, and the Bureau of the Budget.

He told me that the Bureau of the Budget has not yet acted upon the requests. I think you know as well as I do that the Bureau of the Budget is the right arm of the President and very much under his control. So you can see that the delay, at least until this time, is not the responsibility of the Congress but that of the executive branch of the Government.

To sum up briefly this discussion of bills of interest to postal employees, we have:

1. Bills to raise the pay of postal employees.
2. Bills revoking the Postmaster General's order of April 18, 1950, curtailing service.
3. Bills to increase the annuities of former postal employees now retired.
4. S. 995, greatly liberalizing the present provisions of the retirement law.
5. Bills providing uniforms for postal employees.
6. Bills providing equality in leave provisions with other Government employees.
7. H. R. 571, providing for organization recognition.
8. H. R. 1353, providing for minimum-space requirements.
9. Bills providing for optional retirement after 30 years of service.

In principle, I feel I can support these bills, which will, in my opinion, greatly benefit a very worthy group of loyal Government employees.

In its efforts to improve the lot of its individual members, the National Association of Letter Carriers is doing an excellent job, not only in the field of fostering legislation, but in what I shall call the benevolent field as well. I commend you for your efforts. Your mutual benefit association, your sick benefit association, and your hospitalization plan are all concrete evidence of your determination to be a fraternal as well as an occupational organization. An even more outstanding proof of the fraternal aspect of your organization is the fact that your total of 103,000 members in every State in the Union, in Hawaii and Puerto Rico, is greater than the sum total of regular letter carriers in the United States. That is a very great tribute to any organization. You have every right to be proud of it.

As you well know, an organization can only be as strong as its members are determined it shall be. As I mentioned previously, the fundamental purposes of your organization, as laid down in your constitution, are to represent the letter carriers and to improve the caliber of the postal service. To achieve these objectives, let me urge you to give your association strong, loyal, and continual support. It was founded on high ideals. Its accomplishments are many. It merits your faith, your pride, your devotion.

I, personally, feel that the Post Office Department—and that, of course, means you who are here before me—is doing a remarkable job under the pressure of constantly increasing mail volume. We are all well acquainted with the story of the almost legendary Pony Express which operated between St. Joseph, Mo., and California during a 16-month period beginning April 3, 1860. The Pony Express established for all time the tradition that "the mail must go through." The express was succeeded by the railroad and the railroad has been supplemented by the motor truck and the airplane. Even with all the changes in our civilization, with all our scientific advances, this tradition of the Pony Express still is an integral part of the Post Office. This standard of service has been set over the years, not by the administration in power, not by the Postmaster General, but by the employees of the Post Office themselves. You may well be proud of that standard and of your accomplishments achieved under it.

Third Anniversary of Israel as an Independent State

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, Israel has been a free nation such a short time, but into those few years it has concentrated a century of progress.

Colonialism and feudalism had kept the Middle East in bondage for so long that life in that area had become just a treadmill where generation succeeded generation with monotonous sameness.

It was then that the Jewish people, fighting to redeem a corner of their native land for their own use—and as a sanctuary in which their persecuted brethren from all over the world might find peace and opportunity—won their independence.

From that moment on, the sluggish East awakened to the fact that the ferment of freedom was working a modern day miracle in the desert, making it bloom with hope and effort and achievement.

We, as Americans, are proud of the remarkable development of Israel which is the most promising child born to world democracy in recent years.

At a time when some other peoples are surrending their birthright of human independence to a gluttonous state, in return for the security that is slavery, it is good to see the Jewish people proving anew that freedom alone can release the creative forces in every individual.

Israel reborn shows the dynamic power of the human spirit when it is liberated. Here is faith at work.

As in the United States, we are prone to point the material evidence first, as the yardstick of development, forgetting the freedom of inquiry and the freedom of action that inspire true progress.

The modern city of Tel Aviv, meaning Hill of Spring, is the showplace of the young Israeli State. In 1909, 66 families founded the new neighborhood of Tel Aviv on the sand dunes north of Jaffa. Today, with the latter incorporated within its boundaries, and nourished by the swelling tide of immigration, Tel Aviv's population has soared to more than 400,000. It is a new city in every sense of the word, with attractive and functional apartment buildings for the average citizen that make us ashamed of the slums in our own American cities.

Some westerners are apt to belittle Israel's magnificent growth against great odds, overlooking the fact that it was deficient in water and wood and virgin soil.

They say it was easy because the Jews were one people and united.

This is not so. In addition to overcoming many economic, political, and natural obstacles, the new nation had to find a modus vivendi that would harmonize conflicting social tensions. The people in Israel have come from all corners of the world, separate from one another in more than fifty different ways. And the problem was further complicated by differences in language, background, and viewpoint. Some of them still suffer from the effects of the physical and mental persecution to which they were subjected in other lands.

In the United States, we measure human progress in terms of development from a normal base. In Israel, there was the prior need of rehabilitation before such progress could be made. That the young nation is succeeding in both, and at the same time, is double proof of its indomitable spirit.

The Jewish people have a great culture, rooted in a brilliant past. But they are not content to rest upon the past like some civilizations that aged and died because they built upon the material rather than the eternal vigor of mind and spirit. In Israel today they are building with all the physical eagerness of youth that also has the wisdom to know how to make the things of life serve the capacities of the human spirit. This is the secret of its liberation. The city of Tel Aviv is the expression of it that meets the eye. But it is within the homes and shops and factories that we see, hear, feel, and share the unfolding story of individual happiness and fulfillment that approximates the goal of brotherhood.

The needs of man himself, in relation to his changing environment, are being given every opportunity in the new society that is being created out of a wilderness.

In the United States, we once had a wilderness of trees.

Now we have a traffic of man-made things, which can become instruments for good or evil, in proportion to the way in which they encourage or retard the yearnings of the human spirit.

Uncle Sam and young Israel are akin. I think we can help one another.

1951 marks another birthday for the youngster, his third and his very own. He will be growing up before we know it. Time to take him into the family business of producing peace and opportunity for all the customers in this world. Israel will be a good partner in that job.

That is what we are thinking as we say: "Happy birthday from our hearts to yours."

Twelve Anti-Red Poles Escape Iron Curtain in Iron Horses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article by the Associated Press entitled "Twelve Anti-Red Poles Escape Iron Curtain in Iron Horses."

Mr. Speaker, further evidence of the effectiveness of the Voice of America can be found in this news report of how the Voice of America reaches behind the iron curtain:

[From the Washington Star of April 28, 1951]

TWELVE ANTI-RED POLES ESCAPE IRON CURTAIN IN IRON HORSES

BRUSSELS, BELGIUM, April 28.—Broadcasts by the Voice of America and the British Broadcasting Corp. inspired 12 Polish rail workers to flee their Communist homeland in two stolen locomotives and seek refuge in Western Europe, it was learned last night.

With the help of a forged collective passport, the freedom-loving 12 broke through the iron curtain and made a 17-day journey across Germany to Courtrai, Belgium. Not even the Russian border guards in East Germany questioned their credentials.

Five of the escapees have been given asylum in Belgium. The other seven continued on to France.

One of the railroaders, Stanislav Oles, told newsmen this version of the escape:

Two Belgian-made locomotives broke down and Polish officials ordered them sent to Belgium for repairs. Six good Communists were supposed to take the engines, but the 12 nonconformists steamed off in their stead. And with the help of their forged passport and the connivance of a minor railroad official they made their escape without being questioned.

Oles said he and his friends, several of whom had been threatened with arrest for their opposition to the Red regime, had heard about the free-labor organizations of the Western World through Voice of America and BBC broadcasts.

Oles said some 2,500 Polish railroaders are under arrest for antigovernment activity. He added:

"You can imagine how many more are taking part in the anti-Communist underground fight in Poland."

Ballantine Emergency Disaster Relief Unit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I wish to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an account of the incorporation of a Ballantine emergency disaster relief unit into the civil defense plan, of Hamden, Conn., whose authorities immediately pledged the equipment to mutual use by neighboring New Haven.

This pattern, which I am hopeful that other private concerns in Connecticut will follow, was set through the courtesy of the Hamden branch of P. Ballantine & Sons, of Newark, of which Mr. Stanhope B. Healey is manager.

Each truck contains an emergency unit kit consisting of a blanket, a stretcher, a pickax, shovels, first-aid equipment, fuses and flares, storage lights, canvas, lengths of rope, and extension ladders. Ten trucks with this equipment are always on immediate call. A "spot convoy" available in 10 minutes, consists of six closed route trucks and three supervisors' coupes, all manned by personnel experienced in first aid, who will receive additional training in rescue and evacuation work.

A demonstration by a token unit of five trucks so equipped and manned was held in front of the New Haven City Hall on May 2 and showed how the unit may serve for evacuation purposes or as supply transports, and also how it is convertible into mobile kitchens or first-aid stations.

The value of this plan lies in the fact that it immeasurably strengthens our official civil defense preparations without any added expense to Government.

It solves a specific problem that has long vexed civil defense authorities, hampered by small budgets that made inevitable a shortage of transportation. For whether in Hamden, New Haven, or elsewhere in my district, authorities have found it impractical to provide special vehicles for emergency disasters that all hope may never happen.

Acting for Mr. Healey, George Mahoney, sales manager, and Paul McFarland, operator of the truck fleet, pledged 50 Ballantine trucks to First Selectman Michael J. Whalen, of Hamden, for use in event of a major disaster.

This plan for voluntary cooperation with civilian defense efforts was first formulated a year ago by Mr. Carl Badenhausen, president of Ballantine, after the disastrous South Amboy, N. J., munitions explosion.

I am happy also to report that the cooperation of organized labor in this gesture of cooperation toward our civil defense was pledged by James McGrail, president of the local brewery workers, and Matthew Ruppolo, head of the local teamsters' union.

Now it is my constant hope that necessity will never call this emergency disaster unit into use. But it is also my belief that the better we are prepared, against either catastrophe or a potential enemy, the less likely it is to strike.

Mother's Day, 1951

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege and honor to deliver the address at the twenty-seventh annual Mothers' Day ceremonies sponsored by the American War Mothers which was held at the tomb of the Unknown Soldier, Amphitheater, Arlington National Cemetery, on Sunday, May 13, 1951.

The address follows:

Madam Chairman, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, the honor of participating in the twenty-seventh annual Mother's Day ceremonies sponsored by such a distinguished organization as the American War Mothers is one of which I am exceedingly proud. Your organization reflects the true spirit of American motherhood, for you symbolize the patriotic service made by the mothers of America in freely offering their sons and daughters to bear arms, and if need be, to die in defense of liberty and justice.

On this Mother's Day, Sunday, May 13, 1951, America salutes you as it pays homage to the mothers of our country.

It is fitting that we set aside one day out of each year, as a reminder of the love and reverence we owe our mothers, and which in truth, we should express every day of our lives.

The name "mother," is one of the most beautiful expressions in the language of mankind, because it embodies the finest personality on earth. When one mentions the name of "Mother," it calls up all the sweet and noble qualities of human life, because from her, radiates all the purest and holiest aspirations of one's nature.

We honor ourselves when we honor our mother. We need the inspiration of her unselfish spirit. We are all nobler for thinking of mother, for paying tribute to her virtues, and for remembering her many sacrifices. No man or woman can afford to get beyond the sway of her gentle spirit, and to keep within its influence, we honor her on Mother's Day.

In our observance, we pause in the hectic struggle of world and personal affairs to eulogize a mother's love—an influence far stronger for right living—than all the world's philosophies, diplomacy, and wars.

In 1914, when Congress approved a joint resolution establishing Mother's Day, it did so on the eve of America's entry into the first of two global wars. Millions in these two great conflicts lost their lives, including thousands of the flower of American manhood. In addition, we expended the resources of our country in opposing the new ideologies that challenged the cherished possessions of all Americans. This challenge is still with us and grows more menacing with each succeeding day.

As we pause on this May 13, 1951, to observe the thirty-seventh anniversary of Mother's Day, we realize only too well, that we are living in a confused and bewildered world. In Korea, American boys are dying daily, while world diplomats tussle with the problem of averting a third world war too destructive to contemplate.

Despite the efforts made to formulate a just and lasting peace, the goal has not been reached, because the hearts of mankind are not yet attuned to the spirit of universal love, which is essential if the family of nations expect to dwell in harmony with each other.

History is replete, with the experiences of nation after nation, who sought power and glory through conquest and subjugation. It is written on the memories of mankind, that the nation that forgot God, and refused to recognize the human dignity of every creature created by Him, traveled the road to ruin and oblivion.

Yet, how short is the memory of man? Regardless of the lessons from history of the utter destruction of ancient empires, our minds were refreshed during the present twentieth century by the fate that befell modern dictators, who have trod the same path to destruction that their counterparts traversed in the dim and distant past.

We erroneously thought we had learned a costly lesson from World War I, but our entry into World War II was a grim reminder that the armistice of 1918 settled nothing, but was truly, as Webster defines the word—"merely a cessation of hostilities."

We are at this moment within the shadows of the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier—a hero of World War I whose real identity is known only to God. What a mockery it is to realize that since his heroic death thousands of American boys, just as eager and patriotic, have been sacrificed on the altar of freedom in a second global war; and, at the moment, we can literally hear the sounds of the violent gunfire on the rice paddies of Korea, as thousands of American fathers and mothers receive the dreaded news from the Department of Defense that a loving and devoted son has lost his life in what may prove to be merely a prelude to a third world conflict.

Meanwhile, the quest for peace and understanding among all nations eludes our grasp because those who fashion world affairs have lost their sense of moral values, and insist on decisions that benefit them alone. This moral degeneracy has been nurtured because a godless philosophy has supplanted the Christian idea of love and brotherhood.

There is not a mother worthy of the name, regardless of her racial origin, who has not counseled her children as to the difference between right and wrong. This sound advice has been given in various tongues since time immemorial, but interpreted the same the world over, as the eternal characteristic of every mother—the intense desire to see her child develop courage, resourcefulness, and virtue. These lessons she has taught her child from infancy, whether she may have been lacking in formal education or the possessor of a college degree. In short, it is the basis of mother love and devotion, and intended as lessons in character building.

Unfortunately, those obstructionists to world peace for the greater part, come from homes where in early childhood they were taught the truths of Christianity. Yes; at their mothers' knees they learned the first prayers of babyhood, and were given additional training in the love and fear of God during their boyhood years. Then as they reached man's estate, they faltered, and embraced the false philosophies that were man-made concepts, and devoid of Christian principles. They were the same philosophies of government, that ancient empires adhered to, and which led them down the road to national ruin. Paganistic in their basic principles, the prime objective is to relegate God to the background, and to ridicule and defy Him.

Is there any wonder, with such an international background of moral depravity, that we grope for a peace that we cannot reach, because of the baseness of men's hearts—the men who literally hold the destiny and the welfare of millions of God's creatures in the very palms of their hands.

Yet, while we pass judgment on the rest of humanity, it is well to remember that we Americans have also departed from the path of right living, and, in doing so, have spurned the teachings that in early life were intended to serve us as a shield against the temptations that we were warned to expect.

We pride ourselves on being the strongest nation on the face of the globe, but are we certain that an inventory of our national strength does not disclose that it is of a material nature and lacking in spiritual values?

It is true that recent reports indicate that there has been a marked increase in the number of people returning to church. This is indicative of the fact that the basic convictions of the American people are rooted in firm ground, but our tendency to become indifferent is an attribute that could easily lead us into serious difficulty.

We practice the virtue of Christian charity to such a degree that we have poured billions of dollars into projects and programs designed to rehabilitate the war-torn countries. These programs, while commendable, are often undertaken while the needs of our own citizens are ignored, especially those who have reached the twilight of life and find the day's burden more than they can bear.

Our indifference is also a matter of national concern, as we witness the exposure of persons appointed to high places in our Government who have succumbed to temptation in accepting bribes for exerting their influence in a questionable manner.

Then, too, we hardly lift an eyebrow as we read of the betrayal of our country by trusted Government employees who, while in the custody of secret information, have for personal gain furnished such data to foreign agents, and especially to the representatives of a country that poses the greatest threat to our national existence ever recorded.

We are indifferent to the wave of crime that has engulfed us, and which has been accompanied by the revelation that the police department in the greatest city in the Nation is involved. The Nation-wide crime syndicate has invaded various phases of everyday life, and continues to collect billions of dollars annually from the pockets of the rank and file of American citizenry.

Yes, ladies and gentlemen, the example of these gangsters has brought a corresponding problem of national significance in the extent of juvenile delinquency in this Nation, which has been traced to refusal, on the part of a misguided portion of our teen-age population, to follow the counsel of their parents.

It is to the credit of Hon. J. Edgar Hoover, and to many outstanding leaders in the field of education, that we are being aroused from our spirit of indifference, and brought to realize that juvenile delinquency is a problem that, unless it is solved in a practical manner, can surely serve as a reservoir from which potential criminals may be recruited by the crime syndicate that is no respector of persons in carrying on its far-flung activities.

As we celebrate Mother's Day this year, we realize that there are thousands of good mothers with saddened hearts, because their children have scorned their painstaking efforts to guide their feet along the path of virtue, and instead, have brought disgrace to themselves and those whose love for them knows no bounds despite their wayward attitude.

When you meditate on these observations I have given you, of our laxity as individuals to the happenings around us in our everyday lives, it is not hard to realize that our indifference serves as an incentive for lawless conduct, in every phase of our existence. We are knowingly or unknowingly encouraging practices that endanger our form of government, and that if unchecked will eventually bankrupt us morally and spiritually.

On this Mother's Day, let us face the challenge that confronts us as a Nation by rededicating our own lives to the ideals that our mothers held so sacred, and for which they gave their all so unselfishly.

Let us show our appreciation, our honor and respect, for the memory of the motherhood of America, by caring for the living.

May the blessed memories of our God-fearing, self-sacrificing, and sainted mothers always be an inspiration, and a guiding star in our lives—until that day—when by the grace and mercy of God, we shall meet our mothers in that blessed land, where life is eternal, and from whence no traveler shall ever return.

National Guard Recruiting Program as It Concerns 18-Year-Olds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. HART
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith a letter forwarded to me by Maj. Gen. D. W. McGowan, commanding, New Jersey National Guard. It relates to certain misunderstandings concerning the recruiting program of the National Guard as it concerns youths 18 years of age. Also, as part of the extension of my remarks, I insert herewith two newspaper items, one containing the expression of General McGowan's views relating to this subject, and the other being an open letter by General McGowan to parents of high-school boys answering certain questions existing in their minds.

The above-mentioned follows:

NEW JERSEY NATIONAL GUARD,
FIFTIETH ARMORED DIVISION,
Newark, N. J., March 14, 1951.

Hon. EDWARD J. HART,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I know that you will be interested as a friend of the National Guard and because our recruiting effort might readily be misconstrued, and also because you will want to have the facts in the event you receive any letters concerning the National Guard recruiting program as it concerns 18-year-olds.

In all our recruiting efforts, and especially in the advertisement of which I enclose a copy, I personally insured that no one could feel that we were offering means of avoiding military service. Rather we urge they commence basic military training with the National Guard now, while continuing their schooling.

We have pointed out their rights under existing legislation, to assist them to exercise that choice offered by legislation which, in effect, permits them to choose their own outfit and serve with their friends.

Our traditional volunteer system, to which this country has always clung, has always had to be supported by some form of compulsory military service. But, even though enlistments are frequently brought about by reason of the threat of compulsory service, the choice extended to individuals under current and proposed legislation is a welcome means of avoiding the feeling on the part of the youth of our country that they are "conscripts," but are rather "volunteers" or "selectees."

We of the National Guard have repeatedly urged a phased induction of all the National Guard. We agree with the published views of many Members of Congress that it is hard to reconcile the request by the Department of Defense for induction of greater numbers of our young men, when 250,000 volunteers in the National Guard are available and joined the guard expressly for service in time of national emergency.

The National Guard never has been, and can never become, a haven for draft dodgers.

Sincerely,

D. W. McGOWAN,
Major General, New Jersey National Guard, Commanding.

GUARD CHARGE IRKS MCGOWAN—JERSEY COMMANDER HITS CLAIM SERVICE IS DRAFT DODGERS' HAVEN

Maj. Gen. Donald W. McGowan, comanding general of the New Jersey National Guard, today took exception to charges made in Washington that the National Guard is a haven for draft dodgers. He said that the important position the guard plays in national defense has been repeatedly stressed by Gen. J. Lawton Collins, Army Chief of Staff.

Speaking of the Jersey Guard McGowan said:

"The New Jersey National Guard has served in every war of the Republic. During my 34 years of service, it was ordered into Federal service three times—in 1916 for duty on the Mexican border, the following year for service in World War I, and again in 1940 for World War II. And now, for the fourth time, New Jersey units are again in Federal service.

"Units of the New Jersey National Guard distinguished themselves in combat overseas in both world wars. The service these units rendered their country in time of war stands as an indisputable answer to any charges that the National Guard is a haven for these who would avoid service to their country."

AN OPEN LETTER TO PARENTS OF HIGH SCHOOL BOYS

There must be many questions in your minds about the effect of current draft policies on your boy's future; whether he is subject to military service; how he can perform this service; and, how he can continue his schooling—all pertinent questions today. The New Jersey National Guard can supply answers to these questions.

If your son joins a National Guard unit before he becomes 18½ years of age, he is not subject to induction by the draft.

If he is over 18½, but joins a National Guard unit before his local board mails his order to report for his draft physical examination, he will not be drafted under current Department of Defense regulations.

As a member of the National Guard, your son will not be called up for active duty unless his unit is inducted into Federal service. He has an opportunity to get his basic military training while continuing his high school education.

Information on current selective-service policies, and the advantages of National Guard membership, will be presented at a meeting to be held in your local high school during the next 2 weeks, to which all draft-eligible students will be invited. I strongly recommend that your son inquire at your high school about this meeting and that he be sure to attend.

Information is available also at local National Guard Armories every day and evening, Monday through Friday.

I sincerely believe that the New Jersey National Guard offers your son a splendid opportunity to serve his country while continuing his education.

D. W. McGOWAN,
Major General, New Jersey National Guard, Commanding.

Immediate Aid to India

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following self-explanatory telegram that I have received:

Representative THOMAS J. LANE,
Congressional Chambers,
Washington, D. C.

The Massachusetts Congregational Conference having a constituency of 600 churches, 190,000 members, urges Massachusetts delegation in Congress use every effort to have food relief sent to India immediately in accord with the following resolution passed unanimously this morning by the Massachusetts Congregational Conference and Missionary Society:

"For months India has been in desperate need of grain, because of a critical shortage in her domestic production caused by flood and other factors. Meantime, we have had in storage millions of tons of surplus wheat which might have been related to the needs of the people of India. On February 12, 1951, President Truman called on the Congress to take immediate steps to send food to India. However, effective steps yet remain to be taken. It is our conviction that American help should be extended to India without delay as an expression of the Christian good will of the people of America to the people of India: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we urge Congress to hasten the passage of effective legislation necessary for expediting the sending of American grain to India."

MYRON W. FOWELL,
Secretary.

Boys Advised To Look Beyond Immediate Future

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial written by Walter F. Wright, Jr., a fine, thoughtful young American, a student in the Shaddock School, Faribault, Minn.

His editorial was selected to appear in the school's winter, 1951, quarterly, and is worthy of space in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Congress, so that many thousands of Americans may read with profit to themselves.

My compliments to the author, Walter F. Wright, Jr.:

ADVISES BOYS TO LOOK BEYOND IMMEDIATE FUTURE

(A sample of the thinking being done by seniors at Shattuck is reflected in the following editorial written by Walter F. Wright Jr. of Onawa, Iowa, which is reprinted from the Spectator of January 24, 1951.)

Each day as we look into the newspapers, it seems that the situation the world is in becomes darker and darker. The threat of another world war looms over us as each day passes. Indeed a third world war seems imminent as shown by the fact that Government officials are mobilizing a force to excel the forces that fought in World War II. At the present time a bill is before Congress to lower the draft age to 18-years.

The youth of America are preparing to enter into a war which may cause many times more devastation and destruction than World War II ever experienced. Many of these young men look upon another war as the end of everything. Some even believe it will mean the termination of life itself. This is, however, a flagrant misconception. An atomic bomb, or even a hydrogen bomb cannot wipe out the population of the entire earth. We should not therefore lose hope that there will be a future. Our future goal should be set now. This world situation must not interfere with plans for the future. The war should be considered merely as an interval between the present and the future.

After the world situation is settled and peace reigns once more over the earth, it will be up to the present generation to lead the world and see that a peaceful world is maintained. This generation will have problems which have never before confronted man. Therefore this is not the time for forgetting what lies ahead beyond the immediate future.

Polish Constitution Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an address delivered at the Polish National Home, Hartford, Conn., on Sunday, May 13, which address also was broadcast over the facilities of Station WKNB, New Britain:

Mr. President and members of the Connecticut Polish American Congress, officers and members of the combined societies, honored guests, ladies, and gentlemen, it is with a feeling of deepest pride that I have returned from Washington to be with this large gathering today, at this fine Polish National Home, celebrating the greatest of all Polish national holidays.

This is an observance of the one hundred and sixtieth anniversary of the Constitution of May 3, 1791.

Coincidentally, today is Mother's Day. I warmly congratulate all mothers on this day especially set aside for honoring them. I, also, extend my deepest sympathy to the large number of Polish Gold Star Mothers of Connecticut who have given our country sons whose lives were sacrificed in the name of freedom.

What, many ask me, is the meaning to the Polish people of May 3, Constitution Day? What, exactly, does it signify since Poland's history goes back more than a thousand years?

Before answering that question directly, let me note that many occasions for celebration arise in the course of each year among our various national groups. Each means something, but not in every case is the meaning behind the celebration solemn and moving.

In the case of May 3, however, it is. The significance of May 3 goes deep, to the very foundation and bedrock of the Polish national tradition. To all Poles this day has the celebrated meaning of our own American Fourth of July.

To all Americans of whatever origin, the meaning of May 3, 1791, should have a solemn and profound meaning because Poland's Constitution was modeled after our own Constitution, which was adopted only 2 years earlier.

In Philadelphia, and Paris, at that time, the problem was to extend liberty. A heritage of regimentation, of a state controlling man's freedom as an individual, had to be abolished. In Poland, in Warsaw, it was just the opposite: to restrain freedom. The old "golden liberty" of the gentry, the unlimited, boundless liberty which is in effect license, had to be given up. In its place a measure of liberty, restrained by order, had to be dealt out to the aspiring and eager middle and farming classes, too long shut out from the benefits of freedom's gold.

The constitution makers of Poland did not dodge the issue. Quickly they performed the task required of them by the peculiar circumstances of Poland's peculiar history. First they proclaimed dead, once and for all, the old, unrestrained liberty. Then, joining hands, as it were, in a mystic union with the constitution makers of our own country and France, they raised the standard of liberty with restraint, of liberty with order.

Here we have the inner, the deep and memorable significance of the constitution of May 3, to which we refer so reverently. In the hour of crisis, Poland had the energy and vision to redeem herself. In the face of every odd, Poland demonstrated that she was capable of going forward, with our own newly emerging United States and with the new France, on the road to modern statehood.

A new Poland was thus forged in 1791, by the hands of a band of patriots. It was a Poland firmly grounded in that principle of liberty with order which is the foundation for our own national life here in the United States.

Proclaim it abroad, therefore, all you who are of Polish origin, that here is the reason for our celebration of May 3 each year. May 3, let it be known, represents a demonstration for all time of Poland's inner, spontaneous vitality, and of her devotion to the great principle of liberty qualified by restraint.

The recognition of equality of all men, the proclamation of religious liberty promised in this constitution, were more than Russia, Prussia, and Austria could tolerate, so these three neighboring countries attacked Poland with full force on all sides. Poland fell in 1795, and was partitioned by its attackers. But, the May 3 constitution kept the spark of spirit and hope alive in the Polish people, because it infused them with a new patriotism and love of liberty.

It was 127 years later, for it was not until 1918 that the people of Poland regained their independence from bondage, their Republic was restored, and with a few technical changes, the new government was set up along the lines of the constitution of May 3, 1791.

Once again Poland flourished as an independent nation, her people enjoying the privileges of democratic living. Not for too long, however, because a happy, progressive, prosperous, free, and independent Poland was blotted out by World War II.

First, Germany invaded Poland and enslaved its people. Then, the Russians took over and made a mockery of freedom and all the principles set forth in the May 3 constitution.

You will say with me that it is unthinkable that Poland should have suffered this fate: betrayal because of idealism. But, to so many here present, and to those within the sound of my voice, the betrayal of Poland and the Polish people who knew in 1939 that in defying the dictatorship of Hitler and at the same moment defying that also of Stalin, is something of which all are familiar.

The 6,000,000 Polish casualties in the war; the heroic deeds of Polish soldiers, sailors, airmen not only in their homeland but from Africa to Norway; in the Baltic, the Atlantic and the Mediterranean; in France, England, and Italy; in every branch of service of our allies to which, at great risk of life in making their escape, they immediately joined up in order to fight back for freedom—all of this effort and sacrifice was betrayed by the infamous Yalta agreement. It happened exactly as the partitions happened. Promises were made by Poland's closest allies that her freedom would be restored. Instead, Poland's allies, outstanding among which was the United States, sold her down the river. It was a crime infinitely more reprehensible than anything that took place in the first three partitions, for at Yalta, we who were supposed to be her friends, committed the deed.

I am daily becoming more convinced that the American people are realizing the enormity of what was visited on the Polish race at Yalta. They are also asking about Tehran and Potsdam. None of these pacts or agreements were ever presented to the United States Senate for acceptance or rejection. The question today extends to the enslavement by communism of China since her independence, like that of Poland, is destroyed, her territorial integrity is violated and liberty ruthlessly denied.

It was in these agreements, as well as by subsequent policies and actions, American leadership sought to buy Stalin's favor at the price of the independence and integrity of both Poland and China, and at the price of our own honor. Such promises as we received, in return, from Soviet Russia were broken almost as soon as they were given. And, while we are at it, we must never forget the people of Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, who are jailed behind the iron curtain, and the other neighbors of Poland in Hungary, Rumania, Czechoslovakia who once, not so very long ago, also knew the meaning of freedom.

It was Dr. Arthur Coleman, president of Alliance College, whose home has been here in Cheshire, Conn., who said that "If the Constitution of May 3, 1791, had been permitted to perform its work, if the new Poland it created had been left to develop, it is probable the American national strain would never have been enriched, as it has been, by so vast an outpouring of heroic Polish blood. For Poland would have been a good country to live in, and there would have been no need to emigrate in order to find liberty."

From the outline I have endeavored to give you today, there are lessons for Americans in Poland's Constitution Day celebration, tardy though we may be in heeding them. Outstanding is the lesson that there can be no hope for peace, or for the preservation even of our own liberties, so long as we permit our leaders to barter away other people's freedom, whether they are the peoples of Poland or China or Formosa. It is the lesson that truly nothing can bring us peace but the triumph of principle.

Our American determination and American faith in the fundamental principles on which this country was founded and grew to power must not fade away. America was founded as a Christian nation devoted to the preservation of human freedom, with authority, and strength, stemming from the people themselves. I have hope that time has not robbed us of that devotion to principles and devotion to God. If it has not, the people themselves will fix the proper course. And that course will lead to victory for the men still locked in battle. It can lead to a preservation of the peace they will win. That is the hope that must never simply fade away. By our determination to preserve our own liberties and freedom guaranteed by our Constitution, we will keep the torch of freedom burning in the hearts of every Pole who has faith and belief in the freedoms and independence of the May 3 constitution, which he and she looks forward to again enjoying. Such was the intention of the signers of Poland's historic constitution, adopted 160 years ago.

We Agree With Mr. Gamble

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Daily Times, Mamaroneck, N. Y., for May 12, 1951:

WE AGREE WITH MR. GAMBLE

Charles E. Wilson, of Scarsdale, Director of Defense Mobilization, appeared recently before the House Committee on Banking and Currency in Washington to outline the progress and suggest amendments to the defense program. So satisfactory to the committee was his testimony, in marked contrast to others upon occasion, that Representative RALPH A. GAMBLE, of Larchmont, committee member, said:

"Mr. Chairman, I just want the members of this committee to know I am very proud of Mr. Wilson. He is a constituent, and on behalf of the Twenty-eighth District of New York, we are very proud of the great job he is doing and we hope he stays here during the whole course of this 'police engagement.'"

With that sentiment we are sure not only the Twenty-eighth Congressional District but all of Westchester is in sincere agreement.

And, we do not doubt in the least, so is also a large preponderance of the American people.

Registration of Firearms—Organization of a Hunters' Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 25, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, a number of excellent sports authorities have voiced their approval of bills H. R. 3023 and H. R. 2897, concerning the registration of firearms and the organization of a hunters' corps to protect the United States. I am grateful for such valued assistance.

In the May 1951 issue of Sports Afield, Mr. Michael Hudoba, managing editor of this large publication, writes as follows:

The Congress has another chance to save the tiny key deer from extinction; that is, should it act promptly on bill H. R. 2897 by Representative WILLIAM LANTAFF, Democrat, Flordia, to set up a wildlife management area in Florida for this unique species.

Pending in the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, the bill provides a ceiling of $100,000 in establishing the management area. It was the lack of such a ceiling that killed the key deer bill in the previous Congress.

Whether it is already too late to save the estimated 25 to 50 specimens of this unique deer believed to be left is a question. Certainly Congress cannot afford to delay consideration of the measure. The tiny key deer weighs less than 50 pounds, stands about 26 inches high and measures about 38 inches from nose to tail. It is believed to be the stag described by Columbus—the first American deer seen by white men.

A hunters' corps to guard the home front is proposed by Representative EDWIN A. HALL, Republican, New York, in bill H. R. 2237, referred to the House Armed Services Committee. The volunteer army of home-front hunters and sportsmen, designed to strengthen national defense, would be neither in the draft nor armed services but would revolve around local sportsmen's organizations. Army officers would be detailed to assist in coordination of the local programs.

The sportsmen's firearms would be the primary weapons. And here is a negative feature of the proposed legislation: It provides for permits to be issued for such guns. This provision could become a wedge for registration. To prevent this, Representative HALL has introduced another bill, H. R. 3023 (for which see following item).

Ammunition would be made available to this auxiliary force by the Secretary of Defense through regular business channels.

When Representative HALL recently proposed a similar plan as an amendment to the civil defense bill, it was turned down by the Congress (see March report). He said then that the sportsman is the best home-front defense because the hunter is not only a woodsman and good shot, but also is familiar with the local terrain and thus could become a guerrilla defender in case of invasion.

It goes without saying that should this eventuality occur, the American sportsman would know what to do, and do it.

A firearms antiregistration bill (H. R. 3023) was introduced by Representative EDWIN A. HALL, Republican, New York, to supplement his hunters' corps proposal (see above), and referred to the House Ways and Means Committee. It would prohibit registration of firearms already issued legally and protect citizens against unconstitutional seizure of private weapons.

Mr. HALL uses strong language against firearms-registration efforts and should Congress pass the bill as written, its words would affirm in statute what most sportsmen have said in their fights against previous attempts to register firearms. The bill reads:

"Whereas during World War II, Nazi-minded officers attempted to pass laws abridging the constitutional right of a private citizen to bear arms; and these same officers started their anti-American program by calling for registration of all privately owned firearms; and whereas our founding fathers wisely incorporated within the Constitution of the United States this inherent privilege of our citizens to protect their hearths and homes by possessing arms; and whereas in the several States, the revival of tyranny is asserting itself in the form of proposals to register all legally issued private weapons with design to eventual seizure of firearms owned by individual citizens; therefore no citizen shall be compelled to register firearms which he is in legal possession of. * * * No Federal, State, or local officer shall have the power to seize firearms belonging to private citizens who legally possess them."

The St. Lawrence Seaway Project Is Not Economically Justified From the Standpoint of the Nation as a Whole, According to Gen. W. F. Heavey, of Houston, Tex.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, Gen. W. F. Heavey, representing the Port Houston and Texas Ports Association recently told the House Public Works Committee that the St. Lawrence seaway project if it ever becomes a reality would "rob already constructed channels of much of the traffic which justifies them today."

General Heavey's statement before the House Public Works Committee is commented upon in the following editorial appearing in the April 10, 1951, issue of the Houston (Tex.) Chronicle:

UNSOUND ST. LAWRENCE PLAN

The proposed St. Lawrence waterway project is, as Gen. W. F. Heavey testified in Washington Monday, not economically justified from the standpoint of the Nation as a whole."

General Heavey, representing Port Houston and the Texas Ports Association at a hearing held by the House Public Works Committee, protested that the project would "rob already-constructed channels of much of the traffic which justifies them today."

The St. Lawrence seaway idea was first advanced as a means of helping Midwest farmers, later as a hydroelectric project. Then national defense became the argument. Now the excuse is for transporting iron ore from Canadian mines to the sea with a national defense slant again.

But, as General Heavey pointed out, the project at the best can only barely be justified as a 27-foot channel. And that depth will not accommodate oceangoing steamers. To make it a 35-foot channel would cost more than $1,000,000,000—and again, at this time just as in 1941, we don't have the men, money, or materials to devote to it while fighting a war and preparing for a possibly much bigger one.

The St. Lawrence project would not create new tonnage. It is almost entirely a Canadian project, geographically. If the Canadians can see where it is economically justified, why don't we do as Raymond Moley suggested on this page Monday—let Canada build it?

The Pulitzer Prize and William H. Fitzpatrick

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. F. EDWARD HÉBERT
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, I have most definitely a very personal feeling and interest in addressing myself to the House today on the recent selection of William H. Fitzpatrick, editor of the New Orleans States, for the time-honored Pulitzer Prize Award for excellence in editorial writing.

I believe that this personal satisfaction which I take unto myself will be readily understood because of my long-time association with the New Orleans States and with Billy Fitzpatrick.

The New Orleans States is the only newspaper in American journalistic history, which has on two different occasions been awarded the Sigma Delta Chi plaque for courage in journalism. The first time that this award came to the New Orleans States I was privileged to have been the city editor of that newspaper. I left the city editor's desk to come to Congress and my successor was William H. Fitzpatrick. From city editor, as my successor, he subsequently became managing editor and editor of the New Orleans States and during this period the New Orleans States was again signally honored by receiving the Sigma Delta Chi plaque.

But Billy Fitzpatrick has gone beyond the achievements of his newspaper and has been acclaimed in his own personal right as the author of the series of editorials on Treaty by Government, which has signalled him out as an individual of ability.

Is it little wonder that I have such a personal feeling in this recognition.

These editorials are not new to the membership of this House. You are already familiar with them because I have previously brought them to your attention and have long ago placed them before you, even before they were brought to the attention of the Pulitzer committee.

It was this series of editorials which inspired me to propose a constitutional amendment to carry out their intent and purposes. I have already announced that I will introduce such a resolution in the Congress. The American Bar Association has in preparation at this time such a proposed amendment and I shall follow the pattern agreed upon by them in formally introducing the proposed amendment. When they are ready I am ready to bring the proposition before the Congress.

I have from time to time brought to your attention many other articles written by Billy Fitzpatrick because I have thought they contained sound thinking and fundamental Americanism.

Do not be misled into believing that in making these remarks and eulogizing this editor, that I have been in full accord with him at all times. I have opposed him most violently on occasions and perhaps may disagree with him in the future, but in doing so there is exhibited the very fundamentals of Americanism which Billy Fitzpatrick seeks to protect in this crusade of his, because crusade it is.

This accomplishment has not been easy. From my own observation I know of the hours and the hard work put into these editorials. They are the result of study and research and the ultimate result has been far more than merely a writing job of presentation.

Since his selection as winner of the Pulitzer prize, Mr. Fitzpatrick has been showered with congratulatory telegrams. It is as it should be. I have been delayed in recognizing him on this forum because of my absence at Eniwetok. Next Wednesday night in New Orleans he will be honored at a testimonial banquet by his fellow citizens. That is also as it should be and I shall have the privilege and honor of personally attending to join in the tribute which is his just due.

If the American way of life, as we understand it, is to be preserved, we need more editors of the type of William H. Fitzpatrick to carry the flag of battle and to sound the clarion call.

The tendency of compromise and appeasement fills the air too much these days. It is the weakness of the era in which we live.

Our need is not for strong men to defend the great structure of constitutional government but for stronger men to preserve the foundation upon which the structure has been builded.

Our need is not for strong voices to shout "Yes," but for articulate voices to make themselves heard when they say "No."

Nowhere are these requisites to be found more substantially than in the free press of this Nation as represented by the men and the women of journalism who are ready and willing to carry the torch for that in which they believe.

Here are some of the things which William H. Fitzpatrick has said and which bear repeating and which will probably be repeated many, many more times in the future:

The people of this country are the inheritors of liberties gained at great cost through the centuries.

These liberties—such as religious freedom, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of peaceful assembly, are endangered by such proposed treaties as the Genocide Convention, already submitted by the President to the Senate for ratification, and the Covenant for Human Rights, which is near completion in the United Nations.

These treaties invade the precincts of domestic law.

These treaties reduce the powers of the States while strengthening the powers of a centralized Government.

These treaties strengthen the powers of the executive branch of the Government, thus weakening the historic balance of the legislative, the executive, and the judicial.

These treaties, if ratified by the Senate and upheld by the Supreme Court, can destroy utterly our Bill of Rights and our form of government.

Here are words and admonitions which constitute more than a Pulitzer Award—they are words and admonitions of warning of things to come lest we take heed.

Think it over.

Leoffler's Friends May Halt Transfer of Public Golf Courses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Post of May 13, 1951:

OF PUBLINX COURSES—LEOFFLER'S FRIENDS MAY HALT TRANSFER

(By Thomas Winship)

Friends of local golf czar Severine G. Leoffler, Sr., are confident they can again block the transfer of the public golf courses here to the District Recreation Board.

Leoffler is rounding out his thirtieth year as holder of the profitable golf links concession. Last year he did about $600,000 gross business with the five courses. He receives an $11,500 salary, plus a sliding-scale percentage.

But starting this week, Leoffler faces a new threat to his regime.

A $275,000 fund to buy out Leoffler and transfer the courses to Recreation Board control is carried in the District budget, now pending before the House Subcommittee on District Appropriations.

This is the first year that the Commissioners have included the transfer money in their regular fiscal year budget request. The Recreation Board would repay the fund to the city government.

The Bates subcommittee concluded the closed hearings on the District budget last Friday. Public hearings for citizen spokesmen are slated to begin at 10 a. m. Thursday.

Representative JOE B. BATES, Democrat, Kentucky, is chairman of this subcommittee and, it was learned yesterday, he has predicted the transfer fund will not be approved, either by his subcommittee, the full Appropriations Committee or on the House floor.

A Republican member of the Bates subcommittee, EARL WILSON, Republican, Indiana, also said the golf transfer item "would undoubtedly be disallowed. I am basically opposed to Government operation of most activities. It is not the American way."

The Bates subcommittee rejected this transfer money last summer, but gave as its explanation the fact that final details of the transfer agreement between Interior and the recreation board had not been worked out.

The agreement now is signed, so the proposed transfer is facing its first clear-cut test.

The Board of Trade's park and recreation subcommittee is scheduled to meet Tuesday to decide finally whether it will recommend the transfer, back Leoffler, or straddle the issue.

The board group is expected to side with the recreation board in this fight because Leoffler and some recreation officials are members of the Board of Trade.

Since 1943, Harry S. Wender, recreation board chairman, and James E. Schwab, board vice chairman, have sought control of the public links as contemplated in the basic law creating the Recreation Commission in 1942.

Among Leoffler's supporters in the current controversy is Joseph C. Healy, a Justice Department attorney from Covington, Ky. Healy told the Washington Post that he is a friend of Leoffler's and an ardent golfer. "For these reasons I have done what I could to help Mr. Leoffler in this matter," he said.

Healy emphasized that he is not Leoffler's attorney; that he is just a supporter.

Healy described himself as a "good friend and great admirer" of Vice President ALBEN BARKLEY. The Veep confirmed his old acquaintance with Healy. Mr. BARKLEY said that neither he nor his office ever intervened in any way in the golf-course issue.

Healy said he sent letters to all Members of Congress last January defending Leoffler's regime as efficient and a money maker for Uncle Sam. This is denied by recreation board people.

Healy said he also has seen BATES on the golf-course question and plans to see him again this week.

BATES said yesterday that Healy has been in to see him twice since January. The first time was a "social call; the second on the golf matter," the Congressman said.

Said BATES: "I wouldn't know Leoffler if I saw him. But they tell me he's turned a profit for the Government. My position last year was simply this: I will not tolerate taking taxpayers' money to pay for a private operation, and then turn it over to a public agency, when a private operation is not costing the Government any money."

The most serious threat to Leoffler's golf-course control was the 1949 House subcommittee investigation of his operations. The inquiry was instigated by Representative L. MENDEL RIVERS, Democrat, South Carolina.

High point of the investigation was a charge by an auditor that his study of Leoffler's company books led him to believe that the concessionaire owed the Government $119,515 which should have been paid during the 5 years preceding 1949. Leoffler denied this and all other charges of irregular bookkeping.

The investigating subcommittee concluded its work by recommending that the golf links be transferred from the Interior Department, which would have put Leoffler out of business.

But a subcommittee-approved bill to accomplish that transfer was dropped when Interior at that point said it would effect the transfer without the bill.

As things stand now, Leoffler holds a 5-year contract (signed with Interior last January) which is subject to cancellation any time up to September 1, 1952, if funds are voted to transfer the courses to the Recreation Board.

The chances of a compromise between Loeffler and the Recreation Board—such as a transfer of the courses to Recreation but still run by Leoffler on concession—are slim, according to statements from both sides.

Wender and Schwab say they are not committed to how they would operate the course, directly or on concession. This will be decided after perhaps a 6-month to a year trial period, they say.

And Loeffler said last night, "I would not run the courses under Recreation for 5 minutes."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, when the current begins to sweep in increasing velocity or when the waves begin to mount in a wind-swept fury, the wise boatman carefully lays by and considers his course of action that he might safely reach the distant shore. In today's political arena we are aware on every hand of sweeping currents and rising waves of proposed action, yet we are not, as indeed we cannot be when the control of the elements is only partially in our hands, positive as to where these moving forces will lead us if we merely ride the current and bend with the on-rushing wind. All logic and historical evidence then demands that we carefully examine the underlying causal forces of the tempest and the goals which we seek over the horizon. For that reason I am calling our attention to an article by Wayne C. Williams, of Denver, Colo., in which he steps into the calm on the leeward side and carefully goes over the whole situation as his study has enabled him to do. Mr. Williams is an attorney, has served as attorney general of Colorado and also as an Assistant Attorney General for the Federal Department of Justice. He has taken this judicious temperament into the study of history and is the author of books on William Jennings Bryan and Abraham Lincoln. Accordingly, his view of the past is considerably broadened over one who has not done the research necessary to document a book. I cannot expect that all will take his evidence and conclusion carte blanche, but I do believe it constitutes a more sober view than seems popular at the moment and therefore I believe it has value to all, irrespective of conviction on this issue. There is room for divergence of opinion on as high a plane as this article is cast, and I think also that there is much more long-term gain to be had from examination and debate predicated upon the view that a better and more peaceful tomorrow is the end in view of today's deliberation and maneuver. Oriented by this perspective, it becomes possible to stick to unpopular policies which in the long run may bring about the goal of universal peace which in itself will make today's struggle worth while.

LINCOLN AND NOW TRUMAN

The most disheartening page of American history is that page telling of the attacks on Abraham Lincoln, at the crisis of the Civil War. The next most disheartening page is being written now.

This is not the place to retell history, but will any American turn back to the story by Sandburg, or any Lincoln historian, and read again of the fearful abuse, misjudgments, and attacks on the great Civil War President when he dismissed McClellan and struggled to find a general who could match the strategy of the brilliant Confederate generals and save the Union.

President Truman is passing through the same type of ordeal and there are enough parallels and analogies to cause us to pause and consider whether the present attacks upon the principles and policies of the man now in the White House will find justification at the bar of history.

There is every reason to believe that Truman's crisis will be much like Lincoln's and that in the long perspective of history Truman is due for a great vindication. I so predict. Not long ago the President said it takes 25 years for a President's policies to be truly judged and that it had taken that long, or even longer, for Lincoln or Wilson's policies to be correctly appraised. The President never uttered a truer historical judgment.

There are two supreme tests of greatness in a public official, especially as a President:

First, his principles, the goals he seeks. Second, successful leadership in a grave crisis. Apply these tests to Lincoln; how superbly he met them and how steadily his fame rises as the white light of history beats down upon that record.

Now it is submitted that Truman has faced the gravest crises that have confronted any President since Lincoln, and nearly all of them he has faced in peacetime.

What crises has he faced? And what decisions has he been called upon to make.

1. The support of Greece and Turkey against Russia and communism.

2. To join in forming an Atlantic Pact to resist communism and save Europe by helping to arm pact nations and prepare to offer military resistance to communism.

3. To sustain the U. N. by supporting with arms and American forces the Republic of South Korea against Russian and Chinese communism.

4. To defend and preserve the American way of life.

Here, with many minor supporting issues, are the grave and profound questions the President has faced and on which he has made decisions. All other decisions, questions, and issues relate to these fundamentals and must be resolved in the light of these profound issues. If the President, by his course, can prevent a world war and finally demonstrate to the war-thirsty communistic nations that the free world will meet force with force and stop their aggression, then mankind has turned a page in history and President Truman will stand forth in the annals of mankind as one of the greatest and truest of all American leaders who have ever sat in the Presidential chair.

His goals are clearly declared and no American can misunderstand them. They are to stop aggression, sustain the U. N., and lay the foundations for the future, permanent peace of the world.

Truman will be measured by these goals, by his efforts and measures and decisions to accomplish them, and the fortunes of any general, or any individual, will be but a single item or incident in the vast historical program now being unfolded before the eyes of this present generation.

Tested by these profound goals and plans Truman has made to sustain and accomplish them, we may well look ahead 25 years to see how much can be accomplished and measure Truman by that test, and by that test alone.

What becomes then of this hue and cry, this holocaust of adverse opinion sweeping over the land? Is this not just another example of mistaken judgment, of a capricious impulse, of hot and ill-timed, ill-judged opinion that has taken on the form of a wave that catches up the unsound and ill-formed judgments of many who haven't taken a second, sober thought about what is really involved in this grave crisis?

And do not the use of modern devices for rapidly spreading public opinion and forming too-hasty judgments tend to increase this very uncritical emotional sweep? Fanned by these and by a pure-blind partisanship—that has gone beyond all bounds of discretion and bids fair to test the limits of Americanism, subordinating Americanism to partisanship—are we not now actually seeing a duplication of the terrible mistakes made by mass emotionalism misjudgments exhibited in the Civil War?

One other factor must not be overlooked—the presence in the councils of the President of a staff of unusually sound, capable statesmen: General Marshall, the leaders of the State Department, including Acheson, Kennan, Jessup, Harriman, and a cabinet of sound advisers, all of whom have tested political, economic, and executive experience and international vision.

History will sustain those leaders who have counseled the President.

And let us remember, Lincoln, too, was threatened with impeachment and denounced by his own party in Congress, and that the famous Illinois country lawyer had the clearness of vision and wisdom to see clearly his great goals, and the courage to hold on to his convictions and fight through, despite the bitterest abuse and misrepresentations.

Said Wilson, at the height of his bitterest period of criticism, "Regardless of the effect upon my personal fortunes, I am willing to play for the verdict of mankind."

President Truman has great leaders and great examples to sustain him now.

Kaiser Steel Corp.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, as you all know, I am tremendously interested in the industrial development of the West, and particularly in the industrial development of the great State of California, which I have the honor to represent.

When Henry J. Kaiser began producing steel at his big Fontana plant in 1942 there was doubt in some quarters about how long the operation would continue. In the last 9 years Mr. Kaiser has answered the doubting Thomases. He has fostered one of the modern miracles of American industry. Today Kaiser Steel Corp. has taken its place with the country's 12 biggest steel producers.

I want the skeptics who said back in 1942 that Henry J. Kaiser would never make a success of the steel business to become acquainted with the record of Kaiser Steel Corp.

Earnings after taxes in 1950 were $10,952,583, and the ingot capacity of the company's huge plant has climbed to 1,380,000 tons annually.

Comparison of these figures with those of 26 steel producers listed in the current issue of Iron Age discloses that Kaiser Steel ranks tenth in earnings and twelfth in ingot capacity. Henry Kaiser has once again met the challenge to establish a new company in one of America's most competitive industries. The economy of the Nation, and particularly the West, is reaping the benefit of Mr. Kaiser's foresight and ability.

Mr. Kaiser also has successfully answered those critics of the Government's participation in the building of the Fontana plant by repaying last fall, 20 years before they were due, the balance of $123,305,000 in loans. The Government realized a return of virtually $1.23 for each dollar of its loans to build the west coast steel plant.

The success of Kaiser Steel Corp. in this highly competitive field has not resulted in complacency on the part of its executives. An expansion program is now under way to build an eighth open-hearth furnace and a new tin plate mill to supply the West's concentration of tin can manufacturing plants and food-canning industry. This is evidence that the Kaiser enterprises will continue to spearhead the industrialization of the West.

Privilege of Newspapermen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS B. HELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, no doubt the Members of this House read with a great deal of surprise the ruling in the case of Leonard Lyons, the well-known columnist of the New York Post, who refused to divulge confidential news sources. Mr. Lyons published in his column several items regarding the spies convicted in the recent Rosenberg atomic spy trial. The decision handed down by Federal Judge John C. Knox, of the southern district, New York, held that newspapermen were not privileged to withhold sources of information.

Judge Knox's ruling was made after counsel for Mrs. Ethel Rosenberg, a convicted spy, demanded that Mr. Lyons disclose the source of certain information he published about her. Lyons claimed professional privilege to avoid such disclosure, but Judge Knox held:

> As a newspaper reporter or a columnist, Mr. Lyons is not entitled to claim his privilege, which is akin to that which exists between a lawyer and his client, a minister and his penitent, or a doctor and his patient. I have gone into the law very carefully, and I find he has no such privilege.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that this ruling will adversely affect the freedom of the press. It was always my understanding—and I am sure also many of my colleagues were of the same view—that newspapermen and others dealing with public information have the professional privilege to refuse to divulge their sources of information. In fact, I feel it is their duty in the public interest not to disclose their sources. However, I can think of two types of cases where we should make exceptions to this general rule: First, where the security of our country is involved; second, where there is concealment of a crime.

In the case of Mr. Lyons, neither factor was involved. The items he published about Mrs. Rosenberg appeared after she had been found guilty as a spy and convicted. In my opinion, Mr. Lyons truly lived up to the code of ethics of his profession by refusing to name his sources of information and by upholding the principle of freedom of the press. I wish to commend him for the courageous stand he has taken in the matter. It is my view that the relationship between a newspaperman and his source is as sacred and privileged as that between a doctor and his patient, a lawyer and his client, and a minister and his penitent. This has been our custom and our practice for a long time; and if no such privilege exists under the law—as Judge Knox states—then let us establish this privilege as a legal fact.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the aforesaid, I am today introducing a bill which establishes for newspapermen and others dealing with public information, who are called to appear as witnesses in Federal courts, the privilege that they shall not be forced to reveal the sources from which they obtain their news. The bill provides two exceptions to this privilege: Where, in the opinion of the court, disclosure is necessary: First, in the interests of national security, or, second, to avoid the concealment of a crime. The privilege which would be established under this bill would apply to any person who is engaged in gathering or presenting news, whether for newspapers, periodicals, radio, or television.

From a technical standpoint, the first section of the bill amends title 28 of the United States Code—relating to the Federal judiciary and Federal judicial procedure—by adding at the end of chapter 119 thereof—which deals with evidence and witnesses—a new section establishing the privilege. The bill contains a section 2 which makes a necessary conforming change in title 28 to reflect, in the table of contents for chapter 119, the new section which is added to that chapter by the first section of the bill.

A very pertinent editorial covering this subject appeared in the New York World-Telegram and Sun on May 14, 1951. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am placing this editorial in the RECORD at this point:

NEWSPAPERMEN'S JUST CLAIM

Newspapermen have long contended that in refusing to divulge confidential news sources they should have the same privilege that now protects the confidential relations between lawyer and client, doctor and patient, clergyman and penitent.

At present, in Federal jurisdiction the newspaperman has no such privilege. This is the sum and substance of a ruling made from the bench this week by Federal Judge John C. Knox "after very carefully going into the law."

Since the ruling is general, merely noting it need prejudice neither the particular case before Judge Knox nor his now postponed decision on whether or not to order the particular newspaperman involved to divulge.

The general ruling itself, however, calls public attention anew to the crass injustice of discriminating against newspaper reporters by refusing them the statutory protection already given doctors, lawyers, clergymen, and nurses when these latter refuse to betray those who have trusted them.

In this State, after two Newburgh newspapermen had been jailed for contempt in 1948, State Senator Thomas C. Desmond and Assemblyman Lee B. Mailler sponsored a genuinely protective measure which the legislature only shunted into the law revision commission for a year's study.

But this commission recommended the next year nothing better than a weakened, emasculated bill which provided that any Supreme Court justice could, on petition and after a hearing, break through the newspaperman's privilege of silence and force a disclosure if the justice deemed it essential to the protection of the public interest.

Even this timid, half-hearted measure, which wasn't worth passing anyway, was defeated as usual with the help of lawyer-legislators who have always balked at seeing this lawyer's privilege extended to cover newspapermen.

Meanwhile, however, in States that already have confidence laws, including New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, executives report that such statutes have freed newspapermen to expose waste and corruption in public office, protected sources of information necessary to obtain news, enabled newsmen to help police in criminal matters, and give legal recognition to the code of ethics adhered to by reporters.

The press should never cease its fight to have this reporters' code respected and safeguarded against gags or jail threats, whether in State or Federal jurisdiction. Even Federal Judge Knox may one day have to change his ruling on a newspaperman's privilege.

Your Son and the Marines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an address delivered by Chaplain Patrick A. Killeen, United States Navy, on May 13, over the NBC radio network.

Chaplain Killeen's message, directed to the mothers of America—in particular to the mothers of our marines serving in Korea—deals with the seldom-touched side of the story of our fighting men. It considers their spiritual lives, and its words should impart a note of encouragement into our hearts. For men will only be as strong as their moral spirit is strong; and, if we should judge from Chaplain Killeen's words, our boys in Korea do possess that moral, spiritual strength.

The address follows:

YOUR SON AND THE MARINES

(By Father Patrick A. Killeen, lieutenant, junior grade, Chaplains' Corps, U. S. Navy, Marine Corps Schools, Quantico, Va.)

Today's Mother's Day will be the same wonderful day it has always been. In church mothers will hear themselves justly praised and even compared to the most holy of all mothers—our Blessed Mother. At home, amid the gay flowers and boxes of candy, they will be happy as they see their little John or Judy pledge their love with some inexpensive gift and a great big priceless hug. The new young mother will be happy as she holds her tiny infant in her arms, the evidence of her share in the God-given right of all mothers, to help in His work of creation. She will be happy as she joins all the mothers as they say "thank God for all of this."

In one way, however, this Mother's Day will be a sad one, for the radio and the newspapers give us a very dark picture of the world in which we live. Mothers with sons in service or just old enough to go in will have a heavy, aching heart as they read about Korea; as they see the friendly nations of the world fighting among themselves, while Russia gloatingly works the strings that bring all the godless puppet nations into action against us. It is with these mothers in particular that I should like to visit today to talk about your son and the marines.

At the present time the attention of all those connected with marines is drawn to the men of the First Division in Korea. Any news from Korea seems very close to me at this time, for the towns mentioned in the news releases are not merely names, but rather memories of charred remains of once happy villages. The filth and the mud, the cold and the weariness are all very real, for little more than a month ago I lived with them.

I see now how one-sided a picture we are getting from the newspaper accounts as we read the papers; we see nothing but the grim, horrible side of war which would tend to break the heart of any loving mother. Behind the news of the front page, however, there's a lot that would make you happy, would ease some of the burden from your heart, would make you proud that your son is a marine, as proud as I am to be able to say that I have served with them. I have learned what America can mean to a dying 18-year-old boy and have become a better citizen for it. I have learned how close we can really get to Almighty God on this earth, how utterly simple life can be when we put it all in His hands.

One story never mentioned in the papers that will make every marine mother proud took place on Christmas Eve in southern Korea. We had taken part in a sad but glorious page of our Marine history—the withdrawal from the Chosin Reservoir. We had crowded aboard transports at Hungnam to go to a rest area. Some said we might even go to Japan. Instead, we were unloaded at Pusan and then proceeded to a muddy bean patch and told, "Go to it; that's your rest camp; have a happy Christmas." Those words stung with bitter irony but now, looking back, I can honestly say that I have never spent a happier Christmas.

We set out to arrange for midnight mass in a natural hollow in that bean patch and before we knew it our marines had built an altar from some packing boxes and, by the miracle of Marine secret supply, even had it painted a gleaming white; our canopy was a tarpaulin stretched on a frame made of some lumber borrowed from the galley; our reredos was made of silk that one of the boys found in a native market and for decoration we had some trees brought in from the nearby hills. This was our church where your sons, with their marine spirit, saw to it that in spite of everything and everyone, they were going to have their midnight mass, to pay their homage to the newly born Son of God.

I tried to collect some thoughts for a sermon, but it was rather difficult, for there seemed to be nothing to make that a happy Christmas. As I began to go over the happenings of the past few weeks even the quiet of the tent was broken by the hacking cough of one of our priests who was on the verge of pneumonia from his exposure to the extreme cold. The past came to mind with amazing clearness. Two of our priests lay wounded in hospitals in Japan, one fighting for his very life, wounded as he brought the Son of God to your sons, their marines. One of the clerks, who would be helping us now, lay buried in the frozen ground at Kotori killed at the side of his chaplain. Another boy who would be serving our mass, as he had done every day while we were surrounded, now lay dead up there, killed as he fought to help other marines. These thoughts and many like them were passing through my mind when I heard one lad outside say to another. "We don't have an awful lot this Christmas but I'm sure glad that we can get to midnight mass." These words came like the breath of inspiration, "We had nothing but Christ Himself. What more could we want?" The simple faith of those marines gave me back what I had lost.

At mass, in the clear, crisp, cold light of a brilliant moon about 2,000 marines worshipped their God and Maker and it was my privilege on that night to bring His Body and Blood to every Catholic in that group, to hear them sing their Christmas carols, to give them that thought—they had nothing but Christ, but, having Christ, they possessed all things.

What will be of great comfort to all Catholic mothers is the knowledge that wherever your son goes in the marines your Catholic priest goes with him trying to replace his parish priest as a pastor, confessor, and a guide. In boot camp his Catholic chaplain, who knows his problems, is willing to guide and to help him as he changes from a young boy to a real man, from a civilian to a marine. He has chapels where he not only can but is urged to attend mass regularly. As he goes to Camp Le Jeune, for instance, he must be impressed by the Catholic chapel, which matches any parish church in the country for its beauty. At Camp Pendleton, he can attend mass at the Santa Margarita ranch chapel, one of the earliest of the Spanish missions in California. He has missions similar to the one just finished at Quantico to keep the light of his faith burning brightly.

It is as he goes into combat however, that he learns how close his priest really is. If I say I am proud to have been with the marines, I am doubly proud, and every Catholic should also be proud, of the priests with the marines and all the troops in Korea. The medals and the glory that came publicly to these priests will never be adequate to give them the praise that is their due, but, like the good men of God they are, they're not looking for public praise. Sufficient for them is the barely audible, "Thanks, Father" from the wounded boy on the stretcher; or the happy sigh from the boy on the line who has just been to confession and received Viaticum and says, "Boy, that makes me feel great"; or the wonderfully simple expression of faith made by my own clerk under fire, "Isn't it wonderful to be in the state of grace."

By the grace of God, last December, when the marines were surrounded in three places, there was a Catholic chaplain in each place and it was at this time that your priests rose to great heights to be with your sons as they needed them most. Isn't it a wonderful, consoling thought that every marine who was wounded and reached a hospital unit had the grace of a priest's presence and received the last rites if he was seriously wounded. To you mothers, who lost your sons in Korea, it must be a comfort to know that every marine who was buried in Korea was buried with the prayers of our holy mother, the church, and in blessed ground.

In so many cases your sons have been a source of pride and even consolation to the Catholic chaplain in the way they profess and practice their belief in God and His church. Imagine how proud the mother would be whose son came to ask me if there was anything wrong if he said seven rosaries in his fox hole at night.

What a wonderful profession of faith your sons made for all to see, at Kotori where every day in a little chapel—three walls of a railroadshed to act as a windbreak, they came and knelt and stood in the freezing cold to attend mass and receive holy communion for what well might be the last time since we never knew what the night would bring.

What a joy to those mothers whose sons came to join in the rosary we said when we would stop to rest during our weary march from the reservoir.

What a magnificent tribute to their parents by those marines who would make a beautifully frank confession in the sight of all as they knelt beside their priest, seated in an open field or behind a jeep. You mothers who have sons in the Marines can read today's headlines about them engaged once again in bitter fighting but you can take comfort from the fact that they are accompanied by their priests and that your boys who left good Catholic homes are doing a magnificent job in keeping their faith and impressing all around them with their real belief in the Catholic church and the teachings of their Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

Every day in Korea helped prove the saying that there are no atheists in fox holes but sad experience shows that such is not always the case when the dangers of war are removed. One of the great dangers any marine and your son as he joins them must face is the attitude of indifference to anything that touches on religion. This attitude is common to all service life and it is from this that all our spiritual problems come. This is an insidious, enervating disease that eats away one's principles like a cancer and the unsuspecting soon falls with the terrible crash of compromise. This indifference will show itself to your son in many ways. Not too many people are going to get excited whether he goes to mass or not; he's going to find men listed as Catholics staying in the barracks on Sunday morning. He will find a disregard and often a downright disrespect for the holy name of Jesus and will hear the holy name taken in vain on many occasions. He will find a lack of realization of the seriousness of sins against holy purity; he will find in many cases a complete disregard for the sanctity and goodness of women and marriage. Many signs but all from the same root—indifference.

What can be done to counteract this? I think the answer can be found in the development of respect—a respect of self; for family and friends and especially respect for the church and Almighty God.

This can come easy to a marine for if we look to see just what it is that makes a marine stand out we will see that it is his intensive training whereby the faults and weaknesses of his character are taken away and three principles are woven into the very fiber of his being: pride, love, and obedience. Not the false pride of the hypocrite but a real honest pride in the possession of something wholesome; a manly love that shows itself in the care and concern for his fellow marines; a willing obedience based on the knowledge that authority is something absolutely necessary, something to be respected and not merely feared. I say it is easy for a marine to develop the respect necessary to ward off that dangerous indifference for with a spiritual, supernatural motive he can elevate his basic teaching whereby his pride will generate a wholesome self-respect; his love for others can give him the respect for his family and friends; his obedience can easily nourish a deep respect for Almighty God. With these he has the makings of an outstanding Catholic and that is what many of our marine Catholics are—outstanding.

Self-respect, generated from honest pride can arm the young man against any dangers that he might face. He knows that he is just as important as the next fellow, he knows that he has the right to go to Mass and practice his religion, he knows that he is showing courage when he does what is right. Just as a marine's pride in the corps is a motive whereby he does things a certain way because that's the way the marines do it so, too, he takes pride in his Catholic faith and upholds his principles because that's the way a good Catholic does it. If it's a question of foul language in the barracks his self-respect and pride will give him the courage to let others know what he thinks about it, he won't give in weakly because he knows he is right and will stand up for those rights. If it's a question of bad company or improper action, just as a marine will never let himself be seen in a sloppy uniform, so, too, he will never let himself get mixed up in situations that are against his Catholic teaching.

His love for others can be turned into that respect for his family and friends and with this he won't fall victim to the idea that he can cut himself loose from family ties and with his newly found freedom become completely independent of his family. Oh what a great thing it is to see a lad who lives and acts as if his family were present on the base. If a man learns respect for others he can be strong against all the temptations to sin against holy purity. He will respect the women he meets as he would his own sister and her friends at home and in that way stay clear of the attitude some servicemen have that women are nothing but the playthings for men. If he has respect for his wife that is a real love, how can he ever fall prey to the frame of mind wherein marriage has no sanctity and fidelity is something impossible because men must be men.

As a marine he will develop a deep respect for authority that shows itself in a willing obedience. In the battle he must fight against indifference toward Almighty God, your son will have that respect for authority. He'll be tried with the test of laziness to stay in bed on Sunday morning but he will realize that it is no earthly commanding officer but God Himself who gives the command "Keep holy the Sabbath day." He might toy with thoughts of immorality but again the order is there, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," and he summons up a cheerful but strong "Aye, aye, sir." The Ten Commandments and the commandments of the church will be for him the rules and regulations that will guide him if he is to be a good Catholic.

What, then, can be done to help your son as he comes into service and meets this problem of indifference? I say to start now to develop him or rather help him develop in himself a real respect for himself, for his family and friends, and for God and his church.

Yes, on this Mother's Day, there must be many a sad heart but the picture is not as dark as it might seem. There are problems to be faced but we have the means to face them, your sons will be hurled a challenge but with the grace of Almighty God and the proper preparation and care they can meet the challenge and turn it into a glorious victory.

If you are sad today, go to our blessed mother whose motherhood was climaxed by suffering as she watched her Son die on the cross only to have that suffering make her happiness all the more full as she saw her risen Son, the happiness that comes with the triumph of good over evil. With her help you can bear your burden just as your son, with her Son's help, can conquer the evil he must face. Then you, too, can enjoy the wonderful happiness of a successful son.

The Marine motto is very simple, "Semper fidelis"—Always faithful. What a fitting motto for your son as he joins them, always faithful to himself, to his family and friends; most of all, faithful to his church and his God.

Be proud of your son, today, because if he is a good marine you can be sure he will be a good son and a good Catholic.

As you say your prayers on this Pentecost night pray thus for your Catholic servicemen.

Come, O Spirit of Counsel, help and guide them in all their ways that they may always do Thy will, incline their hearts to that which is good, turn them away from all that is evil and direct them by the paths of the commandments to the good of eternal life, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

God bless you and please pray for your chaplains.

Lawrence, Mass., Girl Wins National Essay Contest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 1, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article about Miss Diane Cameron, a 12-year-old eighth grader from Lawrence, Mass., and the distinction she has won for herself and her community. The Lawrence Tribune gave her front-page recognition for her achievement because, although the accomplishment was hers, all her friends and neighbors are also proud that their city has developed such a talented young lady.

In these days of confusion and cynicism in high places it is refreshing to turn to youth and find there the faith that is untarnished. In time their gleaming idealism will be tempered by "the world's slow stain." Somehow we hope and believe that they will not make as many doubtful compromises as some of the tired leaders who preceded them.

Meanwhile youth aspires to honor, being honest in itself.

This we must commend and encourage, for the future of our Nation in a world community. Miss Cameron has ability.

That is obvious. But of greater importance is her character. With industry and integrity she searched for and found and wrote the truth, which a materialistic world needs above all else.

The article follows:

Miss Diane Cameron, 12-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Aime Cameron, 241 Salem Street, has been notified that she has won the first prize of $100 in the national essay contest, sponsored by the National United Spanish War Veterans, according to an official report received from Washington, D. C., by Miss Helen L. O'Connor, of Fitchburg, department junior vice president, and chairman of the essay contest. This prize is the result of 2 weeks of intensive study and research. Typical of any young girl, Miss Cameron plans on buying a new bicycle and some summer finery with her well-earned prize money. If any of it is left after the shopping spree, it will be added to her bank account. Upon graduation in June, Miss Cameron intends to enter St. Patrick's High School and will take the college course in preparation for the vocation of a nun.

This national award will be presented to Miss Cameron at the State convention to be held at Brockton in June. Over the years this is the first time a Massachusetts student has ever won first prize.

Diane's essay, Some Early Experiences of Theodore Roosevelt Which Helped Make Him a Leader During the Spanish-American War, has brought honor to herself, her school, her parents, and the department of the Massachusetts Auxiliary United Spanish War Veterans.

Miss Cameron, an eighth grade pupil of St. Patrick's school, had already merited the first State award and her winning essay was sent to Washington to represent Massachusetts. The State awards were presented at the State meeting of the Auxiliary United Spanish War Veterans in Worcester, April 21.

Miss Helen O'Connor, in opening the program in Worcester, said, "It has been a pleasure to work with these patriotic children throughout the Commonwealth. Five hundred and thirty children from 97 schools responded to my letter with rules from national headquarters. I picked three judges from different parts of the State for the contest. Miss Margaret E. Kielty, adult alien education and Americanization director of Fitchburg; Matthew J. Clark, department junior vice commander of United Spanish War Veterans of Springfield, and Thomas J. Murphy, director of English Rindge Technical High School, of Cambridge, Mass."

"Great Squadrons of Huge Bombers Should Be Ready on a Moment's Notice To Spray Fire Bombs, TNT, and Atom Bombs on Every City in Russia, if Russia Attempts Aggression Anywhere"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I have on several occasions stated on the floor of the House a fact which has now been acknowledged by military authorities everywhere. That is that the armies of the United Nations would have been expelled from Korea months ago if it had not been for the splendid work done by our Air Force. Because of our perilous position in Korea, coupled with mounting international tensions, there should be no let-up with respect to building our Air Force to the present planned strength of 95 groups. The Washington Times-Herald of March 22 carried a very timely article on the subject of air power which, in my opinion, is merely an expression of common-sense patriotism. Under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a copy of this article:

UNITED STATES THREAT TO BOMB RUSSIA URGED TO HALT RED AGGRESSION—SENATOR JOHNSON CALLS FOR ACRES OF JETS READY AT BASES TO PULVERIZE SOVIET

Senator JOHNSON, Democrat, of Colorado, yesterday urged the United States to serve notice that Russian cities will be pulverized by American bombers from North Africa, Turkey, and Iceland if the Soviets make an aggressive move.

The Senate meanwhile agreed to start voting on amendments to the controversial troops-for-Europe resolutions April 2 and remain in continuous session until the Chamber disposes of them.

At the same time, a bipartisan group of four Senators offered a new version of the Ives amendment which approves the policy of sending troops to Europe—including the four divisions already assigned—and urges fullest collaboration between Congress and the President.

CALLS FOR MORE AIRFIELDS

JOHNSON called his suggestion a foolproof plan to block both Russia's cold-war aims and hot-war threats.

In a speech prepared for delivery during Senate debate on the resolutions, the Colorado Democrat said the United States should reactivate its World War II airfields in north Africa, build new fields in Turkey, and station acres of jet fighters there to assure control of the skies.

He added:

"And last, great squadrons of huge bombers should be ready on a moment's notice to spray fire bombs, TNT, and atom bombs on every city in Russia if Russia attempts aggression anywhere."

ICELAND BASES URGED

Iceland should be used as another bomber base, JOHNSON declared, so these planes can shuttle back and forth dropping bombs coming and going.

The Senator said he guessed Russia would not have 300 atom bombs before 1960, adding that, at any rate, she is far behind America.

Under the new work schedule, the Senate will recess for Easter from today until next Monday, take Tuesday off, and debate the resolutions Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday with a final vote the following Monday.

The resolutions lost one supporter when Senator CAIN, Republican, of Washington, who backed them in committee, announced he will oppose them on the floor.

Senator LEHMAN, Democrat, of New York, warned, meanwhile, that restrictions on United States troop assignments will lead to delay, deadlock, and disaster.

Acheson No Appeaser to Soviets

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an editorial which appeared in the Milwaukee Journal of May 10, 1951.

I believe that the great Soviet encyclopedia's treatment of our Secretary of State may prove of interest to those persons who have labeled him as an appeaser.

The editorial follows:

ACHESON NO APPEASER TO SOVIETS

Discussing one of our national leaders, the new great Soviet encyclopedia calls him a leader of "aggressive anti-Soviet policy."

With typical Soviet invective, the Communist writer charges him with plotting war against Russia, the "people's democracies" and most of the rest of the world.

The target of this hate is Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, the man whom irresponsible politicians have been attempting to brand as an "appeaser" of communism.

Who's right, Acheson's Soviet or domestic critics?

The argument of the domestic critics hinges pretty largely on the premise that the defeat by the Communists of Chiang Kai-shek's nationalist armies in China before Acheson became Secretary of State somehow makes Acheson an appeaser.

The argument of the Russians is that Acheson deserves much of the credit for the fact that Europe is building an increasingly strong anti-Communist front and that the United Nations and the United States are resisting Communist aggression in Korea.

In our opinion this is one spot in the Soviet encyclopedia that contains the truth.

The MacArthur Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MONROE M. REDDEN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. REDDEN. Mr. Speaker, on April 12 last, there appeared in the Asheville Citizen, Asheville, N. C., an editorial entitled "President and General: The Issue Is Joined."

This editorial is so convincing and unanswerable that I think every American should read it.

Weeks later after much testimony has been given on the controversy the editorial stands out like a beacon light ever emphasizing the way we should travel.

More recently in the same paper another editorial appeared entitled "The Return of the Hero." Never have greater words of truth been spoken. This hero will not just "fade away." He will live forever because he is, as the editorial says, "the average hero."

These editorials should be read by every American and I quote them below in full:

[From the Asheville (N. C.) Citizen of April 12, 1951]

PRESIDENT AND GENERAL: THE ISSUE IS JOINED

The seat of the Government of the United States is in Washington, not in Tokyo.

The President, elected by the people, is the civilian Commander in Chief in matters of war and peace, as the Constitution directs.

The foreign policy of this country, in tune with the policy of the United Nations, is to contain the Korean war and not to precipitate a world war in Asia.

All these things flow from President Truman's order recalling General MacArthur.

The air at last is clearing.

General MacArthur's brave and devoted service to his country is not to be denied. Neither is it diminished by his recall, for he remains in a true sense a popular military hero to critic as well as idolater. As General Eisenhower said so circumspectly yesterday, when a man puts on a uniform he must not shed his inhibitions. This proved impossible for General MacArthur, for as much as he was a military symbol, so he became a personal, political symbol.

This is intolerable in a democracy. The whole story of MacArthur's tumultuous relations with the President, with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and with the policy-makers of the United Nations has now come to light. That story wholly justifies Mr. Truman's action early yesterday morning.

At every point and in every chapter and verse over a period of many months the story is one of conflict. When MacArthur's view could not prevail, he issued statements over the head of his Government and besought or gave an ear to political opportunists. Pomp and circumstance and excessive vanity surrounded MacArthur headquarters in Tokyo, which became all but a sovereign state. Douglas MacArthur slowly became the captive of his own myth.

This was unhealthy. It led to errors of judgment which no man will make unless he regards himself as infallible (which no man is). Some of the consequences are suggested elsewhere on this page by Wallace Carroll, newspaperman and expert on psychological warfare.

But it is not alone the press, nor the politicians, nor yet the more insidious critics with traitorous motive who have found fault with MacArthur. Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger, of Asheville, fought all over Asia and knows the world situation from all angles as well as any man. In a speech the other night at Wichita, Kans., he warned that sending the Chinese Nationalists into action in China and bombing Manchuria would precipitate a world war. According to the Associated Press he added:

"America is not prepared to fight a war with Communist Russia, and everything possible should be done to avoid all-out conflict at this time."

The former commander of the Eighth Army is neither running from a fight nor spoiling for one. He is merely being realistic. His testimony is diametrically opposed to what has become known as the MacArthur policy. It is the kind of testimony, from countless men of knowledge and skill, which moved the President to fire MacArthur.

Mr. Truman has behaved admirably in this crisis. His statement dismissing General MacArthur was dignified and logical, free of crimination and personality. The President's instincts are political, and so he must have smarted for a long time under what the New York Herald Tribune, a Republican newspaper, testified the other day as the effort of those who are "frantically trying to use MacArthur not as an instrument with which to achieve a rational settlement in Asia but as a stick with which to beat the Truman administration."

Lincoln had his McClellan, a disruptive political general who was egged on by northern Democrats. Polk had his Zachary Taylor, who campaigned in Mexico with one eye on the Mexicans and the other on his Whig friends in Washington.

And Truman has had his MacArthur. Yet he did not make the issue now joined a political one. He leaned over backward to accommodate the proconsul in Tokyo. For he knew, as everyone who is reasonable must know, that a foreign policy in this kind of crisis is not the whole product of a President but of many minds—and of many friendly nations.

Now that the people know the facts they will react, we believe, as Americans always react when informed and patriotic. There will be a political storm, and it will be ugly. But it will blow over. The clear air which follows every storm will be the clear air of American unity.

[From the Asheville (N. C.) Citizen of May 9, 1951]

THE RETURN OF THE HERO

Nine men of the Army have won the Congressional Medal of Honor for heroism "above and beyond the call of duty" on the awful battlefield of Korea.

Eight of these young Americans are dead; only Master Sgt. Ernest R. Kouma, a big, blond farm boy from Nebraska, strides among the living.

On Monday Hero Kouma came home. As he stepped from his airplane in San Francisco press photographers trained their cameras on his blushing face and reporters clustered around.

But Sergeant Kouma would have none of this. "Almost painfully embarrassed by the attention"—as one reporter wrote—this "one-man tank corps" of the bloody Naktong ducked his head and fled.

Ernest Kouma, after all, is but an average American hero. Perhaps it is that his profile is undistinguished, but in any case he will not pose for pictures. Why should he? He is an average hero.

Ernest Kouma has nothing to tell the press—on or off the record—and he has nothing to say to a congressional investigating committee. His deeds speak for themselves. An average hero, he followed orders and executed them brilliantly.

Ernest Kouma will not ride in a parade down long canyons of screaming people, dusting the confetti from his uniform as he goes from triumph to triumph. He is an average hero.

Ernest Kouma will go to his home in Nebraska without a retinue of aides and retainers who emit bulletins on the half hour. To be sure, like any other Honor Medal winner, he will rate the first salute of officers of every grade. They will salute the deed, rather than the man, for the sergeant is an average hero among the dozens living and dead.

Ernest Kouma, finally, will retire some day sure in the knowledge that his country is grateful for his singular, selfless devotion. The generals may bicker and compete for place; the cameras may etch on thin and perishable film the ghostly pomp and circumstance of homecoming; the crowd may howl in full throat and strew the pathway of the captain—but the Ernest Koumas go on forever.

For they are the average heroes who slog through mud and dust; who hunch all wet and cold in a fox hole; who pour round on round until the gun barrel is white hot and soft and searing to the touch—the men who march and fight and follow the command and win the battles. The Ernest Koumas are those men, yes.

Save the Republic Before the Symbols Disappear

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES C. DAVIS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, in these days when so much propaganda is being broadcast which is hostile to our form of Government and our way of life, it is inspiring and refreshing to come in contact with people who think American and speak American.

On April 18, 1951, Mrs. E. Wyatt Payne, of Huntington, W. Va., delivered an address before the Congress of the Daughters of the American Revolution held in Washington, which I hope will be read by people in every section of our Nation.

Mrs. Payne spoke with courage and common sense. It was an appropriate address to be delivered to this patriotic organization, the Daughters of the American Revolution, whose members are doing so much to preserve our Government and to perpetuate our institutions.

Under leave granted, I insert Mrs. Payne's address herewith, and commend it to all those who believe in American institutions, as an address worthy of being read and preserved:

SAVE THE REPUBLIC BEFORE THE SYMBOLS DISAPPEAR

(By Mrs. E. Wyatt Payne)

I deem it a privilege and an honor to speak before your congress because you have fearlessly and persistently protected the concepts and precepts of the American way as the founders envisioned and established them. Although attacked by many left-wing groups for your loyalty, you have not faltered in your support of the fundamental principles which made and kept us a nation. Because you are the Daughters of the American Revolution, you can properly sense and evaluate the un-American revolution which has brought us to the very brink of destruction. I salute you for observing, and therefore preserving, the lost art of American patriotism.

Speaking as a mother and teacher I want to be frank, honest, and realistic. As we think together we must accept a sound premise and admit several very obvious necessities. First, unless we understand that there is a well-organized, highly financed plan to overthrow this free Republic, and establish the proletariat of the people, we cannot possibly approach a sensible solution to the planned and planted problems which confront and confuse us today. Under the Communist-Socialist plan to destroy us everything American must disappear from our remembrance and experience; therefore, one of their most effective weapons is the removal or replacing of the symbols of our religious and national history. They are succeeding far beyond our comprehension or imagination. Where are the patriotic pictures, the songs, the devotionals, the pledge to the flag, the atmosphere of reverence and gratitude for America in the schoolroom? Finally, they have reached the symbol which symbolizes all that we are or ever hope to be—the American flag. Do you think it just happened that simultaneously the United Nations flag appeared all over the Nation? No; it was planned that way. Did you ever think you would live to see the day when American judges would rule that any other flag would supersede Old Glory, or that school officials would not know where to place the Stars and Stripes? We must do more than pass resolutions in conventions; we must implement and activate them in our home towns. The U. N. flag should fly in front of the U. N. building, but never over the courts, schools, or public buildings in the United States or on the same pole with the Stars and Stripes. How gullible can we get?

Another successful technique is to call everything by the wrong name. We celebrate VE-day with our troops waiting on the banks of the Elbe while Russia takes Berlin. We called it a cold war and spent millions trying to cover up the fact that it really was a floor show to keep our eyes on the wrong place while Russia swallowed China. We call treason perjury; we call our country a democracy when the Constitution, the founders, and the pledge to the flag say it is a republic. Can't you see they will soon change our philosophy by changing the American symbols, vocabulary and patriotic experiences? How can we preserve our heritage of freedom for our progeny if we allow them to take down the signs which blazed the trail for us? This problem is more than academic, it is emotional—We either love our country or lose it!

As we face the situation of saving our country we must ask a question. How did this great free Republic lose the American values, names, and concepts in twenty short years? Because we recognized godless Russia and therefore brought forth on this continent a false concept of liberty, borrowed from Karl Marx and dedicated to the proposition that by violating every American principle and tradition—at home and abroad—we could prove that all men are created equal and destined to live in leisure in a welfare world. Those Communist and Socialist experiments have wrecked our security, economy and peace at home, and our friendships abroad. Because we forgot "The rock from whence we are hewn" we are met on battlefields all over the earth to dedicate them to our sons who fought so valiantly and hopelessly in ideological wars they could not win. The prophets of doom who now predict we must always live in war and confusion belie the doctrine of repentance for wrong-doing and are only trying desperately to cover up their sins against this Nation. Must we lose our flag, our rights, and our lives and live in bomb shelters as a penalty for doing good to all the world? No. We can stop the desecration of the faith of our fathers and survive.

Many commitments have been made all over the world in our name, but not for our sake, and our boys must fight with them, for them or about them at the drop of their hat. From mink coats in Washington to 60,000 casualties in Korea the answer is the same—our leaders have lost the American way. Under such circumstances, What can we do for national defense on the home front? We can stop being gullible and become realistic defenders of our own country. Someone asked me in a forum recently if I thought Dean Acheson was a Communist. I answered, from his recent statements I would say he was not, but from his actions many times and his policies in the Far East and his laxity in ridding the Government of Reds, he cannot blame us if we wonder. Why quibble about it. I know and you know all we need to know about Mr. Acheson. We know when he had his face toward Alger Hiss, he had his back to his country. He should be fired.

We can and must stop the indoctrination of the Communist-Socialist philosophy in the schools, churches, clubs, unions, and Government. To do this we must learn the propaganda techniques used in these groups and a few examples will suffice to prove the point. When Hitler wanted to change the philosophy in Germany he immediately took over the schools and changed the textbooks to meet his ideas; Stalin and Peron did the same thing. Do we have a parallel in our country? Yes. Communism and socialism got great and dignified starts in some of our larger universities and they have spread to the land's remotest border. I have sat as student or auditor in many of these schools and I know this is true. Most of our teachers are good Americans, but the small minority of "red-ucators"—because of their aggressive nature and predetermined plan—are destroying the faith in and respect for our form of Government. These teachers are guilty of the sin of commission, but the parents and good teachers are guilty of the sin of omission. We simply did not stop their un-American activities in the classroom and the propaganda is devastating because our children have not had the real American story. They do not parade under their own banner of Communist names and places and announce their purposes; they have far more effective devices. With clever radio, television, and movie scripts, columnists, forum speakers, textbooks, and big names they simply unsell us on our way of life. Down with capital, profits, and free enterprise and up with Russia and Utopia. The condition of our country today proves the power of propaganda as we live in confusion worse confounded, with race trouble here and labor trouble there and trouble, trouble everywhere—all signs of the divide-and-conquer campaign.

More propaganda—we hear it over and over on the radio, in the left-wing press, and in the classroom that disaster, slums, and insecurity breed communism. This is not so—not in America. For over a hundred and fifty years, this Nation continued its progress toward the greatest good for the greatest number. During those years, we experienced as a Nation and as individuals, the whole gamut of human vicissitudes—fire, drought, floods, depressions, and wars, but it didn't even occur to us to turn to communism. Why? Because every American is born with two impervious armors—faith in God and faith in his country. We did not turn to communism because every American is born with his own ladder of opportunity; some are short and some are tall, according to his several abilities as recorded in the parable of the talents, but the ladder is his and it has a top and he is free to scale it. Herein lies the formula for American success based on human dignity and the rights of free men.

Another danger signal—under the guise of social progress and liberal-mindedness the older American histories, which inculcated in us the love of country, the flag, and things American have been replaced by new books dealing with the scientific and objective approach. The idea seems to be to make our children so objective they couldn't have a conviction about anything. Any man or nation that reaches the stature of greatness believes in something and has very deep and spiritual convictions, so we recognize another device to weaken American strength and solidarity. Some books point with pride to the 5-year-plan in Russia and imply that our system of Government has failed because we did not go and do likewise. Even more damage is done to the national morale and patriotism through books on social problems, economics, and political science, some of which present a conglomerate group of case studies and data which prove nothing and leaves the student confused about everything in general and the American way in particular. Whether the teacher realizes it or not, this is just where the Communists want him. The success of the Communist Party in America is not due to the number of their own members actively at work, but to the success they have had selling confused people—good, gullible, Christian people—their false fronts which propagate and disseminate their social and economic ideologies.

Adding insult to injury, progressive education came along, and, disregarding the successful character building found in the McGuffey readers, they advised us to let the children alone—don't cramp their style or personality by telling them right from wrong; even if they can't read or write or spell, they will have experiences. Too many parents and teachers let them alone—and they came home wagging their confusion behind them.

We cannot hope to preserve the love of and adherence to the basic principles which made us "one Nation, indivisible" if our children are taught intentionally, or unintentionally, to doubt the wisdom and demonstration of our form of Government. Typical of the new trends in textbooks which undermines the faith of the next generation are the following quotes: "Free enterprise is dead," "The Supreme Court could and presumably should do away with all property rights," "You cannot level wealth in America until legislation is passed forbidding parents from leaving their inheritance to their children." Furthermore, it is no reflection on the ingenious work of Walt Disney to charge that our sense of values has drastically changed when textbooks replace Abraham Lincoln with the Disney story. We know our institutions and schools are under constant attack by propaganda and indoctrination, therefore, board of education, teachers, and other officials cannot escape the added responsibility of guarding the Republic by carefully investigating the "thought and intent" of the authors and publishers of textbooks and other school material. This assignment is not difficult for the pro-American teachers and officials, and it must be done. Although much of the propaganda is subtle and too many people overlook it or assume it to be an explanation of or formula for "social progress" and "peace," when we check books from the standpoint of the inescapable realities mentioned here, it is easy to determine whether or not they perform the function of ed-ucating or red-ucating. Good American teachers appreciate enlightenment on this subject, and the guilty should be fired; because, if they believe in the Communist-Socialist philosophy it will surely get into their teaching, either by "interpretation" or "design." Many parents ask how they can tell when their children are being indoctrinated. The answer is easy. If your child comes home from school—at any level from primary to university—questioning the success of the American Way and debunking the founders and our glorious history, you may be sure he has the wrong teacher, textbook, or both.

If the schools are to continue to preserve our liberties and our heritage (and who said this was not their basic function), they must teach and practice Americanism—the unadulterated kind of patriotism which sends that intangible elixir of national unity up the spines of every American, of every class, creed, or color, when the stars and stripes appear. Do you call that old fashioned? The Communists want you to do just that, but we know, if we have this Nation, we must continue to love it, and that any subject matter which adulterates these concepts and emotions is subversive. What will it profit the child if he gain all knowledge and lose the opportunity to say with Paul, "I was free born." Parents and teachers must have the courage and patriotism to fight these un-American trends in their own community. We must demand that our schools again become the citadel of American liberty; we must demand that every school put back the symbols which portray our national heritage; we must demand that teachers emphasize what is right about America, thus giving students respect for our past record and faith in the future; we must demand that American history be taught with reverence, because its unfoldment in the minds and hearts of every child is the safeguard against serfdom. Let us be practical. Mr. Stalin knows he can take this country without using the atom bomb, unless we wake up. He can take it with four weapons: tax, spend, indoctrinate, and infiltrate. Why do good, gullible, Christian Americans aid and abet the Communists and Socialists by accepting and using every technique they designate for our destruction? Even Rip Van Winkle only slept 20 years.

Finally, let us realize that we can do the job by turning our attention to the schools, churches, and family life. Unfortunately, too many ministers are also victims of the propaganda and some are even carriers of the venom that will destroy us, because through a false sense of "do-gooders" they have sponsored or helped Communist-front crusades. It would be well to remember that the act of joining your club, union, or even your church, is secondary to the fact that you are free to join it, and it is the fact of your freedom which is challenged today. The church had better wake up too. Another safeguard—we believe in the wisdom of the founders who warned of political alliances with foreign powers, and practiced the principle of "open covenants, openly arrived at" therefore, we must protect the United States first and we will not be naive enough to join the World Federalists—or any other group that would or could lose for us our vote, boundaries, sovereign powers, or national entity—hoping that by removing the word "foreign" it would save us from the powers that seek to dominate us. History shows that the game of power politics has shifted the balance of power all over Europe and Asia for generations. Allies in one war are enemies in the next, and I wonder if we are contributing most to the brotherhood of man, and the fatherhood of God when we give our name, prestige, and money for foreign wars, based on old hatreds and new excuses. When this country practiced international philanthropy and humanitarian charity we had friends all over the world, but when we became international bigamists and subsidized inefficiency and Socialist experiments, we lost the friends and wrecked the morale of both donor and recipients. If we keep up the practice we will be responsible for our own bankruptcy and a generation of mental dullards and physical sloths.

If the nations are sincerely interested in peace and the principles of freedom we have demonstrated, they should show some signs of emulating them. By precept and example we have shown the way, and the Master said "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." This is the road to peace for a Christian nation, yet we are trying to solve the world's problems through every other means and through an organization which can and has become a medium for spies and saboteurs, but cannot open its councils with prayer.

There are many lost horizons from Valley Forge and Gettysburg to Korea. Since we started making the world safe for democracy it hasn't been safe for anybody, and from the resulting chaos at home and abroad we know by compromise and appeasement we have lost the American path to peace, security, and our constitutional rights as free citizens. If we ever find them again—even at the risk of being called isolationist—we must turn our attention to saving this Republic from the world. This is not isolationism; it is practicing the time-tested axiom, "The light that shines farthest, shines brightest at home."

Progress lies in both directions. The most progress the prodigal son ever made was when he decided to go back to his father. There is lesson here for all Americans. We have certainly spent our substance and our children's future in worldly living and we must get back to American housekeeping. Whether we call it a prior reasoning or horse sense, we must face facts. Just as we do not outgrow the Sermon on the Mount in our spiritual progress, just so, we do not outgrow the wisdom and demonstration of the Constitution and the free-enterprise system. These great principles must be taught in our schools, loved in our hearts, and practiced in our Government if we are to preserve the American concept of liberty for ourselves and our progeny. Wherever we are involved and whatever the sacrifice, it will be in vain unless these objectives are reached, as we strive once again to rebuild a strong defense for one God, one flag, and one country, lest this Nation, as the symbol and demonstration of liberty for people everywhere perish from the earth. Let us resolve to be practical Christians and make our calling and election sure by supporting men and women for office who still believe that the Bible, the Constitution, Ray's arithmetic, and the McGuffey readers made a great and good country, whose people were God-fearing, independent, free-enterprising Americans. Old-fashioned? Yes. So are the Ten Commandments.

The battle lines are being drawn today for the final conflict between Christendom and atheism. It is symbolized by the two stars out of the East—the star of Bethlehem and the red star of Russia. Whatever conflict appears on the scene, whether it be strife between capital and labor or between race, creed, or color, these planned struggles are only the outward sign of the Communist-Socialist attacks on our free institutions. Only the good, gullible Christian Americans, awakened out of their sleep and mesmerism, induced by false propaganda, can save this Nation. Realizing that "the government is upon his shoulders" we must take the human footsteps in our own home town to save the Republic before the symbols disappear.

May we remember at all times to help the world appreciate, accept, and practice the great principles which make freedom and human liberty possible, and may we also remember that our greatest contribution to the world is to keep that light of freedom burning in America. If we fail here, the light of the world dies. Our forefathers left us a great and good land; it is ours—as trustees—"to have and to hold and to love" but, unless we hold it, and teach our children to love it, their children will not have it.

"Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet—lest we 'Americans' forget."

The Church and Modern Thinking

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. DONALD L. O'TOOLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the Reverend Philip J. Brown, pastor of St. Mary's Church, Bryantown, Md., on the Washington Catholic radio hour, Sunday, February 11, 1951, on Station WWDC:

THE CHURCH AND COMMUNISM

Communism is an economic and political system based upon the theories of Karl Marx. It holds that society is basically materialistic. To the Communist, economic and not spiritual forces determine the destiny of man. These economic forces currently take the form of capitalism, which, according to Marx, is essentially exploitive. It divides society into two classes, namely, the owners and nonowning workers. Since the owners control the means of livelihood, they are the rulers of society. As such, they live upon the toil of the workers. In their mad struggle to amass wealth they oppress the workers. But this oppression in turn unites the workers into a revolutionary unit resentful of their chains. Ultimately they will be driven to a desperate uprising.

Marx considered this process as inevitable. It was founded on the laws of nature. It was as immutable as the chain reaction which unleashes the force of the atom bomb. Hence the Communist Party would ride on the wave of destiny. It would channel and direct forces which are bound to triumph. Its function would be to enlighten the workers, to prove to them that they are slaves and to lead them to revolt.

When they revolt they will cast aside all the institutions which capitalism used to oppress them. Among these will be religion and morality. Marx considered religion as an opiate or drug which was to deaden the agony of exploitation by promising a better world after death. As an instrument of oppression religion must be fought by the Communist Party.

In the light of this analysis communism was destined to be a world movement. Accordingly, the various parties which embraced Marxism united into a Socialist International. In time, however, difference of opinion arose among the Socialists. The more moderate group retained the name while the extreme revolutionaries called themselves Communists. Their international organizations, the Communist Internationale, is better known by its abbreviated title, the Comintern.

When the Communists seized power in Russia in 1917 Vladimir Lenin took over the leadership of the world movement. After his death Joseph Stalin gradually rose to absolute power. Both of these leaders developed the theories of Marx in the light of modern conditions. They were particularly adept in the strategy and tactics of revolution. The result was a blueprint for world conquest which was detailed and effective.

Their writings made one important distinction which is necessary to an understanding of modern communism. They distinguished between principles, strategy and tactics. The principles of Marx and Lenin are unchanging. They envision an unalterable opposition between capitalism and communism. The conflict is essential to the death. Only one can survive.

Strategy, on the other hand, is a long-range plan which may lead but obliquely to the ultimate goal. Thus, on three important occasions, it was necessary to conciliate the capitalist world. From 1921 to 1928, the Soviet Union wanted a period of recuperation and consolidation. From 1935 to 1939, it desired a united front against fascism. And from 1941 to 1945, it cooperated with capitalist powers against the Axis. At these times, peace with the capitalist world was essential for the survival of communism in Russia.

Tactics are short-range plans which can change rapidly. Thus, the Soviet Union fought bitterly against the Peron government in Argentina. Yet when it suited her convenience she did an about face and initiated friendly relations with the same government. Again in early 1946, Stalin and Soviet press took a belligerent war-mongering attitude toward the rest of the world. But in September 1946, Stalin blandly proclaimed his desire for peace.

Normally Communist parties throughout the world must veer and shift with changing line.

It is vital to understand these distinctions if one is not to be mystified by Communist actions. Communism must be judged at all times by its unchanging principles. Strategy and tactics must be considered in the light of the ultimate goal. Any slackening of opposition because of short-range moves would involve fatal deception.

The Soviet Union today is an absolute dictatorship. Supreme power is concentrated in the hands of Stalin and a small group of his advisers, the Politburo. Under them a few million Communists hold all positions of power and responsibility. They rule mainly by virtue of a ruthless and far-reaching secret police which relentlessly crushes the slightest appearance of opposition. In addition, they have developed propaganda to a point of evil perfection. Soviet citizens are hermetically sealed from the outside world, and their radio, press, drama, and schools indoctrinate their subjects as their rulers decide.

The lot of the worker in Russia today is hard. Poor economic conditions may be excused in part because of the ravages of war. But Stalin's 1946 5-year plan concentrated upon military production rather than output for civilians. What is worse, since man does not live by bread alone, is the denial of freedom. The worker has little choice as to the job he takes. Incentive systems and speed-up plans drive him at a cruel pace. His trade union is a government agency whose purpose is to increase production and not to present his grievances. No American factory manager today has power over his workers comparable to that possessed by a Soviet manager. And there are the "free" workers, whose lot is better than that of the 15 million slave workers in scattered concentration camps.

The citizen has no real political rights. Voting is but a formality. The formation of an opposition party would mean a visit from the secret police and immediate punishment. Their most merciful punishment is death. More common is the lingering agony of a slave labor camp. There is no appeal from these decisions. There is no trial by jury, no witnesses for the defense, no counsel for the poor victim, no writ of habeas corpus. The result is fear and distrust.

Thus, the utopian dream of Marx has been transformed into a nightmare of exploitaton. Nearly 200,000,000 are toiling at subsistence levels in order to build up a giant military machine. These plans for power have been openly stated and constantly repeated. Hence, military might has been added to the weapons of world communism.

Communist imperialism plans to encompass the world. It is engaged in world-wide activity on several levels. By direct or indirect conquest, we have seen the fall of Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, eastern Poland, and Bessarabia. Indirectly the Soviet Union has taken over such countries as "free" Poland, East Germany, Finland, Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Albania, and possibly Austria, mainly by setting up puppet governments, liquidating the opposition and using economic pressure to force them into the Soviet sphere. The same story is true in the Far East in China, Outer Mongolia, Manchuria, and we are all acquainted from our daily press with the death struggle in northern and southern Korea.

Another level of penetration exists where there is a strong domestic Communist Party, such as in France and Italy. Funds and trained organizers are sent into these countries with the hope of overthrowing the existing government. By means of strikes and impossible demands made on these governments, the Communist Party hopes to weaken the authority of the government.

Another level of activity involves Comintern policies throughout the world. By revolt and rebellion in colonial areas, by the isolation of the English-speaking world and by cultivating nations other than British or American, the Soviet Union hopes to weaken the opposition to world conquest.

Through failure to understand the real purpose of the Communist imperialism our leaders in the United States were led to believe that permanent cooperation between our country and the Soviet Union was not only desirable but possible. As a result, in Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam, we made disastrous concessions. Unfortunately, in the various departments of our Government, especially the State Department, certain traitors to our American way of life were able to do the bidding of the Soviet Union and it is only recently that our top-level leaders have come to understand the real aim and purpose of Communist expansion.

According to the reliable figures of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, the well-informed Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Communist Party in the United States is numerically small, with some 55,000 dues-paying members. Yet through tactics of incredible skill they have achieved an influence greater than groups one hundred times its size. Real Communists are fanatics who are personal rebels against social or economic discrimination and injustice. Many are members of minority groups who feel that they are being persecuted. A few are intellectuals or idealists who have been fascinated by the blueprint of a perfect society. The fundamental basis of their power is the strength of a well-disciplined and trained minority which is, at the same time, zealous, courageous, and unscrupulous. They aline themselves with disgruntled minority groups much larger than themselves, such as the members of the Jewish community or the American Negro. Any instance of racial injustice is seized upon and headlined in the Communist press. Strong efforts are made to enlist foreign language groups in the Communist struggle, and in many cases they have been successful. Such organizations as the American-Polish Labor Council and the United Committee for South Slavic Americans are typical. American Youth for Democracy shows that not even our American youth are spared. They are restless in their attempt to control or form women's groups, veterans' groups, and even some religious organizations. The type of Soviet propaganda from Hollywood shows that they have made inroads in the field of movies and entertainment. The formation of front organizations has been for the Communists a masterpiece of deception. Many misguided liberals have been taken in by them, while the real issue of communism has been cleverly disguised or made secondary. The Communists say that they are for democracy, peace, and freedom. What they mean by democracy is shown in the present condition of China where for years we were told that the agrarian reformers were true democrats. Our boys in Korea can tell a different story today. Much could be said of their infiltration in the American labor movement. To the everlasting credit of the CIO where they seemed to make the most headway, the Communist-dominated unions were finally removed from their roster. It took some time before such people as Harry Bridges, Lee Pressman, and their ilk were revealed for what they are.

Thank God, the American people and their leaders have finally awakened to the seriousness of the Communist problem in our country.

What should be our answer to the Communist threat here in our country?

One of the first requirements for checking the menace of communism is to have accurate information. When people know the real truth of communism they will not be so quick to line up with its protagonists. The spread of Soviet doctrine can be stopped only when the truth is known. Lies, half truths and deliberate falsehoods have been the reason for the success of communism. Indeed, one of the spiritual works of mercy is the teaching of the uninformed. To do this, each patriotic citizen must become a zealous apostle, spreading the truth about him, in clubs and social gatherings, and among friends and acquaintances. Communism has gained much strength through the indifference of the American people. The Communists will write thousands of letters to influence public officials and the press, largely because they are the only group heard from. Thus, a very prominent Federal official complained that during the period of appeasement of Soviet Russia, he received enthusiastic support. But when he held out for American principles, all he received was abuse. It is the duty of citizens to write to the press and to their public officials.

Coordinated action of several groups of protesting citizens who value the American way of life will increase the effectiveness of their protests. Apostles of truth can bring out effective unity. If Protestants, Catholics, and Jews together stand for freedom and justice, their appeal cannot easily be brushed aside. These religious groups, together with war veterans would scarcely be called warmongers. A joint foreign-policy declaration by various business groups together with non-Communist labor groups would go far toward killing the effectiveness of the smear campaign of those who are for the Soviet way of life.

For members of the Catholic Church, our position is clear. The words of Pius the Eleventh in his encyclical letter "On Atheistic Communism" give a direction which shows great wisdom and prudence. "Communism is intrinsically wrong, and no one who would save Christian civilization may collaborate with it in any undertaking."

Many an individual, with no allegiance to the Catholic church, has found this truth through bitter experience. It is interesting to note how many former Communists have finally seen the light and have renounced their errors. On principle, no patriotic American should work with the Communist Party or join any of its front organizations.

Patriotic Americans aspiring to leadership in the labor movement should attend approved labor schools where they will learn how to combat the insidious evils and tactics of communism. It is a well-known fact that Communist labor leaders divert union funds into political activities, neglect their duties, and stir up strife. Intelligent and patriotic leadership must be developed to vote these people out of office. The regrettable fact is that many well-intentioned people in labor have not the patience or stick-to-itiveness to fight in a parliamentary way with these fomenters of strife. Thank God, however, Christianity and democracy alike have never lacked for heroic souls who so loved God and country that they would sacrifice without limit for a cause.

The Catholic church has from the beginning of communism been its implacable foe. The church has been vigilant in proclaiming the majesty of God, the primacy of the spiritual order, and the sway of moral law over the hearts of men. The leaders of the church have called for prayer and penance as weapons against the forces of darkness. The church stands for a just and peaceful social order. Destitution and oppression stimulate a spirit of revolt against society. She seeks justice and peace in all fields of life. In fighting communism, the church is striking a blow for the liberty of man, as well as for her own peace and survival in many countries. In a common cause of human freedom, she extends the hand of fellowship and cooperation to all men of good will, whatever their creed, race, or nationality.

Welcome, Mr. Ben-Gurion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ROONEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under permission heretofore granted me by unanimous consent of the House, I include with these remarks the following editorial from the Brooklyn Eagle of Friday, May 11, 1951:

WELCOME, MR. BEN-GURION

It was a beautiful gesture to show the appreciation of a grateful nation to a martyr to its fight for freedom when Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion, of Israel, placed a wreath on the grave of Col. David (Mickey) Marcus, of Brooklyn, at West Point yesterday. Colonel Marcus was killed while serving with the Israeli forces.

The visit here of Israel's Prime Minister has been notable by the warmth with which he has been received by New Yorkers wherever he went. A highlight was the huge rally at Madison Square Garden last night to push the Nation-wide sale of the State of Israel independence bond issue of $500,000,000.

The Eagle feels sure that it speaks for the people of Brooklyn in extending a warm welcome to Mr. Ben-Gurion and also to his wife, the former Miss Paula Moonvess, of this borough, whom he married while here in 1917. The Prime Minister's visit to America should help to cement the already warm ties between the two Republics and should be a big factor in arousing support for the bond issue on which his nation counts so much.

Farm Conditions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, there appeared in the May 1951 issue of the Breeder Stockman an article by Henry T. McKnight relating to agriculture. It is well worth reading by both consumers and producers, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUBLIC RELATIONS

(By Henry T. McKnight)

Up until recently, farmers have been the most inarticulate group within the framework of our modern society. They've been called pilferers of the public treasury, growing rich at the expense of the consumers who are obliged to pay through the nose for all farm produce. These consumers consider subsidies and price supports mere legalized highway robbery to make the farmers even fatter. Since Korea there have been organized efforts to place the blame for mounting food prices right in the farmer's lap. And in the face of all this criticism the farmer has just "took" it. He's never answered back in force. And so he sank lower and lower in public esteem.

There's a reason for this. Because of the demanding nature of their work, farmers tend principally to their own business. Farmers are community minded private enterprisers. But as a group they've never considered it necessary to go out beyond the community with the story of their production.

Unfortunately for the farmers we are now living in the era of the press agent. Movie stars, labor leaders, politicians scarcely make a move without consultation of their personal public relations advisers. When Korea came along, the press agents saw to it that the movie stars, labor leaders, et al. were all in there pitching to win the cold war. But the farmer tended to his knitting as usual, sought more agricultural production in the face of unbelievable difficulties, and kept trusting that his position in the public mind was secure. But in a world of sophisticated newspapermen accustomed to press releases by the wagonload, it does not pay to hide your light under a bushel. If you have a good cause, you must tell the world about it.

EFFORTS FAILED

Over the years sporadic individual efforts have been made to better agricultural relations with the general public. But the problem has always been to get the different agricultural groups together to present a united front. For instance, the meat people would have one idea they wanted to get across, the cotton people another, the wheat people a third, the co-ops still another. This made for confusion. The results of these efforts were negligible.

But early this year we saw the National Council of Farmers Cooperatives, The American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, The National Farmers Union, and The National Milk Producers Federation decide to come out jointly, positively, and constructively to tell the story of farm production to the general public via the newspapers and radio. And now representatives of these groups hold a meeting once a month in Washington to which they invite the Nation's top reporters and commentators interested in agriculture. The first conference was devoted to food prices. Reporters received a general release on the subject which was appended with individual opinions of each of the group leaders. The release stated the current farm position and showed that farm prices are not now high by any comparable standard for business or labor. In fact, the release pointed out, if farmers in 1950 had enjoyed the hourly wage of $1.46 received by labor and if they had the same return on capital investment reported for industry, prices of farm products would have been almost double what it was.

Press reaction has been immediate and enthusiastic. One grateful old-timer, for years covering agriculture for one of the wire services, quickly observed that farm groups were just about 20 years late in getting their public relations squared away.

Next meeting was on subsidies. The next on shortages of fertilizers, insecticides, machinery and repair parts. Such citified sheets as the Wall Street Journal front paged the news coming from these meetings, and all over the country agriculture got the full hearing it deserves.

Farm Notes paid a call on Paul Taber, assistant to the national director of the National Grange, and Don Lerch, director of information, to find out how we could be of assistance to create a wider public understanding of the beef cattle industry. We talked of the various programs now under way within our industry, and it was their opinion that in the coming spring and summer months the cause could best be served by holding more and better field days to show the public how we operate.

A glance through the Breeder Stockman shows that several such events are already planned. The more the merrier. Agriculture and the beef cattle industry would benefit immeasurably if one of these field days were to be held in each community this summer.

PROGRAM OUTLINED

Last summer we held such an outing at Cornwell to demonstrate our new Doane pole-frame barn, and if we may venture some suggestions for making a field day a success, they would be these:

1. Keep the field day a simple affair. Remember you have just one function—to show your local public what it takes to produce a beefsteak.

2. Invite a cross section of your community. Don't worry about your neighbors who already know what you're doing. Ask businessmen, nonfarm people, and concentrate your efforts on the housewives. They're the gals who are raising the devil with us because of the price of beefsteak. Most of them will never squawk at a $50 price rise on a television set. But when they're marketing, they hand us the daily insult.

3. Don't hide your light under a bushel. Invite the local newspaper people. Send them information about the affair well in advance, so they can give it plenty of advance publicity. You'll find they'll be delighted to cooperate.

4. Be dramatic. Get up some displays showing what it takes to raise a beef animal for market. Promote your grassland program for what it is; sound agriculture and sound soil conservation. Show rising costs. The consuming public expects you to make a profit. But also show your expenses. This is the item of your farm operation the public doesn't appreciate. Remember, the average meat consumer thinks of you as a country character lying in the shade of the old apple tree with nothing on your mind but a dollar sign. So give the facts of life on production expense.

5. Have a program. A type demonstration using your prize bull as the model is always a fascinating way to show what cut of beef comes from where.

These community field days are always popular. People attending are always glad to spend an afternoon in the country on a good farm. They're in a receptive frame of mind for your public-relations message. And there's a practical matter that's not to be overlooked. Such an event is not only good public relations. It's good business for your farm. If you don't sell some cattle as a result of your field day, Farm Notes will gladly eat its hat.

The Basic Issues of Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER FERGUSON
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a transcript of a television discussion Sunday on the Basic Issues of Our Foreign Policy, between the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] and W. Averell Harriman, special assistant to the President.

There being no objection, the discussion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. GRANIK. In the great debate raging on Capitol Hill over the Truman-MacArthur controversy many citizens have lost sight of the basic issues involved. The important issue at stake is American foreign policy, rather than the popularity of the President or the general. Just what is the threat to our national life? Can the United States meet this threat alone, or do we need allies? What is the ultimate end of the Korean conflict Is world war III inevitable? Where will our present policy lead us?

Today the American Forum of the Air poses these far-reaching questions to our two distinguished guests.

Mr. Harriman, where does the responsibility lie for the present chaotic state of the world?

Mr. HARRIMAN. The responsibility lies in the Kremlin and the men in the Kremlin. We have to understand what they are about, what their objectives are, and the way they are dealing with their objectives. We have to understand in the first place they were part of the international Communist movement and that during the chaos of World War I they seized control of Russia and they have been operating from Russia as their base since that time. Since the end of the war they have been engaged in a world-wide conspiracy to expand their domination and eventually to take over the world. They believe, eventually, that their way of life must be accepted by other nations. They do not believe that freemen can handle their own affairs. They do not believe that free nations can stand together.

Their subversive tactics penetrate everywhere where there is weakness. They use armed force when they think they can get away with it.

Senator BRIDGES. I agree with Mr. Harriman that one of the basic causes of the world situation today directly ties to the Kremlin, but I also believe there is a second basic reason. That reason falls on the shoulders of the administration because of their inability to meet the situation head on. The essence of good government is to foresee the future. In my judgment, that is where the administration in power in Washington has fallen down.

I would change what Mr. Harriman said and say I agree with him on the basic reason for the difficult world situation. It lies in the Kremlin. But I also would add as equally important the inability of our administration all along the line to meet the issues.

Mr. HARRIMAN. I totally disagree with my good friend, Senator BRIDGES. All I ask him to refer to is the record since 1946. In Iran we faced squarely up to the invasion of the Soviet troops and then turned around. We dealt with the threat to Turkey and Greece, and next we developed the Marshall plan.

In 1947 the Kremlin was using the chaos of Europe to press forward and they would have taken over Europe, in my opinion, if it had not been for the Marshall plan and the North Atlantic Treaty. We have the initiative in Europe and I defy you to deny that. You cannot foresee everything that is going to happen. You cannot deal with the situation we face unless we and the free world are united.

Senator BRIDGES. I agree with a good deal what you say about Europe and I for one have backed the Greece-Turkey aid, the Marshall plan and various other programs in Europe. Let us speak of Europe for a minute.

We have in Europe countries such as Spain. For years now the administration has been closing its eyes and refusing to apply the same principles to Spain. If Russia has a world-wide conspiracy, which I agree, then we should use all the forces available to meet that conspiracy.

For instance, in Europe we are now embracing Yugoslavia and Tito, even though it is a Communist power and a totalitarian power, because they are opposed, for the time being, to Russia. Yet we have turned our backs on Spain, another equally anti-Communist power, although it is totalitarian in character; they are rabidly anti-Russian, anti-Communist. We have failed to follow through.

Mr. GRANIK. Mr. Harriman.

Mr. HARRIMAN. Of course, you can argue about specific cases. The question of judgment is as to how and when. I do not think the Senator will disagree that there are times when the Senate takes a bit of time to agree on subjects. We have been working in the direction of bringing Spain into the security arrangements. It cannot be done without our allies.

You know the situation between Franco and our allies in Europe. We are trying to help Franco change his ways to some extent and to help his people have a better situation there. The geography of Spain is recognized, but you cannot do everything all at one time. I maintain the administration has been building consistently since 1945 the unity in the free world.

Senator BRIDGES. I disagree completely on the consistency of the approach. One of the fundamental difficulties with this situation is the basic inconsistency of the American foreign policy. We have been tough in places and then we have been vacillating and weak and appeasing in others.

I think that the basic weakness of our foreign policy is its very inconsistency, its failure to follow through.

May I quote, for example, from a State Department publication which I have here. The Department said, on January 23, 1949, for instance, "the Island of Formosa is of no strategic importance," yet the same State Department in 1945 said: "With the exception of Singapore, no location in the Far East occupies such a controlling position."

How can the American people, how can the world, follow us when our State Department, which is supposed to be a guiding light in foreign affairs, takes such an inconsistent position?

Mr. HARRIMAN. We have not been inconsistent. It is perfectly true certain people have tried to confuse the American people and the world. The facts of the matter are that Mr. Acheson and others of our Government have pointed out where we were to have bases, where our troops and where our airplanes and naval bases are to be situated.

It has been consistently said Formosa is not one of those areas we asked for the right to have our bases located. We have consistently said if there is attack on any part of the free world, we will support the United Nations action. That is what we have done in Korea. We can quibble as to words, but that has been the consistent policy of the United States Government.

Senator BRIDGES. Here we are fighting a war in Korea—and I hold in my hand a copy of the New York Times dated March 29, 1951, where it talks of the new admiral who took over the Seventh Fleet. He says, "Not only will the United Nations fleet try to block a full-scale Nationalist assault on China, but it will stand in the way of any commando raids. The 55-year-old admiral said he is trying to avert any Nationalist attack on Communist China." That is pretty inconsistent in line with the fact we are in the middle of a war.

The other day I read on the front page of the Washington Post how a veteran who came back wounded from Korea was denied entrance to a veterans' hospital. Why? Because they said he was not a veteran of any war. The 65,000 casualties in Korea, I believe, will not testify to that fact, nor their parents nor their friends, that we are not involved in a war.

Why be inconsistent in our approach?

Mr. GRANIK. Would you care to answer that?

Mr. HARRIMAN. I would say we are in a limited war, but we are doing our best to limit that war. We are being consistent in attempting to limit it and attempting to deal with the threat and the aggression in Korea without involving ourselves in a more general war. And, Senator, no one has told us when or how or at what cost that wider conflict can be brought to a conclusion. You are attacking me; I would like to attack you, sir, on some of the things you have intimated would be wise policy for our Government to follow.

Senator BRIDGES. I am not attacking you; I am attacking the policies of the administration.

Mr. HARRIMAN. I am part of the administration and I am proud of it. I think the record is one, which when the facts are all known, the American people will support.

Mr. GRANIK. If we take issue in extending the Korean conflict in China, how can this wider conflict be brought to a conclusion?

Senator BRIDGES. I think General MacArthur's views are definitely the answer in order to bring it to a successful conclusion. He has presented the only positive program for China.

I listened to General Marshall all this last week. All General Marshall has said, in substance, is that there are three possibilities in Korea: One is the MacArthur proposals which I think he pushes aside as constituting too great a hazard. The other is evacuation, which would mean the extermination of the millions of Korean citizens, which he pushes aside. Third is to continue fighting within the area of Korea, hoping that eventually we will kill enough Chinese Communists so that they will come to terms.

I do not think this is a very positive program. As far as I know this is the only program the administration has for Korea.

Mr. GRANIK. Mr. Harriman.

Mr. HARRIMAN. I do not think you quite do justice to the testimony of General Marshall. I do not intend to get into that long testimony, because I think it so lengthy you can pick almost any phrase out of it. General MacArthur has said that in his opinion the war can be brought to a conclusion, but he has not yet told us how or at what cost, or when.

General Marshall has tried to explain in the most forthright manner just exactly what we are up against. In his inimitable way he has told us we have a struggle ahead, that he believes this is the way to win it and that he believes we will win it. It is not just killing Chinamen. It is showing the Kremlin that the free world has the will and the ability to fight and to stand up to aggression when it starts, at the beginning. There are many other reasons he has given.

Senator BRIDGES. I have listened very carefully and I could not put my finger on anything, except to substantiate the position which I have outlined.

Mr. GRANIK. Do you believe another war is inevitable?

Mr. HARRIMAN. No. I think if we are determined enough, if we are vigorous enough, if we do not spend our time trying to find trick answers, and if we do not try to carry through with halfway measures, we can develop unity in the free world and prove to the Kremlin they are wrong, that they cannot divide us and knock us off one by one.

Senator BRIDGES. I agree with Mr. Harriman that world war III is not inevitable, but I do believe that we must change our policy if we are to make it fall in such a category.

If I may point out, for example, the position of the administration in regard to the Far East. Mr. Roosevelt, whom Mr. Harriman had a high regard for—sometimes I agreed with him and sometimes I did not—Mr. Hull, who was Secretary of State, felt that if China fell into hostile hands in the country or person of Japan was sufficiently important to this country so that Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull were willing to risk a war. They sent the notes which afterward provoked Japan to make the Pearl Harbor attack and bring on the war, to prevent China from falling into hostile hands and jeopardizing the security of our country. If Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull were right in that position, certainly Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson are not today, or vice versa.

Mr. HARRIMAN. Well, it would take us a half hour to debate the China issue, and, as I understand, you are going to shut us off in half a minute. I cannot deal with all of those questions.

I can only say this: That the misery that exists in the East is a breeding grounds for communism, and there is no question about the fact that there was a miscalculation on the part of many people as to the strength of the Communist hold.

We have done everything since that time, and not always with the full support of the Members of Congress, in getting appropriations to help people in the East build strength.

The administration does understand, and our policies are based upon building, getting rid of human misery and developing stability in these countries in the East so that the China situation cannot happen again.

Mr. GRANIK. Mr. Harriman, how about the charge that we have a collection of fair-weather friends in Europe?

Mr. HARRIMAN. Of course, that is—anybody who says that does not know history.

I was in England in the year that they stood alone, when the British people faced the great threat of the force of Germany alone. And they fought with determination, and they took pride in the fact that they were fighting not only for themselves but for others——

Senator BRIDGES. I agree with Mr. Harriman on Great Britain's position at that time. But where I would disagree—we are talking about the present. What is Great Britain's position today, when they continue to furnish war materials to Communist China, used directly and indirectly, kill our boys?

I think we are going through the same period today which we did prior to World War II, when this country supplied scrap iron and steel to the Japs that eventually came back here in the bodies of our own boys. I believe, Mr. Harriman, as you do, in collective security, but I believe it has to be collective along a two-way street.

It cannot be all together on our side of the street. It must come to some extent from over there.

Mr. HARRIMAN. Let me say this: That it may be a surprise to you to know, that is, you may not have had time to look into it, that Britain has not been sending any munitions to China for, I think, the better part of 2 years. There have been many things that have been shut off for a considerable period of time.

There has been a lot of to-do about one subject, which is rubber. But Britain does not control Indonesia. They may have been wrong not to have shut it off from Malaya sooner. But it would have come from Indonesia anyway.

Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Harriman, I hold in my hand the New York Times dated May 3, and it says the United States will go before the United Nations Sanction Committee tomorrow to call for complete arms embargo against Communist China.

That is unbelievable to me, that on May 3, 6 or 7 months after the Chinese Communists have been fighting us, and killing our boys, that the United States on May 3 has gotten around to going to the United Nations asking for an embargo against these materials. It is just unbelievable.

Mr. HARRIMAN. The facts are, Senator, that most of our friends have been shutting off most of these things up to that time. The question was whether formal action should be taken by the United Nations. There was a difference of opinion. And we are going to get formal action now.

Mr. GRANIK. In a moment we will take questions from the audience.

The first question from the audience? Go ahead, sir.

Captain AUSTIN. I am Capt. George Austin, United States Army. I have a question for Mr. Harriman. How long do we expect to be fighting in Korea?

Mr. HARRIMAN. How can anyone answer that question? It is the hope that our troops that are fighting there will prevent another world war, will prevent disaster that would come to our own people here, and that will force the Chinese Communists to give up the struggle.

It may happen next week. It may happen the week after, or it may happen a month or two from now. One cannot tell because you are dealing with an enemy who is under the dictates of the Kremlin.

It may even split Peiping from the Kremlin, if we handle it this right way.

Senator BRIDGES. May I say just one thing on that? I would answer the question by saying that it may be a long time under the present method of conducting this war with at least one hand tied behind our back, when we are not allowed to bomb even areas within Korea, and when we are not allowed to bomb and attack the Chinese bases and supply lines.

I think we are likely to be there a long time unless we make some appeasing compromise which I hope very sincerely will not be made.

Mr. HARRIMAN. I want to say that there is absolutely no appeasement in the policies of our Government. The question is whether if we widen the conflict, there would not be a tougher situation to end, and the grave risk of getting into a general war without any end.

Mr. GRANIK. Is there another question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am Lyman B. Chamberlain, salesman from Littleton, N. H. I would like to direct the question to Senator BRIDGES, from my home State.

What do you think, Senator, about first seeing to it that this country is sound enough economically before we venture any further in trying to support the whole world in food and arms?

Senator BRIDGES. I think Mr. Chamberlain, that yours is a good question. I think that, fundamentally, unless our country is sound at home, both economically as well as militarily, and I might add spiritually as well, we are in no position to give the free world the leadership which they perhaps have the right to expect from us.

So I would say the first essential is to remain strong at home so that we will be vital enough and virile enough to give the world the leadership which they might expect from us.

Mr. GRANIK. Mr. Harriman?

Mr. HARRIMAN. Of course, we must remain strong at home. We are strong at home. It is true that we are having certain difficulties keeping inflation under check, but we have to move forward and organize the strength of the world and give inspiration and leadership to the world at the same time.

I have enough confidence in America's ability to be satisfied that we can bear the cost of world leadership and give our people a fine life as well.

Mr. GRANIK. The next question?

Mr. SANDY. My name is E. J. Sandy. I am a steel man on leave with the National Production Authority. My question is for Mr. Harriman.

Do you consider the Marshall plan aid for Western Europe finished, and did it accomplish its purposes?

Mr. HARRIMAN. If it had not been for the Korean incident, which showed the blatancy of the Kremlin in bringing on a war, and that has now caused a rearmament program in Europe, the Marshall plan would have been finished probably 6 months before the 4 years for which it was scheduled, and at a couple of billion dollars less than the estimated cost.

Europe is now going into a very heavy armament program, and economic assistance will continue for a time in order to help them switch over with the raw materials and the additional factory equipment that they need, and they will need other forms of economic assistance in order to carry out their military production commitments. So it shall become part of the military program.

Mr. GRANIK. We can take another question.

Mr. KERN. John Kern, currently employed in the Senate.

Senator BRIDGES, since we have not declared war, the present administration takes full discretion on the issues related to Korea. In the future, what factors would be necessary to demand a declaration of war?

Senator BRIDGES. I think that we are in an actual state of war today, and I don't like to see it confused with a police action. Certainly, in the history of our country, we have had in Korea the third largest losses that we have had in any foreign war. In fact, we have had more casualties in the Korean war to date than we had in the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, and the Spanish-American War combined. So I think it must be classed as a war. I think if you will talk with some of the veterans coming back, they will not be too happy to learn that we are not in a war. We are in a war today.

Mr. HARRIMAN. Of course, we are in a war today. But there have been limited wars in the past. There have been two world wars in recent times, and it is the attempt of our Government to keep it on a limited basis and try to prevent disaster of a world war.

Mr. GRANIK. Gentlemen, it is time for summaries.

Mr. Harriman, would you sum up, please?

Mr. HARRIMAN. I think we have to recognize that although the menace of war comes from the Kremlin, hasty and ill-conceived actions on our part can lead to grave consequences. As it stands today our men are fighting in Korea to do their part to prevent another world war and preserve our freedoms. We must face the future, and the long future, with the same courage and determination and perseverance.

I am convinced that we can succeed, and I do believe we will succeed. As I have said, the American people have been magnificent during the past 5 years. It is inconceivable for me that anyone can deflect us from the course that we have laid out.

Our job ahead is even more difficult, but the success that we have already achieved in our own endeavors gives promise for the future. Let us not be confused by those who are impatient and would lead us to reckless acts. Let us not be confused by those who have no understanding of the strength of the great association of free nations.

The wise statesmen of both our parties have laid the road to follow, and if you analyze it, you would be surprised to find how many of our policies have had the support of the wise statesmen of both our parties.

Mr. GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. Harriman.

Senator BRIDGES?

Senator BRIDGES. I think that we are at the crossroads today of destiny in the world, and I think that the free world looks to America for leadership. We cannot give leadership to the free world unless we are strong at home spiritually, militarily, and economically.

Then, with this basis, we must start on a consistent program that lacks the vascillation and the appeasing qualities which have been shown so many times in the past.

Of course, the administration has been right in some instances, but what I complain of is the fact that they are tough in one case and weak in another. I think that this country should give to the world consistent leadership of a positive nature.

It is a terrible thing to have the President of the United States have to go on the radio and say that we are afraid of being bombed today after we have spent hundreds of millions of dollars here at home.

Increased Excise Tax on Housing Facilities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY W. WIER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD and for the attention of the Ways and Means Committee members, I include a petition of Minneapolis, Minn., residents in my district who, because of the shortage of reasonable housing facilities in the area, have had to resort to the use of trailer coaches for shelter; and 92 such families have requested that I oppose the proposed increase of from 7 percent to 20 percent on their temporary living quarters.

The petition follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., May 7, 1951.

Hon. ROY WIER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It has been brought to our attention that there is a bill before the Congress to increase the amount of excise tax on trailer coaches.

Very few of the modern trailer coaches are in the vacationing or luxury class. Today most trailer coaches are used as mobile housing units; in fact, figures show the number of trailer coaches in use as housing units to be in excess of 90 percent of the trailer coaches sold today.

We, the undersigned, are trailerites (dwellers in the modern trailer coaches) and do vigorously oppose such legislation as a form of class discrimination since no such tax is imposed upon one buying a new home. Even though we own our trailer coach, we think this bill unfair to future owners.

Young Lithuanian DP Serves in American Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER FERGUSON

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by Mrs. Dudley Rhodes Campbell, of Birmingham, Mich., regarding a young displaced person who had been admitted to this country under the Displaced Persons Act, and who, like other displaced persons of draft age, was registered with Selective Service and inducted in the Army.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

YOUNG LITHUANIAN DP SERVES IN AMERICAN ARMY—THE STORY OF STANLEY AIZINAS

(As told by Elise Hatt Campbell (Mrs. Dudley Rhodes Campbell), of Birmingham, Mich.)

When I saw a picture in the Royal Oak Tribune of Stanley Aizinas eating his last breakfast as a civilian, I thought what an unusual chance the reporter had missed to get a news story of human appeal, for Stanley Aizinas, a displaced person, was leaving for the Army, perhaps to return to the Continent which he had left only 18 months before. His short life, 24 years, had been more than filled with war. I suspect that when he embarked for the United States of America, he thought that life now would be a continuous peace. But it was not to be so. Stanley's army service would be more than worth while, from his point of view, if he could aid his country and others behind the iron curtain to be free of Soviet Russia.

Stanley was born in Lithuania in 1927. He was named Stasys, which is Stanley in English. He was the only son of a Lithuanian Army officer, who died of heart trouble in 1939. Thus Stanley grew up during the glorious period of his country's history, an independent republic for 23 years, beginning in 1918. From a beautifully decorated Easter egg, drawn on a dyed egg with a sharp knife, Stanley left my children a brief history of the tragedy of his country. First the Russians came, deporting almost overnight large numbers of healthy young men for slave-labor battalions. "My turn, I heard, was to come next." Then the big guns of the Germans were heard, the Russians fled, and we were occupied by the Nazis, who promised us everything which we had missed under the Russian occupation. But our hopes were soon dispelled, for the Nazis failed to keep their promises. And when, in 1944, the Russian guns were again heard, and the Germans left us, my mother and I decided to flee. "We could not face a Russian occupation a second time. I was the only boy in our city who had roller skates (my godmother had brought them for me from a visit to her son in the United States of America), and these I greased well, and placed them under oily rags along with my ice skates and skis under a board of the floor in a shed we had in our garden. We just packed a few things and closed the door of our house and took the train for Germany."

At this time Stanley was 17 years old. He and his mother lived on the edge of battle under the usual deprivations of war until the American Army was victorious, and then were placed in a camp for displaced persons, where he not only completed 6 years of high school, but held a number of interesting jobs, such as waterfront director for a summer camp of DP camps. He was also active in Boy Scout work, both in Lithuania and in the DP camps.

Stanley fell in love with a beautiful Latvian girl, Solveiga Gulbis, at one of these summer camps. They had to speak German together, their only common language. And so it came about that Stanley's mother was sent to Canada, but the Gulbis family were sent to Michigan. Stanley had an uncle in Canada, but his heart was pledged to Solveiga, so as soon as he could he found a sponsor in Philadelphia, a Lithuanian-American citizen of 30 years, an uncle of his best friend. His best friend had preceded him to Philadelphia, and in August 1949, when Stanley had been in this country about 24 hours, his friend had him a job in a factory, and he had taken out his first papers.

In January 1950 I consulted a volunteer who worked with the Lutheran Charities to find employment for Latvian DP's in the Detroit area. She told me of Stanley and his wish to get work near Birmingham, so he could be near his girl. I got Stanley a job in a fine new plant in Birmingham, where the president was an unusually public-spirited young man, and he lived with us for about 9 months. He soon had a car, so he could get back and forth to Solveiga's, and they spent all their leisure time together. She was a student at a local college. Her parents were like parents to Stanley; he called them mother and father.

One day Stanley got a letter from his best friend from Philadelphia, the young DP. He had volunteered for service in the Air Force. Later he was sent to Germany and became quartered in the same building where he and Stanley had attended school in Germany.

Stanley had a hard time deciding whether to volunteer or to wait for the draft. He had been attending night school all the fall at Wayne University, and he was very anxious to complete his first semester, if possible. His deepest wish was to complete his college education. I should say that if this had been possible, he and Solveiga would have postponed their marriage until Stanley had become a qualified chemist, his great ambition, for both of them value education beyond mere material accretions. But when the letter came telling him to register he did so immediately, and in the course of events passed his physical, got an A–1 rating, and finally was notified he would be called late in February. Early in February he and Solveiga were married, they had a wonderful reception at Solveiga's parents' house, and he and his bride had a ski trip in northern Michigan for a honeymoon. Then came induction in the Army, this last breakfast scene in Royal Oak, and Solveiga returned to her college.

Stanley was in Fort Riley for his basic training, and was to be placed in the interpreter's corps because of his fluent speech in English, German, and Lithuanian. No doubt he will be sent to Europe, and so will complete the full circle, as did his friend.

Stanley was one of those young men who did everything he touched well, thought deeply about his relationship with his old and his new country, wants nothing better than to build his life on his return completely on an American basis. I hope he and Solveiga will have a chance to work out their life together according to their American dream.

Third Anniversary of the State of Israel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, this is the third anniversary of the State of Israel, the newest and the smallest state in the entire Middle East. The birth and the sudden growth of Israel is one of the miracles of our age.

Nearly 2,000 years ago when the Israelis were banished from Jerusalem and when nearly all of them sought refuge in many lands, it probably did not occur to most of them that centuries later a new state would be created in their historic homeland by their enterprising and energetic descendants. But the hope for such a development—a return to the promised land—was kept alive and passed on from generation to generation. Three years ago the dream of 2,000 years actually came to pass.

Many historic events were instrumental in the creation of the State of Israel. The tragic history of the Jews in certain European countries, especially since early 1930's was an important factor. Just as important was the idea of Zionism as evolved by Theodore Herzl more than half a century ago. That idea called for the spiritual regeneration of the Jewish race. But the most important factor, the determining element in the creation of this new state was and still remains, the willingness of Jews to sacrifice their wealth and their lives for the attainment of their most cherished goal. They sacrificed themselves by the thousands; they withstood man-made calamities; and always kept their goal before them.

In the end, when they had to fight against heavy odds, they fought courageously and bravely, and thereby earned their well-deserved independence.

I said the State of Israel is one of the miracles of our age. Nothing short of miraculous is the method by which it is being built up and strengthened. In an area of about 8,000 square miles they already have sheltered more than 1,500,000 Jews. During the last 3 years, the population of this new state has increased annually by more than 200,000 immigrants. Israel has accommodated all Jews seeking refuge. The Government of Israel, with the cooperation and financial aid of Jewish organizations abroad, is endeavoring to assist the distressed Jews in many countries, especially those in Eastern Europe. In this task it has been remarkably successful. Jewish people have been rescued by the thousands, even from countries behind the iron curtain. This is an accomplishment without parallel. It is a demonstration of the determination of the Israelis to help their unfortunate brethren, of their willingness to fulfill their responsibility no matter how great the difficulties.

Israel, today, is vigorous and confident. It reveals all the characteristics of a progressive, democratic state. It is growing stronger and more prosperous and is becoming a decisive force in the politics of the Middle East. I know that my colleagues in the Congress join with me in wishing the State of Israel continued peace and prosperity on this, the third anniversary of their independence.

Correcting the Record on Fred Searles, Jr.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. Speaker, under date of April 13, 1951, my colleague and friend, Congressman RICHARDS, placed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Correcting an Injustice to Fred Searles, Jr." The article relates to my criticism of Mr. Fred Searles, Jr., as mining adviser to Charles Wilson, Mobilization Director. It contains a laudatory letter written by Gov. James Byrnes, who is a vice president of the Newmont Mining Corp., of which Fred Searles, Jr., is president. A letter of defense by Mr. Searles is made a part of the article. It is claimed that Mr. Searles was not given a chance to be heard in answer to the criticism of him, and Mr. Searles complains that he was charged with "improper conduct" in his position. He denies, however, that that caused his resignation. I am submitting the following statement to correct the record.

In the first place, Mr. Searles was not denied an opportunity to be heard by the committee.

He was invited to appear before the Subcommittee on Mines and Mining on April 4, 5, or 6, but he did not appear. Mr. Charles E. Wilson, the Mobilization Director, wrote a letter to the chairman of our full committee, Congressman MURDOCK, under date of April 3, 1951, in which he stated that Mr. Searles could not be present on April 4 and would not be back in Washington until April 6. Mr. Wilson also said that Mr. Searles had "given up his position as Assistant to the Director."

The Subcommittee on Mines and Mining, before which Mr. Searles was to appear, was in session on April 6, presided over by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REGAN]. Mr. Searles could have appeared if he wanted to—and for that matter he can still appear if he wants to.

Mr. Searles says in the letter defending himself that I had called for his resignation because of improper conduct in his position. That is not the case. I did not charge Mr. Searles with improper conduct. I charged that he disagreed with the basic objectives and purposes of the Defense Production Act of 1950 as it relates to the encouragement of the production of critical and strategic minerals and metals.

I specifically disclaimed any intention to charge Mr. Searles with improper conduct. That disclaimer was made in the open hearing at the time I called for Mr. Searles' resignation. The following statement appears on pages 39 and 40 of the reporter's transcript of the hearings on April 4, 1951, before the Subcommittee on Mines and Mining of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. The reporter's transcript reads as follows:

Mr. ENGLE. I am not saying that Mr. Searles lobbyed this particular contract in your agency or used improper influence at all and I am not accusing you of any improper connection with that, either, Dr. Boyd. I want the record to show that; but I am saying—and this is the thing that infuriates me—that at the same time the Newmont Mining Co. was getting a subsidy-loaded contract through the Defense Minerals Administrator, Mr. Searles, was before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and saying that the way to help the domestic mining industry in this Nation is to leave it alone. I think the little fellows out in the country are going to be interested in that kind of information.

Mr. REGAN. That is the Committee of Interior and Insular Affairs of the Senate, not the House.

Mr. ENGLE. Yes.

I want to make perfectly clear to you, Dr. Boyd, that in this record I am not implying that your agency has been guilty of any impropriety or, for that matter, that Newmont Mining Co. has. All I am saying is that the action of the company is wholly inconsistent, not only here, but abroad, with the testimony given previously, which I say dominates the thinking in this administration with reference to the minerals program.

Mr. Speaker, the foregoing, I think, will make it perfectly plain that Mr. Searles was not deprived of a chance to be heard by our subcommittee—and is not now being deprived of a hearing if he still wants it. He simply did not show up when he was supposed to. The committee hearing was not canceled as he says. Further, the record clearly indicates that Mr. Searles was not charged with improper conduct or improper influence. On the contrary, the record shows that I disclaimed any intention of charging him with improper conduct or improper influence.

However, I did charge that Mr. Searles had been appointed as an assistant to the Director of Mobilization, Mr. Wilson, as a specialist, specializing in the minerals program. This is plainly stated in the press release issued by the Office of Defense Mobilization under date of January 3, 1951.

I further charged that Mr. Searles now opposes and has always opposed any assistance whatever in encouraging the exploration, development, and mining of critical and strategic minerals and metals. When the Defense Production Act was passed in September 1950 two sections were written into that bill containing provisions which authorize development of our domestic sources of supply of these materials. Further, under the Excess Profits Tax Act passed in January of this year, the Congress allowed special tax benefits to the producers of those critical and strategic minerals and metals. In short, Congress has made it plain in both the Defense Production Act of 1950 and the Excess Profits Tax Act that the executive branch of the Government is to encourage the domestic production of critical and strategic minerals and metals.

But Mr. Searles is opposed to encouraging the domestic production of critical and strategic minerals and metals. This has been obvious over a number of years, and more recently on February 13, 1951, was restated by him in his testimony before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the Senate.

On February 13 Mr. Searles appeared before the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, presided over by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, Senator O'MAHONEY.

On pages 243, 244, and 245 of the reporter's transcript there appears the following colloquy between Senator O'MAHONEY and Mr. Searles:

The CHAIRMAN. Before he answers, may I read this sentence from the letter in which Mr. Searles made his remarks, and which he addressed to me? This is the letter of August 8, 1949: "I am convinced that the best thing the National Government could do to help the mining industry in this country is to let it alone." * * * All of this, so far as I am concerned, merely raises the question as to what sort of advice you are going to give to Mr. Charles E. Wilson with respect to the development of domestic sources of minerals and strategic and critical materials here in the United States.

Mr. SEARLES. Well, I am going to give him the advice if he can avoid or adopt any policy which would avoid giving subsidies to the development of speculative mining ventures, that he ought to stop. If he can.

On page 228 of the reporter's transcript of those hearings Mr. Searles in answer to the question propounded by the chairman, Senator O'MAHONEY, made the following statement:

I feel now as I did then, that any type of subsidy for the development of mining is objectionable because it does tend to socialize the mining industry.

On pages 262 and 263 of the same record there appears the following colloquy between Senator O'MAHONEY and Mr. Searles regarding funds authorized by the Defense Production Act for use in developing domestic sources of supply:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the simple question is, Do you believe that any action should be taken under that authority through Congress to stimulate the production of domestic minerals in the United States?

Mr. SEARLES. If I had my way, during the period of intensive expansion of facilities and of production of military end items at the top speed, I would stop any such funds from being borrowed from the Government. However, if it is impossible to stop it entirely, then I would do as little as I could.

On page 284 of the same record, Mr. Searles places himself squarely in opposition to a $10,000,000 Government exploration assistance program then being proposed by the Defense Minerals Administration.

Senator O'MAHONEY asked for Mr. Searles' views:

The CHAIRMAN. In the light of our discussion today * * * would you regard an expenditure of that size ($10,000,000) as being unwise or a calculated risk for the purpose of developing domestic sources of these materials, if they exist?

Mr. SEARLES. I would prefer that it be not done chiefly because of the fact that it sets a precedent.

Mr. Speaker, the foregoing makes it perfectly clear that Mr. Searles opposes any program whereunder the Federal Government would assist in the development of domestic minerals and metals. He is opposed to the premium price program on the ground that it involves subsidies to the domestic mining industry. He says that will socialize the industry. He is opposed to any loan program, although it is specifically authorized in the Defense Production Act of 1950.

But that is not all. Mr. Searles has consistently since the end of the last war opposed any program to keep the domestic mining industry going. On August 8, 1949, he wrote a letter to Senator O'MAHONEY in opposition to S. 2105, which was a bill pending before the Senate at that time to give very limited assistance to the domestic mining industry. In his testimony before the Senate committee on February 13, 1951, he reiterates that opposition. On February 22, 1949, he wrote to me—I was then chairman of the House subcommittee on Mines and Mining—and opposed similar legislation then pending in the House introduced by the late Congressman Lemke, of North Dakota, and Congressman Russell, of Nevada.

Moreover, Mr. Franz Schneider, who was executive vice president and director of the Newmont Mining Corp., of which Mr. Searles is president, appeared before the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on June 16, 1949, and advocated cutting the requested appropriation for stockpiling in the amount of $830,000,000. The country has recently been informed through the reports of the Johnson committee in the Senate of the tragic failure of the Munitions Board to carry out the stockpiling program as it should. But Mr. Schneider, who is Mr. Searles' associate in the Newmont Mining Co., would have made it even worse if his advice had been followed.

Now, it must be perfectly obvious to anyone that people with this kind of a philosophy in regard to our stockpiling program and the encouragement of domestic mining production should not be acting as top advisers on mineral policy. They think exactly opposite of what Congress has directed should be done.

As indicated by Mr. Searles, he would advise that nothing be done; that "the best thing the National Government could do to help the mining industry in this country is to leave it alone." I think this record completely substantiates the charge which I made against Mr. Searles, that he is fundamentally opposed to the basic purposes and objectives of the Defense Production Act of 1950 as it relates to the encouragement of development of mining of critical and strategic minerals and metals.

Aside from this basic disagreement that Mr. Searles has with the program Congress is trying to put into effect, Mr. Searles' position is made even more untenable by the fact that here and abroad the Newmont Mining Co., of which he is president, has been the beneficiary of precisely the same treatment from Government that he objects to here at home for his competitors.

At the request of the Senate committee Mr. Searles provided a list of the holdings of the Newmont Mining Co., of which he is president, both here and abroad, and a list of the companies in which he has official connections. The lists are as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
OFFICE OF DEFENSE MOBILIZATION,

The following is information requested by your committee on the occasion of my testimony on February 13, stating the present holdings and percentage of outstanding stock of companies in which Newmont Mining Corp. is interested; also the names of the companies with which I have some official connection, and designation of that connection.

Mr. Speaker, it is shown by this record that the Newmont Mining Co., of which Mr. Searles is president, operates the Tsumeb mine in Southwest Africa, which has had liberal treatment in the matter of tax depletion and depreciation allowances from the South African Government. On page 241 of that same transcript, Senator O'MAHONEY refers to these tax benefits and depletion and depreciation allowances of a generous nature given by the South African Government:

The CHAIRMAN. First, I want to refer to Tsumeb, in which Fortune magazine tells us the company which you brought to life, had the sympathetic support of tax benefits and depletion and depreciation allowances of a generous nature; what distinction do you make between that sort of support in South Africa, the additional support from the Treasury of the United States, through ECA and counterpart funds in North Africa, and the assistance of the Government of the United States to domestic mining operations in this country? Where is it that one is good and the other is bad?

Mr. SEARLES. Taking, first, the Tsumeb mine in southwest Africa, the liberal attitude on the part of the Government of South Africa was entirely necessary to justify opening that mine, because of the fact that after all taxes in Africa had been paid, we have to pay, on top of that, the usual taxes assessed against any corporation in the United States, so that there is a double taxation there, and a very objectionable form which, if the South African Government had not been fairly decent, would not have permitted the mine to be reopened.

In the case of Morocco, the subsidies there are ECA subsidies, which really are granted to French companies. The Newmont Mining Corp. has been willing at all times to participate in those subsidies by joining the French companies, because of the fact that these are counterpart funds, and because of the fact that in the case of any subsidy, if it is once legalized and put into force, the Newmont Mining Corp. is willing to accept it because it is paying the taxes to create the subsidy, and we have accepted subsidies, not only in North Africa, but in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you actively pursue this subsidy in North Africa?

Mr. SEARLES. Yes. We negotiated with the——

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. So it was not merely a passive acceptance of the subsidy.

Senator ANDERSON. It was solicitation, was it not?

Mr. SEARLES. That is right.

It also appears from this record that the Newmont Mining Corp. is interested in a mining operation in North Africa which has had the benefit of something like $4,000,000 in ECA funds.

On page 240 of the same record, Senator ANDERSON asks the following question:

Senator ANDERSON. Let me simplify that by saying did you get help from ECA to open up these mines?

Mr. SEARLES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. But you did get the subsidy of ECA funds?

Mr. SEARLES. Yes; continue to get it.

[1] Operates outside of United States.
[2] Inactive.

The CHAIRMAN. And that was paid to the Société Nord Africaine du Plomb, a lead producer, in which Newmont Mining Corp. had an interest?

Mr. SEARLES. That is right.

On page 241 of the same record, Senator O'MAHONEY asks the $64 question when he asked Mr. Searles what distinction he makes between that sort of support in South Africa, the additional support from the Treasury of the United States through ECA, and counterpart funds in North Africa, and the assistance of the Government of the United States to domestic mining operations in this country. Senator O'MAHONEY wanted to know why it is good in one place and not in another. Mr. Searles does not give a satisfactory answer to that question, although admitting that he and his company vigorously pursued a subsidy arrangement in each of these instances. He further admits in this record that the production from these operations (including the North African operation, financed and subsidized by ECA funds) is being sold in foreign markets and not coming to the United States where it is vitally needed.

Senator O'MAHONEY very caustically summarizes the situation on page 244 of the transcript, where he comments to Mr. Searles, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. There is no distinction in principle, sir, between government aid in South Africa to mines in South Africa, and government aid in the United States to mines in the United States; but you are the head, by your own testimony, of a mining company which has properties all over the world. You accept government subsidies and sympathetic aid in other countries, but you want the Congress of the United States to deny it to your competitors in the United States.

Senator O'MAHONEY did not know when he made those remarks that the Newmont Mining Corp., of which Mr. Searles is president, at the very time Mr. Searles was testifying in opposition to any sort of subsidy arrangement for the domestic mining industry, was in fact interested in a subsidy-loaded contract being negotiated through Defense Minerals Administration.

The facts in regard to this transaction appear in the transcript of the record of the proceedings before the Subcommittee on Mines and Mining of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs under date of April 4, 1951. From this record it appears that the San Manuel Copper Co. of Arizona is to receive a contract from the Federal Government to produce copper. The San Manuel Copper Co. is owned by the Newmont Mining Corp., of which Fred Searles is president. This contract provides for the guaranteed purchase by the Government of huge amounts of copper involving $125,000,000 over a period of 10 years.

The following colloquy between Dr. Boyd, the head of Defense Minerals Administration, and me may be of interest. It appears on page 37 of the transcript of the hearings of April 4 in regard to this contract.

Mr. ENGLE. The price paid by the Government would be a subsidy, would it not?

Dr. BOYD. That is correct, sir.

Mr. ENGLE. All right. One further question: Is it a fact that the San Manuel Copper Co. is a subsidiary of the Magna Copper Co.?

Dr. BOYD. That is right.

Mr. ENGLE. And the Magna Copper Co. is owned by the Newmont Mining Corp. of which Mr. Fred Searles is president; is that right?

Dr. BOYD. That is correct.

Mr. ENGLE. And so it seems, does it not, that the gentleman, Mr. Searles, who appeared before the Senate committee and loudly debated against subsidies for anyone else was, in fact, going to be the beneficiary of a contract, himself, or through his company; is that right?

Dr. BOYD. That is correct.

As indicated earlier in this statement, I do not charge that Mr. Searles improperly lobbyed or influenced the approval of that contract, or for that matter, that the contract is not a good one and in the interests of the Government. I do not know about that. But I do say that the fact that the Newmont Mining Corp. has secured a contract containing the subsidy principle does discredit the good faith of the argument made by its president, Mr. Searles, against the application of the subsidy principle for the benefit of the competitors of his company here in the United States. In short, Mr. Searles, the president of the company, is arguing that Government subsidies are not good for the mining industry and should not be allowed; that no loans should be made to help in exploration and development of the mining industry as is done for other segments of American industry; but at the same time the Newmont Mining Corp. has been the beneficiary of generous treatment by the government in South Africa, by our own Government in its operations in North Africa, and is currently the beneficiary of a subsidy-type contract approved by the Defense Minerals Administration.

In conclusion, then, I think it is very clear that Mr. Searles has not only advocated policies which are contrary to the clear mandate of Congress, but while arguing against those policies has himself through his own company been the beneficiary of the type of financial assistance from the Government which he opposes for everyone else. For those reasons I felt justified as I did on April 4, 1951, in demanding that Mr. Searles resign or be dismissed. No injustice was done Mr. Searles, and he properly resigned his position.

Loyalty Is the Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial commenting on the testimony of General MacArthur and Secretary Marshall, from the Tablet, one of the leading Catholic publications in America, in its issue of May 12, 1951:

LOYALTY IS THE ISSUE

Over and beyond the current dispute respecting the views of General MacArthur as opposed to those of Secretary of Defense Marshall and the administration, every American places first in mind the welfare of his country. This suppiants debates respecting individuals, political parties, or professional ideologists.

General MacArthur's views respecting peace and the welfare of the Nation may be accepted or rejected. But this is certain: His concern is solely for his country; he spoke without intimidation by any foreign foe; he exuded strength; he breathed confidence of victory; he was free and forthright, not betraying harshness or hiding behind convenient security; he did not engage in personalities; he answered all questions in his field, he kept to the issues and he completed his testimony with his head high.

Secretary Marshall's testimony before the Senate Armed Forces and Foreign Relations Committees is set forth from a different angle. He seems to have a reluctant approach, hampered by apprehension and ever fearful that a politically false move might be made. He is for a limited war, apparently not overconcerned with the loss of American lives; he still appears to be for negotiation with the Chinese Communists, although it is not clear as to what we are to negotiate, for we have nothing to sell except our country and Peiping has nothing to lose since we do not fight upon, or covet, any of her territory. Again, he states bluntly he thinks the purpose of the Communists is "to dominate the whole free world."

Secretary Marshall in his testimony has brought up other subjects which General MacArthur did not touch and which are startling to the American people. Among them are these four:

1. He stated that while serving as delegate of the United States in China, during which time he reportedly indicated that Chiang's defeat was certain and the victory of the Reds inevitable, he never considered the Chinese Reds simple agrarians but believed they were genuine Marxists. If this is true, then Americans wonder why he insisted Chiang take these world destroyers into his government and why he punished him for refusing to follow an order to do so.

2. Equally shocking is Secretary Marshall's testimony that the American people had lost their independence in military action during war. He admitted that decisions made by President Truman and our Chiefs of Staff are vetoed by other governments and the veto is kept secret from the American people. The Secretary of Defense conceded that foreign governments, which have given little manpower and resources to the war, have forbidden the United States to pursue the enemy across a certain line. In addition he asserted that although the United States endeavored to secure an economic blockade to stop war matériel from going to the enemy, the principal U. N. countries have not, after over 9 months, acted in favor of the blockade; in fact, some of the same foreign regimes which give our armies their orders also permit munitions to reach those who shoot our boys. This, then, is the shocking feature: According to Secretary Marshall's testimony, the United States, which supplies the overwhelming majority of men and supplies to the war, has lost its independent control of the situation and surrendered the fate of our boys to the pleasure of foreign governments. The Secretary said General MacArthur's attitude had made the U. N. "uneasy"; one wonders if the thousands of American casualties and the shipping of munitions to the Reds by member nations created any uneasiness.

3. Secretary Marshall gave a turn to the appeasement dispute which must agitate Americans. He asserted, using the same phrase Secretary Acheson pronounced, that the unification of North and South Korea had been set up as a political rather than a military objective of the United Nations. While this would appear to be a new form of objectives in war—and for which Americans are dying—the ominous part is that if this is a political matter it is possible that while the United States will continue to oppose recognition of Red China, and the selling out of Formosa, the other nations—including those who have traded with the Reds—will have to decide the issue. Secretary Acheson made it clear that the United States will not veto admission of Red China to the U. N. if a majority of nations favor it. In other words, there is grave possibility that, despite our great sacrifices in Korea, Red China may still win its objectives, which would be appeasement of the first order.

4. Senator BRIDGES of New Hampshire, in questioning Secretary Marshall, asked whether an officer's first loyalty was to his country or the administration then holding office. Senator HICKENLOOPER clarified the question when he said: "There is a book called The Armed Forces Officer that is rolling on the press right now, issued by the Secretary of Defense, General Marshall. I am reading from page 8, so that the record will be clear: 'The service officer is charged only to take a lively interest in all such discussions—that is, about public matters and affairs of the military—and has no more right to condemn the service unfairly than has any other American. On the other hand, he is not expected to be an intellectual eunuch, oblivious to all the faults in the institution to which he gives his loyalty; or to the contrary, that the nature of that loyalty requires that he will use his force toward righting of those things which reason convinces him are going wrong, though making certain that his actions will not do more damage than repair. His ultimate commanding loyalty at all times is to his country and not to his service or superior.'"

Secretary Marshall, whose name was affixed to the recently printed document from which the above quotation was taken, gave this surprising answer, "I had not heard that particular paragraph before. It is a generalization, of course. My own thought would be that it could not be given application in this matter."

Senator BRIDGES then asked whether an officer's first loyalty was to his country or to the administration in power—and he emphasized that General MacArthur had placed his country first. Secretary Marshall said it was to his country. Then the Senator asked the Secretary if a top officer felt his country was being betrayed and was aware of a Communist infiltration in the State Department, what he should do. The Secretary said he should resign from the military service.

In other words, a man must sacrifice his career if he wants to give his views to Members of Congress. His first loyalty is not to the country, to its Constitution, or to his conscience, but to the administration. In fact he cannot even consider Congress as a civilian branch of the Government coequal with the executive branch. He must be a yes-man. Was not this the same attitude Hitler manifested toward his generals?

Throughout the testimony of Secretary Marshall there seemed to be a note of defeatism. President Truman, likewise in his address Monday evening emphasized the weakness, and not the strength of America, as if we were prisoners of our mistakes. His message of fear, because of the Soviet's possession of atomic bombs, and his castigation of the Kremlin's agents abroad, expressed defeatism at its worst. Reliance was placed by the President on the United Nations, yet nowhere was it indicated that the effective membership of the U. N. Security Council is one quarter Kremlin—and that admission of Red China would make U. N. almost half pro-Soviet.

Secretary Marshall conceded General MacArthur, our outstanding general, had been dismissed not for breaking any rule but rather for not following a directive—and even this is not clear, for Mr. Marshall did not convincingly show what directives had been disobeyed and he conceded liaison work with Tokyo was miserable. And he denounced the commander for mentioning the great American losses in Korea; he implied only the losses suffered by the Chinese Reds were of interest to the administration. We believe the American losses in Korea are all important; we want to know how many casualties we have, we want to know how long this war is to continue, we want to know how it happened and who is responsible for the conflict.

These are elementary but important questions. Our loyalty is to our country, our conscience, and our boys at the front.

What the American people need most today is a renascence of faith and fortitude—the faith that comes from loyalty to our principles and ideals, and the fortitude which comes from our strength, determination, and resources. The missing factor in our entire war program—particularly at secret conferences—has been the absence of a moral concept, the failure to invoke ethical principles and the disregard of the value of spiritual mobilization. Patriots of old loved and sacrificed for their country; patriots of today must do the same by opposing the enemy from within as well as from without.

Are We Chickens or Americans?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMER H. BUDGE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. BUDGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include the following article from the Eastern Idaho Farmer of May 11, 1951:

ARE WE CHICKENS OR AMERICANS?

What's happened to the leadership of the United States of America? Are we to forget our heritage to quake at what may happen to us if we display courage that measures up to the courage of those who dared fight a war, against great odds, for independence? Are we then servile and obeisant to a power that may be no more than a hollow shell?

Have we forgotten that, if Patrick Henry had urged the necessity of matching England's weapons and England's power before we dared defy her might, there would have been no "Give me liberty or give me death," no Revolutionary War, no free United States of America? Have we forgotten the "big stick" of Teddy Roosevelt? Have we forsaken Woodrow Wilson's concept that peace is worth fighting for? Have we so soon forgotten that within the decade we had the courage and developed almost overnight, the power to fight two wars, across two wide oceans at the same time and humble two powerful enemies?

Are we chickens or are we Americans? Are we to continue to pour our sons' blood into the soil of Korea in a war we can never win and a war that could be the first one we've ever lost because we do not dare to fight for victory? Are we defeatists, afraid to do what we know is right and to risk, however grave that risk may be, the consequences? Are we afraid to face what we've been told again and again is inevitable: a showdown with communism?

Are we forever consigned to the defense? Are we to bleed and die on far fields everywhere in wars in which there can be no victory? Are we?

Not, we're sure, with the approval of the people of the United States of America. If this thing has to be faced—as it does—the American people want to be led by men who have the same courage, faith, and will to win who conceived, fought for, and built the United States of America. We are not cravens to evade a responsibility no matter how grave are the possible consequences of facing it honestly and fearlessly. If we are to be enslaved by fear and threat, there can be no hope, no future. Even the atheistic, slave-labor totalitarianism of communism is better than that.

What we want in the United States is leadership with vision and courage to stand where Americans have always stood: for liberty, for human rights, and with a determination to face anything for them.

We aren't getting that leadership. By that much we today are failing to live up to our proud heritage, failing our boys who are bleeding and dying in Korea in a conflict without purpose and without end. If we are still Americans, it's high time we started acting like Americans again.

Ban on One Hundred and Seventy-fifth Anniversary Stamp for Brooklyn's Battle Is Baffling

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under permission heretofore granted me by unanimous consent of the House, I include with these remarks the following editorial from the Brooklyn Eagle of Monday, May 14, 1951:

BAN ON ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY STAMP FOR BROOKLYN'S BATTLE IS BAFFLING

The refusal of Postmaster General Jesse Donaldson to approve the issuance of a special commemorative stamp marking the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of the Battle of Long Island—or, as it is now more accurately described, the Battle of Brooklyn—comes as a great disappointment here.

The campaign for this recognition has been going on for upward of a year and has been spearheaded by Borough President Cashmore, all nine of Brooklyn's Congressmen, Postmaster Edward J. Quigley and Borough Historian James A. Kelly, who served as chairman of a committee comprised of this borough's leading citizens.

The impression created by Mr. Donaldson that Brooklyn's efforts were somewhat belated is not based on the facts. Separate bills in the interest of this special stamp were introduced in Congress by Representatives HEFFERNAN and ANFUSO last year in more than ample time. As a matter of fact Mr. Cashmore sought such a stamp 5 years ago and at that time he received broad assurances about the consideration a renewed plea would receive for the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary.

The whole position of the Postmaster General seems to us extremely weak. The program was restricted, he said, to four stamps because of present conditions. Why it could not have been just one more is hard to understand.

The choice of the four is baffling. We can understand the historic importance of the one hundredth anniversary of the settlement of Nevada and the anniversary of the statehood of Colorado. Also we can understand the sentimental interest in the final encampment of the United Confederate Veterans and the influence exerted by all the Southern States in such a special stamp proposal.

But what could be the possible excuse for approving a stamp for the anniversary of the American Chemical Society over one for Brooklyn's famous battle is beyond our comprehension. George Washington's military genius was never better demonstrated than here in his successful strategic amphibious withdrawal of his harassed troops over the East River to old New York, where he was able to rally and reform them and carry on to ultimate victory. If his army had been bottled up and captured it might have meant the end of the American Revolution.

The Postmaster General's decision that the anniversary of the American Chemical Society—with all due respect to that eminent and most important organization—is of greater national significance than the great battle fought on August 27, 1776, in what is now the Borough of Brooklyn, is an amazing exhibition of historical values.

A Plan To Help Humanity—The New York Times Comments on a Vitally Important United Nations Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the fundamental basis of our struggle against communism must be threefold: Military defense, economic reconstruction and development, and ideological exposition. The improvement of standards of living among the underdeveloped peoples of the world constituting well over half the world's population and living on a standard based on an annual income of $100 per capita or less compared to our $1,700 per capita per annum demands urgent consideration. The United Nations has now come out with a detailed study on the subject which is deserving of the interested attention of every Member devoted as we all are to success in this struggle for the freedom of mankind.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the New York Times:

A PLAN TO HELP HUMANITY

The five United Nations economists who have reported a plan to produce $19,000,000,000 a year of capital investment in underdeveloped countries are not utopians. What they demonstrated was that a vast proportion of the world's population—about a billion and a half persons—are greatly in need of economic aid and could be greatly helped if conditions were favorable. In a 108-page document these eminent scholars took account of the difficulties as well as the opportunities. The great obstacle is that there is no sure peace in the world and that consequently the free countries must spend on armament many billions of dollars that could otherwise be released for constructive foreign investment. This pressure for expenditures for defense is caused by the aggressive activities of a nation which represents itself as the friend of the common man.

The U. N. experts did not suggest that $19,000,000,000 a year be poured out without question by the United Nations or by governments or by private investors. What is actually needed seems to be about $10,000,000,000 a year of capital imports into the underdeveloped countries, of which about 80 percent should go to countries of south central Asia and the Far East. The total sum amounts to somewhat less than 3 percent of the annual incomes of the nations of Western Europe, Australasia, the United States, and Canada. Of course, the United States through one agency or another would be the largest investor.

The economists face up to some of the inherent difficulties of such investments. No country can get ahead economically unless its people are willing to make the necessary sacrifices, which is not always the case. As the report says: "Ancient philosophies have to be scrapped; old social institutions have to disintegrate; bands of caste, creed, and race have to be burst; and large numbers of persons who cannot keep up with progress have to have their expectations of a comfortable life frustrated." The economists dared to suggest that rapid progress in some countries cannot take place until a social revolution has effected a shift in the distribution of income and power. We take it they mean a peaceful evolution such as generally takes place when there is a great technological advance. They may also believe, though they do not explicitly say so, that the fake reforms of communism will have to be counteracted by real reforms encouraged by the democracies. The task will not be too easy. For one thing as the report says, "the technology of developed countries cannot simply be transferred." The new methods of production must be adapted to the customs and temperament of the people who are to use them. On one point the economists are refreshingly optimistic. They believe that under favorable circumstances production can keep ahead of population. They do not suggest that we allow people to die of unnecessary diseases because there is danger that they will be undernourished if they remain alive.

It will be a long time, one would judge, before any program like this can get into full stride, assuming that it is accepted by the Economic and Social Council and implemented, as the economists suggest, by such agencies as the Export-Import Bank of the United States and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. But the obstacles are political and psychological, not materia'. If we could have an assured peace, or even an indefinitely prolonged truce, the principles laid down in this report might be used to bring about an enormous spread of well-being and of freedom.

Statehood for Alaska and Hawaii

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
DELEGATE FROM ALASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to call to the attention of the House the following splendid editorial on statehood for Alaska and Hawaii from the Christian Science Monitor:

TWO MORE STATES: AND WHY NOT NOW?

Proponents of statehood for Hawaii and Alaska may take some small measure of encouragement from the fact that the Senate insular affairs committee thus early has reported favorably bills to accomplish that end.

Heretofore it has been in the Senate that statehood bills for these territories have expired, the House last year having approved such measures. In matters of population, importance to defense, and rapidity of communication with the mainland these noncontinental areas would seem to qualify for self-governing participation in the union.

Earnest arguments are made against statehood, it is true, but most of these could have been made against present States when they were admitted or even today. Apparently the greatest resistance arises not from questions about Alaska or Hawaii themselves but from apprehension that the four new Senators from these constituencies would help overcome southern resistance to the President's civil-rights program.

This is a narrow base on which to oppose the aspirations of fine groups of people for full citizenship and national responsibility. The decision ought to be made on the merits rather than an incidental effect.

Jackie Robinson, the Pride of His People

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 2, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, when it first became known back in 1945 that Jackie Robinson, a Negro ballplayer, had signed a contract with a big-league baseball team, it created somewhat of a sensation in the country. For until then Negroes could not be taken into the major league teams, although they were able to participate in other professional sports, such as boxing, basketball, and football.

Jackie Robinson, recognized today as one of the best second basemen in the National League, actually joined the major leagues in 1947 when he became a member of my home-town team, the Brooklyn Dodgers, known affectionately as "dem bums." By joining the Dodgers, Robinson had accomplished more than the mere fact of being the first Negro to break into the major leagues; his acceptance into the ranks of our great national sport automatically erased the "unwritten law" which had kept out Negroes from the big leagues until then.

He has since proved himself to be an outstanding player, a hard hitter, and a respected teammate. His exemplary conduct and his sportsmanlike and intelligent behavior have encouraged other Negro youths to enter this field of sports, so that today nine Negroes are reported playing with teams in the National League and four in the American League, or a total of 13 Negroes in both major leagues.

Robinson also earned the plaudits of millions of people in this country through the movie The Jackie Robinson Story, which struck at the evil of bigotry and racial intolerance. Thus, in the space of a few short years he has done magnificent work for his race, particularly for its youth, whose idol and inspiration he has become. Now he has undertaken a new task to warn teen agers against the danger of using narcotics. He has dedicated himself to that task, which is a great service to his country and his people. The Negroes of this country have all the reason in the world to be proud of Jackie Robinson, just as we in Brooklyn are proud of him.

I am placing in the RECORD two pertinent items from the New York World-Telegram and Sun, one a news article published on April 26, 1951, and the other an editorial which appeared in the issue of April 28. They are as follows:

[From the New York World-Telegram and Sun of April 26, 1951]

JACKIE ROBINSON BEGS KIDS TO AVOID NARCOTICS

Jackie Robinson, the hard-hitting, flashy second baseman of the Brooklyn Dodgers, today offered this advice to New York teenagers who might be tempted to take dope:

"Don't be a sucker, a fall guy. Organized dope rings—real bums—are out to make a slave of you. First, they'll hand you a reefer. Suck the fumes deep for a big thrill, they'll say. Next, a sniff or two of heroin. Then, the needle."

Jackie, idol of millions, drew an analogy.

"The kid who takes dope has as much chance of survival as the swimmer who fights a strong current wearing handcuffs. The dope addict's fate is even worse. A social outcast, his future is mired in the physical and moral wreckage of his own doing."

TO APPEAR AT SHOW

Jackie, praising a realistic, open-air drama titled "Dope," now being presented nightly by the East Harlem Protestant parish on vacant lots, said he will make a personal appearance tomorrow evening at the show "to lend whatever assistance I can to this terrible problem."

The drama, written and directed by Maryat Lee, Wellesley alumna, features original music by Otto Thompson, graduate of the Juilliard School. Its cast comes from the east Harlem area, the literal backyard of the Nation's most vicious narcotics rings.

Actual case histories of teenage addicts' problems provide material for the drama, which has played to more than 5,000 standees since Monday. Thousands of spectators have signed petitions urging the city to provide medical treatment for addicts.

URGES PARENTS TO MEET

Charging that addiction eats at the vitals of the home and community, Jackie said:

"Parents in Harlem should hold emergency meetings and have experts on the narcotics menace address those meetings. Parents should also warn their children of dope's terrible effects upon kids. Save them before they're hooked.

"A detective in Harlem has a cured addict ready to address any interested group on how to cope with the problem. I'll certainly do anything in my power to lend a hand. If groups need any help I'll be available on any off-day of the Dodgers' schedule."

CALLS FOR NO MERCY

While police are doing a superhuman job in trying to eradicate dope rings in Harlem, Jackie said the present crisis calls for even more drastic policing of the area.

"Authorities should move in sufficient numbers of police to rid East Harlem of every dope pusher. Judges should show no mercy on a man who wrecks the lives of whole armies of children. The narcotics peddler today eats at the social structure like cancer. "He should be thrown away for keeps."

[From the New York World-Telegram and Sun of April 28, 1951]

ANOTHER ROBINSON STORY

Jackie Robinson, whose career has been an inspiration not only to youngsters of his own race but to all who are working for racial unity, has taken on a new campaign, that of warning teenagers against the mounting menace of drugs.

He has announced that he will spend such time as the Dodgers' schedule permits in personal appearances and talks to tell the youngsters that "the kid who takes dope has as much chance of survival as the swimmer who fights a strong current wearing handcuffs."

Through the film, The Jackie Robinson Story, the star second baseman struck a strong blow for racial tolerance. In his new role, that of a campaigner to save the youngsters before they're hooked, he has an even more important story to tell.

The Railroad Retirement Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THRUSTON B. MORTON
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, I am indeed to learn that today the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is beginning hearings in connection with the Railroad Retirement Act as amended. It seems to me highly important that this act, which directly affects the lives of so many thousands of Americans, be revised in light of current realities.

The question of pensions for the aged worker, for the disabled worker, and for the widow and children of the deceased worker presents a complex problem in our economy today. Pension plans, both private and public, have had their greatest growth and development during the past 15 years. During the same period, we have witnessed a sharp decrease in the value of the dollar. Measured purely in dollars, an adequate pension 10 or 15 years ago is by no means adequate today.

In objectively approaching the problem of security for the aged, our first difficulty is the lack of any national policy. Some plans, including that for the railroad workers, are actuarily sound, based on current life expectancies. The advancement in medical science which we all hope for and expect may change this picture. The social-security program which covers such a large segment of our society, is obviously not on a sound trust-fund basis and will some day require pay-as-you-go supplements unless it is altered. Because of this situation, we find a sharp discrimination against the railroad worker. He now pays 6 percent of his wage into the Railroad Retirement Fund. His employer matches that payment for a total of 12 percent. Unless corrective legislation is adopted, these payments will go up to 6¼ percent each next January 1. I have introduced a bill, H. R. 2343, to prevent this increase. This bill has been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The man or woman covered by social security makes a very much smaller payment, 1½ percent to be exact. This amount, through a gradual increase is, according to present law, supposed to reach 3¼ percent by 1970. However, based on our experience since 1937, the Congress generally freezes the tax rate even though increments have been provided in previous legislation. At present, a man earning $3,600 per year pays $54 per year as social-security tax. The railroad worker with an identical income pays $216 per year into the railroad retirement fund. The average retirement pension for a railroad worker is $82.73 per month, while the average retirement pension under social security for a man is $72.45 and if his wife is living and over 65, this figure is increased to $96.60. The discrepancy between the pensions in proportion to the payments is obvious.

In many of our major industries, such as steel, automobile, coal mining, there are private pension plans, industry-wide or with individual companies, which supplement the social security. The employee's contribution to these plans varies perceptibly. In some cases it is sizable, but in most cases, it is negligible. The cost of these plans is passed on to the ultimate consumer and because of that, is partially borne by the railroad worker and his family, although he is in no sense a beneficiary. Still another large segment of our population, the classified employees of the Federal Government, are covered under an entirely different plan. This plan happens to be on a sounder basis than the broad social-security program.

The problem of how much of the security for the old people of this country shall be financed through a sound trust fund and how much shall be financed on a pay-as-you-go basis is a matter of policy which will require careful and intense study. This policy should be established. A select committee of the Congress may be required to make the necessary study in order to determine the proper policy to be pursued. The studies to be undertaken by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce are a step in the right direction. It is the duty of this Congress to eliminate the manifest discrimination which now exists. The railroad worker is not asking to be included in social security, but he is asking for a plan which does not penalize him in comparison to the industry worker covered by social security.

My reason for suggesting a select committee is that these various plans fall under the jurisdiction of several standing committees of the Congress. The Railroad Retirement Act falls to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; the Social Security Act to the Committee on Ways and Means; the Civil Service Retirement Act to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service; private-industry plans, indirectly, to the Committee on Education and Labor. It is apparent that in such a situation we are apt to get four different answers to the same problem. For that reason, a select committee for the purposes of intense study seems to me appropriate.

Welcome Back, Colonel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me by unanimous consent of the House, I am pleased to include with these remarks the following editorial from the Brooklyn Eagle of Monday, May 14, 1951, concerning a distinguished member of a fine family of the Twelfth Congressional District of New York:

WELCOME BACK, COLONEL

It's a pleasure to see one of Brooklyn's war heroes come home from Korea and receive the honors due him. We're speaking of Col. John T. Corley, the most decorated colonel in American history. Colonel Corley is now taking a well-earned rest with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. John J. Corley.

He was honored by the Army on Friday when he reviewed the weekly retreat parade on Governor's Island, where he was on staff duty before the war broke out.

He received the Distinguished Service Cross for heroism in combat in Germany during World War II. Then, as if that second-highest military honor wasn't enough, he received another D. S. C. for extraordinary gallantry in Korea. Add to these seven Silver Stars, the Legion of Merit, the Soldier's Medal, four Bronze Stars, the Purple Heart and French and Belgian decorations.

Needless to say, Brooklyn is proud to see Colonel Corley back.

Protect the American Watch Industry

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 16, 1951

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a brief address I gave before the seventh annual convention of the American Watch Workers Union which convened in Washington on May 14. Nearly one-fourth of the members of this union reside in Lincoln, Nebr., where they are employed in the Elgin plant. I think the American watch industry is in one of the most critical situations we have today, in view of the threatening international situation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROTECT THE AMERICAN WATCH INDUSTRY

(Address by Senator HUGH BUTLER)

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, officers, and delegates to the American watch workers' convention, I appreciate very much the opportunity to be here with you today.

We are rather proud of the Elgin watch factory that we have at Lincoln, Nebr. A good many people seem to think that Nebraska is all agriculture and no industry. I suppose it is quite a surprise to most of them to learn that we have a plant employing from one to two thousand persons making jeweled watches that are just as fine as the watches made anywhere else in the world. That plant has helped us demonstrate Nebraska's industrial potentialities, and, as I said before, we are proud and happy to have it in our State.

I understand that this is the first time you have held your convention in Washington. I can realize why you have picked Washington for this convention. It is because the fate of the industry you work in and the fate of the jobs of your members may be settled here in Washington this week.

It probably seems strange to a good many of you to have to come to Washington to go before a Government commission and beg on bended knee for the right to make a living. We all like to think of America as the country where no man has to beg another man for the right to make a living. We like to think that in America a man has a right to go into any kind of work that he wants to and to earn a decent wage in that line of work without asking permission of any Government official.

You have found out that is not entirely true any longer. You have found out that your jobs are dependent on the decisions of some few officials in the State Department or the Tariff Commission or other Government agencies. In a good many cases, you do not even know and you cannot find out the names of those officials who make those decisions. All you can find out is that the decisions have been made, and that you have to suffer the consequences.

You men who represent the workers in the jeweled-watch industry have had some bitter experiences. Under this so-called reciprocal trade agreements program, you know what the domestic jeweled-watch industry has suffered as a result of foreign competition. You have tried again and again to make the State Department understand your problem. You have answered every question they had to ask, and you have dug out and presented every fact that could possibly have any bearing on your problem.

It has been a pleasure to have known your president, Mr. Walter Cenerazzo, who for several years now, has been before congressional committees in your behalf. He has done an absolutely first-rate job of presenting your problems and your case. In his last appearance before the Senate Finance Committee, he made, I believe, a more thorough and complete presentation than any other witness we had before us. He had every fact at his fingertips and he answered every question that any member of the committee asked without the slightest hesitation. He did a magnificent job of presenting your problem.

As I said before, you have presented your case again and again to congressional committees and to the State Department and others. You have showed conclusively what these imported Swiss movements are doing to your jobs. In reply, the only answer you have ever received from the State Department was that you have not been seriously hurt.

I believe you men know better than the State Department whether you have been hurt or not. Your president showed us at the Senate Finance Committee hearings that two or three thousand watch workers are out of jobs, at the very time the rest of the country is on a boom.

If your union has not been injured by this Swiss trade agreement, then I don't know what the word "injury" means.

In the Senate Finance Committee hearings, Mr. Cenerazzo gave us very complete and voluminous data regarding the wage rates paid to Swiss workers in the watch factories over there. It was very important and interesting information. I am sure it was all correct because he has been there, and personally inspected the factories and visited with the workers. He was the only witness we had who could give us the facts on Swiss wage rates. The State Department didn't have those facts, although they should have had them.

I was interested to look through some of the tables on wage rates that he presented and note the comparisons made between the wage rates in the Swiss watch industry and the average rates here in America. He showed the rate per hour for each type of job and then he showed the average wage rate for all Swiss workers. This average rate which included all fringe benefits was 61.1 cents per hour.

Of course, it is not possible for American workers to compete against wage rates like that.

As you all well know, we have a national minimum wage rate in this country for all industry that ships goods in interstate commerce. The rate is 75 cents an hour. That is certainly not a very high wage rate. I don't suppose that there is any worker in the American jeweled watch industry who is paid as little as 75 cents an hour. When I looked through the lists of wage rates for Swiss workers, I didn't see any job that paid as much as 75 cents an hour. About the highest wage paid by the Swiss industry, even for some of the skilled jobs was 60 or 65 cents an hour, according to these tables compiled by our American Legation in Switzerland.

We have only had a national minimum-wage law in this country for about 15 years. Before that time some of the States had minimum-wage laws, but there was no national law setting minimum wages. The State laws on minimum wages didn't work very well, and I am sure you know why. It just wasn't practical for one State to try to raise minimum-wage standards very far above the standards of the other States. Any State that did that would find that sweatshop industries would be established in the low-wage States. Goods would be manufactured in those low-wage States and shipped into the States that were trying to raise their wage standards.

In this country, of course, there is nothing to stop the shipment of goods from one State to another. There was nothing to prevent sweatshop employers from establishing factories in States where the wages were lowest and then shipping their goods all over the country at a competitive advantage. That was done pretty frequently. There had to be a national minimum wage scale, so that there would be fair and equal competition among plants in various States.

You watch workers have exactly that same problem with Swiss competition, only there is no minimum wage to protect you. The wage rates in some of the Swiss factories go down to 14, 16, and 18 cents an hour for beginners. The wage rates for a lot of the jobs of experienced workers are only 30, 40, or 50 cents an hour. That is the kind of competition that you are up against. That is the whole cause of your problem

If the principle of Nation-wide minimum wage is sound, then the principle of protection against foreign low-wage labor is just as sound. If an American manufacturer tried to pay wages at the rates in the Swiss factories, he would be prosecuted in no time by the United States Department of Labor.

There just isn't any doubt that these low Swiss wages are the whole cause of the trouble.

Of course, the State Department may claim that we have no right to tell the Swiss how to run their business. That is true, but we should have a right to say something about it when the Swiss watches come in here at prices far below what American manufacturers can meet.

If the Swiss want to hold their wage rates at a low level, that may be their business. But if they want to send in here the watches made with low-wage labor, then it becomes our business. We have a right to insist that they pay a fair tariff or import fee or whatever you want to call it, that will equalize the cost of production and particularly the difference in wage rates.

In spite of all the State Department propaganda about international trade and international understanding and good will, you can't get away from the fact that this so-called reciprocal trade agreements program is being used to break down the American wage standard, and as a result our living standards.

Now I understand that you are planning to make an appearance before the United States Tariff Commission tomorrow and ask that the United States Government make use of the escape clause in the trade agreement with Switzerland, to get the tariff rates raised to what they ought to be. I am all for you, and I want to wish you the best of luck. I intend to file a brief statement with the Tariff Commission, myself, backing up your position.

I hope you realize that it may not be an easy job to get this administration to use that escape clause in the Swiss agreement.

The escape clause is something that your industry and your union have been working to have put in the Swiss agreement for a good many years. I remember back 4 or 5 years ago when I made a speech in the Senate insisting that the State Department ought to put an escape clause in the Swiss agreement. At that time there was not any escape clause in the agreement, so you didn't even have the right to go to the Tariff Commission and present your case. I made an argument that the State Department could have an escape clause put in on 6 months' notice and that they ought to do so. I believe I convinced most of the people who listened to me, but unfortunately I had too few listeners.

That was shortly after the end of the war. It took the State Department 3 or 4 years to put an escape clause in that agreement so that you could even go before the Tariff Commission and ask them to use it.

As I said before, the escape clause won't be of much help to you unless the administration is willing to use it to escape from the commitments we have made on the tariff on watches. It may not be an easy job to win your case. Up to date, the Tariff Commission has handled 19 applications for escape under the escape clauses in the various agreements. To date they have been willing to take action to protect American producers in just 1 case out of those 19 applications.

That is not a very encouraging situation. I am not trying to discourage you, and I am sure I couldn't if I tried. You men know the problems of your industry, and you know what has happened to the industry and jobs as a result of these Swiss imports. You will have to make it clear to the Tariff Commission just what has happened under this agreement.

The Tariff Commission is supposed to be a nonpartisan agency composed of three Republicans and three Democrats. They are supposed to decide your application based purely on the merits of the case. In other words, they are supposed to sit like judges in a court and grant you protection against imports if they find that your industry has been hurt as a result of this so-called reciprocal trade agreement. They are not supposed to be influenced by political considerations or by State Department pressure or anything of that sort.

In the Senate Finance Committee we have made a real effort to see to it that those appointed to serve on the Tariff Commission are fair-minded, nonpolitical men who will hear a case fairly and decide it on its merits. I don't know how successful we have been. The Senate confirms these appointments, but first of all, the President selects the men, and sends their names to the Senate for confirmation. All of the members of the Tariff Commission have 6-year appointments, which means that they come up for reappointment by the President from time to time. Under those circumstances there may be a temptation for them to think about the political slant of the administration in passing on those cases.

Even after they have arrived at their conclusions, the Tariff Commission does not have the final decision. The President may accept or reject their recommendations. In reaching his decision on that, he will probably consult with members of his Cabinet, including the Secretary of State. Just speaking personally, I am afraid he takes the advice of the Secretary of State more often than he ought to.

That is the problem you are up against. I am giving you some of this background so you will understand why it has been so hard to make any headway. Now that you have gotten a formal hearing before the Tariff Commission, I feel that you have made tremendous progress. I am very optimistic that you will get favorable results.

It happens that you have come to Washington at a fortunate time in more ways than one. Just this week we have up in the Senate a bill to extend the Trade Agreements Act for another 2 years. If you have time, I hope some of you will come down to the visitors' gallery in the Senate and listen to the debate.

My own feeling about this particular bill is mixed. There is a temptation to vote against it entirely. Unfortunately, even if Congress refused to pass the bill, it would not restore any of the reduced tariff rates back to the old levels that existed before any trade agreements were negotiated. In other words, we could stop the Secretary of State from making any more agreements by defeating this bill. We could not cancel out the reductions that have already been made by that means. Existing trade agreements, such as the Swiss agreement, would continue in effect until canceled by the State Department.

On the other hand, this bill does contain some real improvements over what we have had in the past. For one thing, it makes the "escape clause" provision a good deal stronger. It attempts to give the complaining domestic industry a much better chance to secure relief from destructive competition through this means. Those of you who have studied Mr. Ceneramo's testimony before our committee realize that the present "escape clause" does not always work too well for the domestic industry that is injured. Our committee has tried to improve on that point in the bill we have up in the Senate beginning today.

There is another provision in this new bill which may be of some benefit to your industry. I take some personal pride in it, since I proposed the amendment in committee at the request of your industry. It is the provision which restores section 516 of the old Tariff Act into full operation.

This section will give a domestic industry such as yours the right to go into court and contest the decision of a customs official in classifying import goods. Your president pointed out to us that a good many imported Swiss movements were only paying the tariff rate on "unadjusted movements," although, in fact, they are fully adjusted when they come in here. If a customs official makes the wrong classification in that way, it may permit imports to come in at a lower rate of duty. That means that the imports will offer just that much more competition to your own watches.

Some of these changes are rather technical and I don't intend to bore you by going into them in too much detail. The important point is that we have tried to improve the law in any way we could so as to give domestic industries and American workers more protection. The bill is a sort of a compromise. It gives the State Department part of what they have asked and, at the same time, it tries to give domestic industries a little better chance to protect themselves than they have had in the past.

We know that the only kind of a bill we can get through is a compromise bill. If the Congress passed the kind of bill that I would like to see, the President would likely veto it and we would be right back where we were. In fact, I would like to have a bill passed that simply raised the tariff rates on Swiss watches or established a quota. We can't get that through, so we are trying to do the next best thing.

I have appreciated the opportunity of being here with you today and of talking over your problems with you. I have given you some of my ideas on this question, and I hope you won't hesitate to give me your suggestions. Mr. Cenerazzo has never been hesitant about giving us his ideas and recommendations and I respect him for that. I have been pretty familiar with some of the problems of the jeweled-watch industry for quite a while, but this is the first chance I have had to meet with your whole group. You are here fighting for the jobs of your members. You have a tough problem before you. I want to offer you 100-percent cooperation in tackling it. I believe you will solve it because I just don't believe the Tariff Commission, the State Department, and the White House will dare to tell you that your members don't have a right to a decent job at a fair rate of pay.

Thank you for your courtesy and your hospitality.

The British and the Dismissal of General MacArthur

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 16, 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "We're All Subject to Each Others' Whims," which appeared in the Minneapolis Sunday Tribune on May 13, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE'RE ALL SUBJECT TO EACH OTHERS' WHIMS

Exchanges between Senators and Defense Secretary George Marshall have refuted mischievous gossip blaming the British for Gen. Douglas MacArthur's dismissal. Marshall and the President have made clear that the decision to recall MacArthur was purely an American one.

It is hard to excuse such an irresponsible canard at a time when it is so useful to the Communists to foster ill will and disunity between the free nations.

Those who do not seem to shrink from isolating the United States from its allies and the U. N. or undermining the morale of the American people now are fostering another dangerous line of talk.

Senator WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin, asked Marshall last Wednesday if our arrangement with the U. N. does not mean that "we have virtually lost control of our own 350,000 men in the field."

David Lawrence, a syndicated columnist, previously had charged that "America has surrendered its independence of action and its leadership and has abandoned 350,000 American boys to the whim of foreign cabinets."

Such talk finds ready listeners in a Nation which, despite its having become the world's No. 1 power, has never wholly rid itself of an inferiority complex developed during the years when the great decisions were made by foreign governments.

Marshall told WILEY that we have not lost control of our troops any more than we lost control of them in Europe though an American was Allied Commander in World War II, just as an American is in command in Korea.

What those overlook who seek to create the idea that our destinies and the lives of our soldiers are at the "whim of foreign Cabinets" is the unprecedented extent to which other free nations have put their destinies and the lives of their soldiers at the whim of American domestic politics.

The United States has never subjected its policies or the lives of its soldiers to foreign leadership to the extent that the British did when they accepted Dwight Eisenhower as their supreme commander in Western Europe in 1942. At that time the Armed Forces of the United States in Western Europe were inferior in numbers and in battle experience to those of Britain. British commanders with more war experience and greater fame than Eisenhower then enjoyed were put under an untried commander. The British later were glad they did but it was hard to do at the time.

The British modified their sovereignty in wartime to permit Eisenhower to function with maximum effectiveness on their soil and again to permit the United States to establish peacetime air bases on their island.

All of the members of the Atlantic Treaty Organization, including France, which is especially sensitive about such matters, have surrendered sovereignty as well as pride to enable Eisenhower to create an integrated Western European defense establishment.

And the 13 other countries with troops in Korea willingly placed them under an American commander. While some of them have not sent as large forces as we would like to see fighting alongside ours, all realized that in entrusting their soldiers to American supreme command they also entrusted us with their national security. The Communists can strike just as hard at a nation with 1,000 troops at war against them in Korea as against a nation with 300,000 troops at war against them.

The way to get more allied troops to line up alongside our troops in defense of collective security is to recognize our allies' right to be consulted about basic policies and give credit for contributions made. To deny our allies a voice in decisions which affect their security as well as ours and to sneer at their sacrifices for the common cause is to treat them as satellites and risk isolating ourselves.

This is not the way most Americans would deal with our allies or the UN and we are glad President Truman in his speech last Monday night and in the letter to General MacArthur published Friday made that clear. "The path of collective security is our only sure defense against the dangers that threaten us. It is the path to peace in Korea, to peace in the world."

We must let nothing divert us from that path.

Attorney General of New Mexico Urges Federal Control of Offshore Oil Lands

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 16, 1951

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the problem of handling the submerged lands off the coasts of the United States containing vast deposits of petroleum has been of great concern to the people of the United States, and to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, which has been studying the problem intensively this year and last particularly. The committee has before it a measure introduced by the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] and myself to provide for interim operation of these petroleum resources under the Secretary of the Interior, so that the United States will not be deprived of production and exploration while Congress is making up its mind upon the final settlement of the controversy which has gone on for the last 8 or 9 years.

As chairman of the committee, I have received numerous letters from all parts of the country with respect to the problem. One of the most interesting of these was received by me today from Hon. Joe L. Martinez, attorney general of the State of New Mexico. Mr. Martinez was formerly upon the staff of the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], and, like myself and the senior Senator from New Mexico, studied law at Georgetown Law School. I have therefore read his letter with particular interest.

Mr. Martinez not only contends, as I do, that the Supreme Court of the United States was right in holding that the Federal Government has paramount jurisdiction of these submerged areas, but he goes further and contends that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized by present law to take immediate administrative jurisdiction over these lands.

The letter from Mr. Martinez is of such great interest that I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 14, 1951.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: You have asked my views in connection with the proposed legislation to permit continued production and further development of the mineral resources of the submerged ocean lands.

I have studied the enclosed pamphlet in your letter giving both sides of the controversy and, in accordance with other research in this field over a period of several years, I will outline my views and the results of my studies.

First, the Federal Government has the paramount authority in and is the owner of the so-called marginal sea area, that is, from ordinary low tide seaward 3 miles. The opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. California made clear the ruling of the Supreme Court. The complaint of the United States alleged that the United States "is the owner in fee simple of, or possessed of paramount rights in and powers over, the lands, minerals, and other things of value underlying the Pacific Ocean, lying seaward of the ordinary low-water mark off the coast of California and outside of the inland waters of the State, extending seaward three nautical miles." In the final decree in the California case the Court held that California had no property interest in the marginal sea area and that the United States had paramount rights. It was not, and is not, necessary for the Court to use the words "title" or "ownership." As the Court said in United States v. California:

"The United States here asserts rights in two capacities transcending those of a mere property owner."

In short, the highest and broadest and all-inclusive rights were vested in the United States. And this is as it should be. As the Court went on to say in United States v. California:

"The Government also appears in its capacity as a member of the family of nations. In that capacity it is responsible for conducting United States relations with other nations. It asserts that proper exercise of these constitutional responsibilities requires that it have power, unencumbered by State commitments, always to determine what agreements will be made concerning the control and use of the marginal sea and the land under it."

It is my opinion that in this marginal sea area national rights must be paramount at all times, and the National Government should not be encumbered with State authority or jurisdiction.

It is mere quibbling to say that the Supreme Court did not vest ownership in the United States. "Paramount rights" include the highest and broadest rights. Furthermore, it is superfluous to point out that the Court clearly held that the State of California, and consequently any other State, has no property interest whatsoever in the marginal sea area—that the States do not own, and never have owned the subsoil beneath the marginal sea.

Second, the so-called States' rights concept is wholly inapplicable and not advanced by its proponents in the best interests of the Nation. There has been tremendous agitation, as you well know, Senator, by some of the individual States in behalf of quitclaim legislation, or other similar legislation giving the States the marginal sea area, and I, as attorney general of New Mexico, have, of course, given very serious consideration to the claims made, or to be made in behalf of the States. As attorney general, it was and is my duty to closely peruse and evaluate the facts and to weigh the consequences. I will answer proposed quitclaim legislation by quoting the statement made by a fellow attorney general, the Honorable A. A. Carmichael, the attorney general of the State of Alabama. His statement was:

"If the Congress made such a gift to the States, it will be tragically derelict in its duty as the highest legislative body in the United States."

In effect, the proponents of the so-called States' rights concept are asking Congress to make an outright gift to a few States, particularly California, Texas, and Louisiana. It is my opinion that the tremendous subsea resources should be conserved and administered in accordance with the national interest and security to the benefit of all of the States. The argument of States' rights is wholly inapplicable. There can be no deprivation of rights if the States had no rights in the first place. The Supreme Court has held that the States never did own the marginal sea area.

The anomaly is that the so-called States' rights concept would benefit only a handful of States; whereas, Federal control could and would inure to the benefit of all the States, without sacrifice of national security and welfare. The tremendous subsea wealth could and would support many national public benefits or projects.

What is behind the States' rights concept? Does it seem logical that land-locked and inland States should be particularly concerned with the rights of a few coastal States, to the detriment of the inland States? And if the States' rights concept is the righteous issue, why is there vehement opposition to any legislation quitclaiming to the States, but reserving the right in the Federal authorities to administer the oil?

Unfortunately, the various pressure groups in behalf of the States, primarily the oil lobby, have shielded their activities in such a way that their real purpose—to control the subsea mineral wealth, particularly oil—has been disguised. It is inconceivable that the general welfare and national security would be benefited by donating the national wealth in the marginal sea to a few coastal States. The welfare of the people in the inland States is no less important than that of whose who reside in a coastal State.

I find no law to support the proposition often advanced that the States have always owned the marginal sea area. All the cases cited can be distiguished and all must be read in accordance with the facts in issue. In the first place, only in the past 10 or 15 years has the issue arisen as to the ownership of the area from ordinary low tide seaward 3 miles. The problem came squarely before the Supreme Court in United States v. California, and the highest Court in the United States held that the State does not, and did not, own. That should be sufficiently clear for all purposes. Nothing is gained by attempting to quote cases decided some 50 or 100 years ago on a different set of facts. No issue was ever presented 50 or 100 years ago concerning the area from low tide seaward 3 miles. The Supreme Court has spoken in clear and unmistakable terms in the three recent cases involving California, Louisiana, and Texas. I fail to see how there can be any further question. It is my opinion that the decisions in the three cases were well-reasoned and entirely in accordance with the law.

It is my further opinion that the various pressure groups, particularly the oil operators, have grossly misrepresented this problem to Congress. We are told that the oil operators and the handful of States involved are innocent pawns. To my knowledge, the wealth of the marginal sea area is still being drained since the June 1947 decision in United States v. California under leases from the States or their assignees. Are these innocent parties? Is a party innocent who continues operations on land in which the highest court had held that this party or its assignor or contractor had no property interest? I know of no other case in our history where there has been such flagrant contempt for the decision of our highest Court—I repeat—flagrant contempt for the decision of our highest Court.

For example, it is common knowledge that extensive oil operations continue in California in the offshore area and that the impounding of funds, pending settlement of the final question, is a loose and incomplete process. The State continues to lease to oil companies who are draining the national wealth, some of the leases being to other than the highest bidder, to the consequent loss to the Federal Government. Was there ever such a willful disregard of the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States? Can California or the oil companies leasing or claiming under the State of California claim that they are innocent parties or innocent operators, especially since the June 1947 decision? Why should several States and the particular oil companies drain the wealth that belongs to all the States and the entire Nation? I consider my own State of New Mexico as having a definite interest in the national wealth and resources that surround our Nation in the offshore area. No doubt, Senator, your own State of Wyoming is concerned that the national wealth is drained by a few. In truth and in fact the so-called "good faith" by a few States and some oil operators is both a travesty and an injustice.

Furthermore, I wish to raise this point. The purported good faith of the oil companies is far less worthy of protection than the extreme good faith of private applicants who filed on offshore areas under the laws of the United States duly passed by Congress. I am informed that many of these applicants filed 10 or 15 years ago and have been fighting their battle to preserve their rights singlehandedly. The private applicants filed under the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920, as amended, but because their resources are not extensive, their voice has been drowned by the oil operators and the States. I submit that Congress should give strong consideration to the good faith as honestly portrayed by private applicants, who are for the most part ordinary private citizens, who look to their Government to uphold law and order.

In concluding on this point, it is my opinion that unless there is much clear thinking done in this so-called tidelands question as it particularly relates to a few States and powerful oil companies, there is a strong possibility of a scandal which will dwarf any recorded in our past history. It is a matter for sober thought.

Third, the Federal Government should immediately take over and administer the marginal sea area. Since the decision in United States v. California in 1947, the statement has been made that there is no legislation or authority under which the Federal Government could act to take over and administer the marginal sea area. The categoric statement is made and apparently never questioned. Congress has always assumed legislation is necessary and must be passed, but Congress has never taken cognizance of legislation presently in effect. May I point out, Senator, the broad, clear provisions of the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920, as amended. Every time a statement has been made in regard to the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920, the cry is immediately raised that it is not applicable. But those who raise the cry give no reason for its inapplicability.

It seems very strange that no inquiry is ever made of the applicability of the Mineral Leasing Act—only the complete assumption there is no legislation presently in effect that is applicable. If you will pardon the reference, Senator, the recital in Senate Joint Resolution 20, introduced by you and Senator ANDERSON, states:

"* * * thus making it essential that this resolution be enacted in order to protect the interests of the United States pending the enactment of permanent legislation by the Congress respecting the submerged lands of the Continental Shelf * * *."

The apparent assumption by all that the Mineral Leasing Act was inapplicable led me to investigate some time ago this matter fully. A detailed investigation of this categoric assumption revealed that the entire premise and assumption was based on a very short opinion of the solicitor of the Interior Department. It is my honest belief after much research and thought that the opinion of the able solicitor is not in the slightest supported by law. To be sure, the then Attorney General of the United States gave a cursory approval of the opinion, but rendered no opinion of his own.

It seems unthinkable that the opinion of the solicitor has in effect led to the loss by the United States Government of millions in revenue and has further been the basis of a passive policy by the United States Government as to the billions of dollars of our subsea wealth. But there is even stranger activity no doubt based on and in line with the opinion of the solicitor. For example, in the offshore area off the city of Long Beach, Calif., we find the ill-conceived and illegal stipulated line, entered into by the then Secretary of the Interior and Attorney General. Neither officer of the United States Government has or had the authority to give away the property or rights of the United States, and I believe those in authority in other States should be aware of these facts. The stipulation continues with the ostensible approval of the Federal Government, and the city of Long Beach and the oil operators enjoy for themselves alone the wealth that belongs to the entire Nation. May I refer the Senator to the original surveys in this area of California which clearly show that much of the area landward of the stipulated line is open sea of the Pacific Ocean. The city of Long Beach claims to have an inland water, but an inland water is not made by building harbor installations—and those installation were built with money from the resources that belong to the entire Nation. I particularly emphasize this point, Senator, because you have been quoted in the press as defending the position of Long Beach. It is my belief, Senator, that the stipulated line should be abolished and the entire harbor or offshore area of Long Beach claimed for the Federal Government. But the passive policy of the Federal Government has resulted in Long Beach and the oil companies involved enjoying the wealth from the resources that belong to the entire Nation, including the particular State which you and I serve.

Now let us examine the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920, as amended. Section 1 of the act provides:

"Deposits of coal, phosphate, sodium, oil, oil shale, or gas and land containing such deposits owned by the United States, including those in national forests, but excluding the lands acquired under * * * the Appalachian Forest Act, and those in national parks, and in lands withdrawn or reserved for military or naval uses or purposes, except as hereinafter provided, shall be subject to disposition."

In my opinion, the provision could not be clearer. The applicability of the Mineral Leasing Act to submerged lands is clear and the Secretary of the Interior should and could have taken over the marginal sea area for and on behalf of the Federal Government. The authority in the above act is clear.

In all of this discussion I am not unmindful of the Presidential proclamation of September 28, 1945, and the Executive order of the same date whereby the resources of the Continental Shelf were placed under the jurisdiction and control of the Secretary of the Interior "for administrative purposes, pending the enactment of legislation in regard thereto." But again this should be no barrier to the Secretary of the Interior.

Assuming that such legislation is necessary and assuming, as everyone has done, that the Mineral Leasing Act is not applicable, it is clear that the Defense Production Act of 1950 gives clear authority additionally. Very broad general powers are given to the Executive. The act is also broad in its statement of authority given the Executive to delegate to various departments of the Federal Government, and the Secretary of the Interior has the same general powers to conserve and administer the mineral resources of the United States. Unquestionably the Defense Production Act of 1950 also gives the Secretary of the Interior authority under which to act as to all the mineral resources of the United States, including the subsea resources.

In connection with any proposed legislation, including Senate Joint Resolution 20, one very important consideration should not be overlooked. In view of the broad general scope of the legislation presently in effect, any legislation hereafter passed by Congress, including any interim bill, will result in numerous uncertainties and conflicts. It is my understanding, for example, that there are numerous suits pending in the Federal court in Washington, D. C., to test the applicability of the Mineral Leasing Act. The question of the arbitrary taking of property rights and the effect of retroactive legislation will also no doubt be the subject of litigation primarily by private applicants. If the Mineral Leasing Act is declared applicable, and my opinion is that such an eventuality is highly probable, we will then be in a maze of conflicts. Under the aforesaid circumstances, the national interest and national defense can only suffer.

Thus, I have the basis as pointed out for my great concern that the Secretary of the Interior should take action immediately to take over the lands in the marginal sea area. Present draining of the national wealth by a few is not in the best interests of the nation. I feel that my own State has great interests at stake, along with all the other States. The attitude of the Secretary of the Interior and the entire national policy, or lack of national policy, should not be based on the very questionable opinion written by the Solicitor of the Interior Department. The Secretary of the Interior has every right and authority to take over and administer the submerged lands in the marginal sea area for and on behalf of and in the interests of the entire Nation. And this right, in my opinion, is clear under existing legislation, particularly the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920, as amended.

Any proposed legislation at the present time will only help those who have shown themselves to be ruthless trespassers attempting to nullify the clear import of the decision of the highest court of the United States; it would aid only those who continue to violate the law—a few States, their assigns, and the oil companies. We can hardly expect the respect and obedience of ordinary citizens of law and order if trespassers are to be rewarded. Furthermore, any legislation will undoubtedly result in further legal action by others claiming rights in the marginal sea area thereby making the picture more cloudy. Meanwhile the trespassers will continue to drain the oil resources of the entire Nation, and attempt to nullify the clear import of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I don't wish to be misunderstood in this matter. The tremendous efforts you have exerted personally, and your committee, in an attempt to reach a satisfactory solution deserve the highest praise, and all who have knowledge of this problem are deeply appreciative. There are various stumbling blocks which cannot be overcome by legislation containing the various provisions that have been proposed, quitclaim and otherwise. It is my sincere belief that the national welfare and security, or foremost concern, can be benefited only by immediate, direct, and forceful action by the Secretary of the Interior in assuming control and administration of the 3-mile belt under presently existing legislation. Only in this manner can the rights of all persons be given due consideration, without sacrifice of the national welfare and security.

With kindest personal regards, and thanking you for this opportunity to express my views in this matter, I remain

Very truly yours,

JOE L. MARTINEZ,
Attorney General.

Reclamation Policies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HUGH BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 16, 1951

Mr. BUTLER of Nebraska. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address made by me to the Nebraska Reclamation Association last February, dealing with the recommendations of the special Commission appointed by the President to recommend a national water policy.

It is my information, Mr. President, that the Water Resources Policy Commission, upon completion of its three-volume report in February, submitted to the President the proposed legislation to which I referred in my remarks. It is understood that this was impounded by the Bureau of the Budget pending receipt of comments from the affected Federal agencies on the report. Doubtless some time will elapse before the Congress is advised of the administration's program.

I note that several national organizations have appointed special committees for studying the report and to make specific recommendations on it. Among these are the National Reclamation Association, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and the Edison Electric Institute. In view of the scope of the subject, and the inevitable struggle between State's rights advocates as against bureaucracy, it will probably be some months before we shall see the final proposals of the administration.

It is related that several Bureau of Reclamation speakers during the Spokane, Wash., meeting of the National Reclamation Association last November each began by stoutly affirming, "I am a bureaucrat." Webster's New International Dictionary, unabridged, defines bureaucracy as "a system of government by bureau heads, responsible only to administrative officers above them, having complete power over subordinates and, in official duties generally, not subject to the common law of the land." Which side will Senators support?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RECLAMATION POLICIES

(Address by Senator HUGH BUTLER)

About mid-December the Nation was advised by the press that something new had been submitted to the President, by a special commission appointed by him, relating to a water policy for the American people. This seven-man commission was created by an Executive order dated January 3, 1950, and it was declared to be a temporary agency of the President.

The Commission released at this time volume I of its report to the President. This volume contains the findings and the recommendations of the Commission. It is, in many respects, a splendid summary of exhaustive studies based upon the experience of Federal agencies in the fields of land uses, reclamation, flood control, water transportation, and their byproducts. Some of its recommendations are timely and are deserving of our continued consideration. I commend especially those recommendations concerning the necessity for more basic data and those stressing the importance of watershed management. I am inclined to agree generally with the reference to the responsibility of the Department of Agriculture in the selection of agricultural programs. However, I should like to discuss with you some of their recommendations about which I am uncertain and therefore suspicious. I have no knowledge of the nature of the legislation this Commission is now preparing to accomplish the achievement of its policy, therefore let us review the situation as it was developed. Paragraph 2 of the Executive order reads:

"The President's Water Resources Policy Commission shall study, and make recommendations to the President with respect to, Federal responsibility for and participation in the development, utilization, and conservation of water resources, including related land uses and other public purposes to the extent that they are directly concerned with water resources. The Commission shall give consideration in particular to (a) the extent and character of Federal Government participation in major water-resources programs, (b) an appraisal of the priority of water-resources programs from the standpoint of economic and social need, (c) criteria and standards for evaluating the feasibility of water-resources projects, and (d) desirable legislation or changes in existing legislation relating to the development, utilization, and conservation of water resources."

It appears that the Commission in some instances failed to achieve the goals in its charter, and in others went beyond the scope of its assignments. These are not necessarily serious faults. But as I read the introduction to the report, it seems to me that the recommendations are couched in such broad phraseology that definite conclusions as to their meaning is very difficult, if not impossible. I shall go into some details. However, let me assure you that any reasonable man, upon reading the whole of the policy as expressed in the 70 recommendations, could readily say that if a new and different policy is not here suggested, the study presented certainly leans strongly toward centralization of authority to be vested in a few men responsible only to Washington.

I will now briefly examine some of the 70 recommendations which make up the policy submitted to the President, confining myself to those that clearly concern the functions of reclamation and flood control. All recommendations are in conformity with certain principles the Commission first adopted, and they named this set of rules a framework. Let us examine this before we discuss the recommendations.

The framework is this: (1) Water resources programs are to achieve regional and national goals; (2) planning water resources works shall be through a single coordinator for each basin or region; (3) the test for the financial feasibility of the works should be standardized by simple rules; (4) all beneficiaries of public works should pay their share of the costs; (5) costs and reimbursements should be lumped together for each river basin, and the merits of individual undertakings should not be controlling.

I point out certain particular recommendations to show the general character and trend of the thinking of the Commission:

No. 1: "As a guide to national investment in natural resources development, all Federal agencies should be directed to judge new river basin programs in terms of a set of clearly defined national objectives established by Congress."

No. 4, in part: "Congress should set up a separate river basin commission for each of the major basins. These commissions, set up on a representative basis, should be authorized to coordinate the surveys, construction activities, and operations of the Federal agencies in the several basins, under the guidance of independent chairmen appointed by the President and with the participation of State agencies in the planing process."

No. 3: "Congress should direct the responsible Federal agencies to submit new proposals for water resources development to Congress only in the form of basin programs which deal with entire basins as units and which take into account all relevant purposes in water and land development. This multiple-purpose basin approach should apply to the whole process by which water-resources projects move from the survey to the authorization and appropriation stages."

Before going further, let us consider what principles we start out with. We have here as clear a recommendation as could be written for a valley-authority type of planning, development, and administration. While local interests may be consulted in the planning state, thereafter, they and their representatives in the Congress are out of the picture. Thereafter, the Congress only appropriates funds and the people pay whatever the separate river basin commissions determine to be necessary to make some repayments of the costs, and to provide funds for the employment of large numbers of investigators and administrators without limit. The question arises, naturally, as to the origin of these principles and recommendations.

On examination, it is evident that the several subcommittees appointed to prepare task-force reports on reclamation, power, navigation, and so forth, were completely controlled by employees of agencies of the Federal Government. Indeed, it is difficult to find in the list of the committee memberships the name of anyone not an employee of the Government. The only way the public had an opportunity to influence the finding of the Commission was through presentations at the half-dozen, or so, hearings held in the country.

I was on the Senate committee that held hearings on S. 555, Seventy-ninth Congress, a bill to create a Missouri Valley Authority. I signed the adverse report on this bill. I relate this to illustrate how sensitive I am to any bills which recommend commissions, administrations, or authorities to operate on an exclusive basis the programs for the development of water resources in the country. It will be specifically proposed by the President's Water Resources Policy Commission that 10 major basins be designated for the United States, each to be supervised by a river basin commission responsible to the President.

Going next to recommendations Nos. 8 and 14:

No. 8: "The orderly formulation of national water resources programs requires the establishment of a Federal Board of Review appointed by the President with the confirmation of the Senate. This Board should perform, among others, the functions of the review agencies recommended in the reports of the Hoover Commission."

No. 14: "Congress should direct all Federal departments and agencies responsible for the development of water and land resources, in cooperation with interested States, to promptly review all existing plans and programs, and to cooperate in preparing coordinated plans for water resources development for the several river basins. Plans already authorized by Congress should remain undisturbed unless this review results in specific recommendations for change."

Now we have the manifesto of the Commission. If a board of review were appointed with the powers suggested, such board would constitute the top level control of all the planning, construction and operation of reclamation, power and flood-control projects in the 17 Western States. Does anyone here have any doubts about it?

Perhaps I am prejudging the policy. In a short time, we will have the proposed legislation of the Commission, and it is hoped that it will be in a form fully understood by the Congress. We have seen an outstanding example of administrative misinterpretation of a simple statute where section 9 (c) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 is given as congressional approval to utility-type contracts with the water users on reclamation projects. I hope we may have the opportunity soon to correct this misinterpretation which is an evasion and nullification of basic reclamation law, both as to repayment and water rights. For this reason we will be obliged to scrutinize any new legislation with particular care.

Recommendations Nos. 25 and 26 are in such form that I am free to admit of ignorance as to what is mean by reimbursement for the various benefits of water conservation projects. No ceiling on repayment periods is suggested. The Congress will want to know about this, and about the controls over a farmer and his properties that may be required by the Secretary of the Interior, the Board of Review, or by the River Basin Commission. Perhaps the recommended legislation will include a section giving to the administration the power to enforce such rules and regulations as it deems proper in order to carry out its objectives. The Congress represents the people and cannot safely surrender its prerogatives to protect their interests. I do not intend to sponsor or to support legislation which will deny the rights of the people in the West to self-determination, and I speak broadly, in the matter of planning, use, and operation, and responsibility in local administration in connection with their own resources of land and water.

The executive department of our Government is rapidly and boldly assuming to itself powers never intended by law, and its stated objective is the valley authority form of river basin government. Would you expect the Water Policy Commission to act in a manner contrary to the plans of the President?

I hope this association will do its part in supporting the resolutions of your national organization, which I considered of sufficient importance to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Let us keep, in these troubled times, a clear and definite resolution to extend and preserve local autonomy.

To further and strengthen State rights in both the planning and development of its water resources, I suggest that this association could profitably consider endorsing legislation giving to the Governor, the State engineer, and the attorney general the authority and responsibility in these matters commensurate with their importance. Such legislation might create a commission including an attorney and an engineer, not employees or officers of the State, to pass on project feasibilities, on legalities of repayment districts and their financial capabilities. This procedure would not entail great expenditures and it would serve as a clearinghouse where there would be a guarantee of mutuality between Federal agencies and agencies of the State.

An Awakening America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, well fed, well clothed, well housed, comparatively happy and prosperous, careless and unthinking, in recent years the American people have let the Government get away from them.

Engaged in the pursuit of prosperity and happiness, of the good things of life, all too often complaining, demanding more of the Federal Government, forgetting that the Federal Government has nothing which it does not take first from them, our people have gone along the easy road.

Neither the first, the second nor the third world wars, with all the sacrifices made by those who either volunteered or were conscripted to fight in those wars, made our people conscious of what was happening to their Government and through that Government to them. Waste, extravagance, selfishness, corruption, and criminality—all grew and thrived throughout the Federal Government.

It took the removal of General MacArthur—the patriot who unselfishly for 52 years has given his surpassing talent in the service of our Armed Forces—to awaken them to a realization of what has been happening here. The removal of General MacArthur from his commands in Asia made possible his return to America—has given the American people the opportunity of learning first-hand the situation as it exists in Asia.

If now the people will follow through, heed the advice of Abraham Lincoln, when, on February 11, 1861, at Indianapolis, Ind., he told them, "It is your business to rise up and preserve the Union and liberty for yourselves, and not for me," our Nation's future will be secure.

Lincoln then added, "I appeal to you again to constantly bear in mind that not with politicians, not with Presidents' not with office seekers, but with you, is the question: Shall the Union and shall the liberties of this country be preserved to the latest generations?"

Editors, not only within but without the great metropolitan centers, often lead the thought of our people. Permit me to read three editorials. The first is from the pen of Mark P. Haines, who publishes the Sturgis Journal at Sturgis, Mich., and it reads as follows:

A DAY OF DEGRADATION

Gen. Douglas MacArthur, conqueror of Japan, and one of the greatest military tacticians the Nation has ever produced, has been fired. Not since Gen. Benedict Arnold tried to sell out his country in the war that won independence for the United States, has there occurred an event comparable in infamy to Truman's incredible abuse of his power.

Today the American people are stunned and bewildered by the contemptible action of President Harry Truman in removing from his high office a man whose achievements and reputation so far transcend those of the puny man in the White House that it is like a gnat trying to sting an elephant.

Under the Pendergast ward-heeler who tries to act like a President the Nation now touches a new low in political and diplomatic expediency. Ashamed and humiliated this once proud country bows its head in anger and indignation.

It will be a day of rejoicing for America's enemies. Removed from power is the one man of whom the Kremlin is afraid. It will bring satisfaction to the snipers in the United Nations which has never demonstrated any real desire for a decisive victory in the Korean war. From the very first, General MacArthur has seen the Korean conflict for what it really is—the initial move of the Communists to conquer the world.

Handicapped by diplomatic commissars in Washington and with only half-hearted and wholly inadequate support from other U. N. nations he has waged a magnificent war in Korea. Now, with victory in sight, he is removed from command by a disgruntled politician in Washington who has abjectly capitulated to the Reds in the U. N., England, and France. All of the bloody sacrifices that this country has made in Korea are now outweighed by consideration for our phony friends in the U. N.

One ray of hope remains. Douglas MacArthur is free now to return to the country he has served so well. He will be able to tell the American people the true story of what is happening in the Orient. We predict that it will arouse the Nation as it has not been aroused since Pearl Harbor was bombed by the Japs.

General MacArthur has not been fired by the American people he has served so generously. He will live forever as a symbol of our military genius along with Washington, Grant, Pershing, Sherman, and many others.

The time is now at hand for the American people to fire President Truman. It had better be soon.

The second editorial is written by Stanley Banyon, at one time an associate and adviser of Michigan's Senator William Alden Smith, now editor of the News-Palladium, of Benton Harbor, Mich. Mr. Banyon wrote:

AMERICA BETRAYED

The American tragedy of incompetence and intrigue in the highest echelons of the Nation's Government has come to a blazing climax with the dismissal by President Truman of General MacArthur, as supreme American commander in the Far East.

We refer explicitly to General MacArthur as the American commander, although his formal title has been United Nations commander. That is a misnomer and phony.

There is not now, and never has been, a United Nations worthy of the name. It was and now remains a delusion of addled brains.

Exercising his perogative as Commander in Chief, Mr. Truman dismissed one of America's greatest heroes because that man was compelled by patriotism and conviction to violate a rule of silence imposed upon him.

The Truman alibis will not fool the American people. As a soldier, General MacArthur owed obedience to his superior officer, but there are limits. Washington's foreign policy became so utterly insane that the commander in the field had no moral alternative but to speak out in protest.

For his morality and his courage, General MacArthur has been kicked out. He was discharged by a small-time politician who, confronted with the choice of standing by his subordinate and the American people or bowing to the dictates of a mercenary Britain, gave obeisance to the latter.

If there were any remaining tendrils of confidence in the White House and State Department, they have been destroyed by the President of the United States.

If there remained any hope that order would somehow miraculously emerge from chaos in Washington, it has been dashed.

The people, General MacArthur and thousands of American boys who are fighting in Korea over the bloody ground where their comrades died, have been betrayed.

The dismissal of General MacArthur is the greatest victory ever won by Josef Stalin.

There is joy and gaiety, no doubt, in the Kremlin, because the appeasers of infidel communism have triumphed. British trade has won and democracy has compromised with perfidy.

It will be hollow victory and a short one. The people of America are aroused as perhaps never before in the history of the Republic.

The Truman-Acheson gang must go. It will go into ignoble oblivion, forever disgraced.

It is the Truman policy—if such it may be called—to feed American flesh into the Korean maw, but to guarantee to the enemy that his bases shall be inviolate, his frontiers secure.

It is the Truman policy to accept the dictates of foreign schemers at whatever sacrifice may be entailed.

It is the Truman policy to appease communism in the east and mass America's resources to combat communism in the west.

It is nothing short of idiocy if not worse.

From the dark days of Bataan to the surrender of Japan in Tokyo Bay in 1945, General MacArthur led the forces of freedom back the long, heartbreaking road by land and sea. Because of his genius, Japan was speedily rehabilitated, morally, politically, and economically to become our stanch ally. Under his leadership American prestige rose to its greatest peak in Asia while American prestige and European will to survive ebbed in the west.

Washington condemned General MacArthur to the ill-starred Korean adventure. It refused his appeals for permission to knock out the Reds; it spurned his advice; it withheld from him the freedom of action to fight for victory.

In the darkness of this tragic hour in American history, there still shines the light of hope. The people at last shall know the truth, because General MacArthur is no longer forced to remain silent. He is free at last to return to the United States and to expose our country's plight.

In this climactic hour, General MacArthur has gained stature, and Harry Truman the bewildered has shrunk to pygmy size, a lackey for British socialist-imperialism.

The third editorial appeared in the Times-Herald of Washington the day after General MacArthur addressed the Congress. It follows:

AN AMERICAN SPEAKS

"Old soldiers never die. They just fade away."

But if this was the fade-out of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur, it was accomplished in a blinding flash of light.

RING OF TRUTH

No one who heard the general's intensely moving and dramatic oration will forget it. No one will fail to agree with its logic and compelling truth. In a stroke the fumbling debate over America's fumbling course in Korea was ended. The confusion was dispelled. There is nothing any longer to argue. There is no possibility of refutation.

For the country heard a great man, a sincere man, a patriot, speak. In long years it has not heard a voice like that. The glittering forensics of such a marter politician as Franklin Roosevelt were, in comparison, the sparkle of fool's gold, to catch the votes of fools.

The speeches of President Truman were reduced to the pitiful disclosures of the limits of a small mind.

For General MacArthur spoke, not to win something, but to save the two greatest things in his world—the security and liberty of the United States, and the infinitely precious lives of Americans wearing the same uniform as he. Of these Americans, thrown by Presidential warrant li to the slaughter in Korea without reference to Congress, with its constitutional prerogative of declaring war, MacArthur said:

"It was my constant effort to preserve them and end this savage conflict honorably and with the least loss of time and a minimum sacrifice of life."

HYPOCRISY IS NAILED

But, in this endeavor, their commander made unmistakably clear he was frustrated. If one is in a war—no matter how one may abhor war—the only possible o ject can be victory. When Red China intervened, after MacArthur's forces had totally defeated the original North Korean adversary, he called for reinforcements. He was told none would be forthcoming. He then proposed a series of military measures, none of them envisioning an insane ground war with China. The views he advanced were "fully shared by practically every military leader concerned with the Korean campaign, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff."

"Including the Joint Chiefs of Staff."

What consummate hypocrisy, then, was manifested by General Bradley, when Mr. Truman's chairman of the Joint Chiefs endeavored to counteract General MacArthur's address by publicly declaring, in advance of it, that the views entertained by MacArthur were "contrary to our best interests, and by jeopardizing world peace, ultimately would threaten our security." Bradley becomes a mere lackey for Truman.

But the military measures advanced by General MacArthur were not accepted. His counsel was spurned in "lay circles." What can that mean, except that the Nation's greatest military man was overruled by Truman, by Secretary of State Acheson, by the State Department appeasers who think that Communists can be jollied into good behavior, by the British foreign office, which seeks the preservation of its Asiatic colonial interests and its trade, and by the United Nations, that organization of global Mr. Micawbers, which spends its time, as the Korean conflict goes on and on, always in the hope that "something will turn up."

"The Chinese Communist intervention," said General MacArthur, "presented the fact of a new war. It called for new decisions in the diplomatic sphere to permit the realistic adjustment of military strategy. But," the general said, "such decisions have not been forthcoming."

WAR'S OBJECT IS VICTORY

Truman dawdled, Acheson dawdled, the appeasers thought up suitable bribes which might tickle the fancy of Communist China—among them the surrender of the island of Formosa, indispensable to America's future security—and the British aniped.

"I have constantly called for the new political solution essential to a solution," said MacArthur, for to continue in the course of inertia was to accept a situation which forbade victory and would result in the constant attrition of America's forces.

"War's very object is victory," the general said, "not prolonged indecision."

For all of his efforts to win the war or end it honorably and to save life, the reward the general received was, in his own words, "to be called a warmonger," especially by those foreign elements, particularly British which were forever seeking to discredit and undermine his position—their own stake, through combat participation in Korea, being negligible.

When the State Department appeasers temptingly held out their bribes to the Communist enemy—even to the promise of Formosa, whose surrender, in MacArthur's view, could entail an American retreat to the west coast—his soldiers asked him: Why surrender military advantages to an enemy in the field?

"I could not answer."

HIS GREATEST SERVICE

General MacArthur has put before Congress its duty to the American people, and to their sons in Korea. It is to abandon the U. N. program of drift and delay, the Acheson program of bestowing a loving embrace upon Communist assassins to court their favor, the Truman program of consigning Americans to the meat grinder of a never-ending war, the British program of using the United Nations and our own State Department to hold the arms of the American fighting man while the Reds slug him.

General MacArthur's magnificent appearance was the final service in a career of 52 years of "an old soldier who tried to do his duty as God gave him the light to see that duty." Of all his memorable services, this, perhaps, was the greatest.

Importance of United Public Opinion on Public Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 16, 1951

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I have long been acquainted with the work of an organization devoted to advancing American ideals on the international scene, called the Society for the Prevention of World War III. It had been my intention to address the semiannual meeting of its board of directors in New York City on the 29th day of this month, but because of my official duties as a delegate to the International Labor Conference in Geneva, I shall be out of the country on that date. I therefore ask that the text of the address which I had intended to deliver may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. JAMES E. MURRAY, OF MONTANA, PREPARED FOR DELIVERY AT THE SEMIANNUAL MEETING OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF WORLD WAR III, NEW YORK CITY, MAY 29, 1951

In the long run, the lifeblood of a dynamic democracy is nourished by the active participation of all the people in the crucial issues affecting their lives. The shrewdest observers of the American scene have noted that the vitality of our democratic institutions has in a large measure stemmed from the fact that throughout our land there are numerous private organizations sponsored by groups of citizens actively dedicated to the security of our institutions and the solution of our economic, political, and social problems. These organizations provide our people with the opportunity to participate in the life of our country and to ultimately contribute to its security and the shaping of its destiny.

The various representatives of departments of our Government consult with these private organizations from time to time, since they provide our Government with a cross section of American public opinion and thereby enable our officials to formulate policies corresponding to the needs and wishes of the people. These organizations therefore play a vital role in strengthening the hand of Government whether it be in time of peace or of war.

Among these organizations which have come to my attention over the past few years and in which I have been particularly interested, is the Society for the Prevention of World War III. It is a unique organization. Indeed, I do not believe that there is any other group of its kind in this country today. Strange as it may seem the Society for the Prevention of World War III was founded during the latter part of World War II when the fortunes of the Allies were rising and the future of the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Axis was bleak. Yet its founders were farsighted enough to stress the importance of preventing World War III. They were realists, and it was their firm conviction that unless the seeds of World War I which flowered into World War II were destroyed, then the United States and the rest of the world would be confronted with a greater and more devastating holocaust.

As is characteristic with most American organizations and groups, the founders of the Society for the Prevention of World War III came from all walks of life. I am personally familiar with their backgrounds, their complete devotion to American ideals, and their high sense of honor and integrity.

Permit me to dwell for a moment on the identity of some of the founders of the Society for the Prevention of World War III.

Mr. Rex Stout, the well-known author, who served with distinction as chairman of the War Writers Board during World War II, was one of the Society's leading spirits. During the war he took on the task of exposing the propaganda of the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Axis and his devastating barbs made the Nazis and the henchmen of Hirohito most unhappy.

Mr. C. Monteith Gilpin was another founder of the Society for the Prevention of World War III. Though a lawyer by profession, Mr. Gilpin devoted much of his time to analyzing world events and was a keen student of German militarism.

Mr. Lyle Evans Mahan was the first vice president of the Society. As the son of the brilliant Admiral Mahan, he captured the spirit of his father's concern for American security.

Herbert C. Pell succeeded Mr. Mahan as vice president of the Society for the Prevention of World War III. Mr. Pell is among our most distinguished Americans. His reputation is firmly established not only in the United States but abroad. He is a student of history, a statesman, and a diplomat. Mr. Pell was former American Ambassador to Portugal and Hungary. He was the former vice chairman of the Democratic National Campaign Committee, and, from 1919–21 he served as a member of the Sixty-sixth Congress. His profound understanding of international events was a decided asset to the Society's work. Mr. Pell was the American delegate to the Allied War Crimes Commission, which organization prepared the ground work for the international war-crimes trials. Through his long experiences abroad, Mr. Pell was able to discern the pattern of German aggression long before it became evident to most of his countrymen. I can say without exaggeration that not only the Society, but the American people at large, are fortunate in having in their midst this wonderful citizen and clear thinker.

Among the other members of the Society's council are to be found such distinguished leaders of American thought as Mr. Louis Nizer, nationally prominent attorney, and author of several books, including the much-read What To Do With Germany; Mr. Dean Alfange, formerly chairman of the Liberal Party; Mr. Clarence H. Low, the well-known former treasurer of the Democratic State Committee of New York; Dr. Bernard De Voto, of the editorial board of Harper's magazine and the Saturday Review of Literature; Mr. William L. Shirer, the internationally famous radio commentator, author, and foreign correspondent; Mr. Quentin Reynolds, the universally beloved war correspondent; Mr. William B. Ziff, prominent New York and Chicago publisher; Rear Adm. S. S. Isquith, retired, one of the great heroes of Pearl Harbor; Mr. R. J. Thomas, the respected labor leader; Prof. Mark Van Doren, of Columbia University; Dr. Lewis Mumford, the well-known philosopher and historian; Mr. Richard De Rochemont, producer of the March of Time; Dr. Albert Simard, a founder and leader of that powerful arm of French resistance during the Nazi occupation, France Forever; the Reverend Roelif H. Brooks, respected rector of St. Thomas' Church in New York; and Mr. Morris L. Cooke, the distinguished consulting engineer who has served our Government in a dozen vital capacities during three different wars.

Another of the Society's founders is Mr. Isidore Lipschutz, successful businessman whose experiences in Europe and knowledge of the fundamental forces making for war, equipped him to play an important role in the development of the Society's educational work.

The men who organized the Society were convinced that as a first step toward preventing a new war, it would be essential to eradicate the roots of German aggression. They were fully aware that these roots were deep in the soil of German history. The German impulse to war goes back to the days of Frederick the Great. Later, this militaristic drive enabled Prussia to conquer the rest of Germany and then to inflict a devastating defeat on France in 1870. As we all know, the German drive of conquest did not stop in the nineteenth century. On the contrary, in 1914 Prussian militarism ran rampant spreading death and destruction throughout Europe. Had it not been for the timely intervention of the United States, the dreams of the Kaiser may well have been realized.

The special victim of this aggression has, of course, been our sister Republic of France—the country whose history has, along with our own, so often provided the birthplace for new movements of liberty and freedom. During the Second World War, in connection with my official duties, I had occasion again and again to realize the unbelievable, unjustifiable and inhuman suffering to which the people of France have been put as a result of three wars of German aggression within the last 75 years—and we must look through the eyes of the widows and orphans of France, if we would appraise Prussian terrorism fully as the evil thing that it is.

The humanist traditions of Goethe, Heine, Schiller could not withstand the paralysis of Prussian militarism and its goose-stepping culture. The glorification of war became the dominant theme of those who controlled the minds and the destinies of the German people. It was expressed in the ideology of Pan-Germanism which intoxicated the Germans with the idea that they were the super race and that the German Nation had the special mission to rule the world and to establish the German order everywhere.

As early as 1905, the Pan-German professor, Josef Ludwig Reimer, wrote in his book A Pan-German Germany, "Our race with its culture is superior to all the other nations and races of the earth; for * * * our civilization has reached a height where it incomparably excels and dominates that of all the other nations and races of the earth." This mad boast was repeated by Kaiser Wilhelm II who, in his saber-rattling speech at Tangier in 1905, said: "We are the salt of the earth * * * God has created us so that we should civilize the world."

Germans who had been brought up in the humanist traditions found life in Germany intolerable. Many of them departed, repeating the exodus of German liberals from Germany in 1848. Several of these Germans were associated with the foundation of the Society for the Prevention of World War III.

Two internationally known figures who lived most of their lives as Germans but who also departed from the growing militarism of their native land, were Dr. Emil Ludwig, the noted historian, and Prof. Friedrich Wilhelm Foerster, philosopher, educator, and statesman. Dr. Ludwig spared no effort during World War II to counsel the Allies as to the policies they should pursue in the occupation of Germany. His was the voice of experience and many of his suggestions received the serious consideration of Allied officials.

Dr. Foerster who came from an old Prussian family with a long militaristic tradition almost lost his life in his dauntless efforts to put the world on the alert regarding the intentions of the German militarists. Dr. Foerster is probably the leading authority on Pan-Germanism and his works have an international reputation. His numerous books on philosophy and education have been translated into most European languages and his teachings today are applied by German educators.

Professor Foerster's voice was not stilled when he was forced in 1923 to flee from the clutches of the German General Staff. In 1926, when the great powers met in Geneva, Switzerland, to discuss disarmament, Dr. Foerster boldly revealed the plans of the German General Staff to secretly rearm behind the pacifistic mouthings of the German Foreign Minister Stresemann in whom so many western statesmen had confidence. Throughout the 1930's, Professor Foerster warned against the folly of appeasing Hitler and foretold that that policy would only hasten the day when the German armies would sweep over Europe. We Americans owe Dr. Foerster a debt of gratitude for his courageous and sacrificial efforts to alert us in time as to the true intentions of the Nazis and the German militarists. Though Dr. Foerster is 80 years old, he continues to lend leadership and wise counsel, and it is my sincere hope that we Americans shall always take heed of what he says.

These are some of the individuals who helped create the Society for the Prevention of World War III. And as I have indicated, they did so motivated by the highest kind of patriotism. I realize that my description of Pan-Germanism has been brief, and I could elaborate more fully on it. Perhaps the following illustration will make clear just what Pan-Germanism means, not only in terms of world peace but in terms of the security of the United States of America.

I believe that it is not generally known by most Americans that in 1899 Commander Dewey, who later became admiral, reported to the United States Navy a most significant conversation he had held with the German admiral, von Goetzen. This occurred shortly before the battle of Manila Bay took place and at a time when a clash seemed imminent between German naval cruisers and American warships. Von Goetzen told Commander Dewey (and here, so that there can be no misunderstanding, let me say that I am quoting from the official archives of the U. S. Navy Department, record 38 vol. 52, p. 558): "About 15 years from now my country will start a great war. She will be in Paris about 2 months after the commencement of hostilities. Her move on Paris will be but a step to her real object—the crushing of England. Some months after we finish our work in Europe we will take New York and probably Washington and hold them for some time. We will put your country in its place with reference to Germany. We do not propose to take any of your territory, but we do intend to take a billion or so of your dollars from New York and other places. The Monroe Doctrine will be taken charge of by us. We will then have to put you in your place and we will take charge of South America as we wish to. Don't forget, about 15 years from now it will interest you."

The predictions of the German admiral seemed fantastic; yet, as we all know, World War I started 16 years later. How many of our leaders understood at that time the aspirations of pan-Germanism and what a serious challenge they were to our very existence? I do not believe that many did. But the record does show that Admiral Mahan, as early as 1890, understood the real face of German imperialism. In his book, The United States Looking Outward, he wrote:

"All over the world German commercial and colonial push is coming into collision with other nations. * * * It is noteworthy that, while these various contentions are sustained with the aggressive military spirit characteristic of the German Empire, they are credibly said to arise from the national temper more than from the deliberate policy of the Government which in this matter does not lead, but follows the feeling of the people—a condition much more formidable."

These documents were first brought to the general attention of the American people when they were published in the third issue of the Society's magazine, Prevent World War III, in September 1944. These documents and others which the Society has published from time to time show how far back we have to go to understand the forces underlying the upsurge of nazism.

The Society for the Prevention of World War III was never under any illusions with regard to nazism. It did not regard Hitlerism as an aberration or as a passing phenomenon. On the contrary, the Society saw in nazism the twentieth-century expression of the Pan-German drive for world conquest and the subversion of other nations by force, infiltration, and trickery.

Professor Foerster, who, as I said, is probably our outstanding authority on the problem, has reported from time to time the aims of the Pan-Germans. He quoted the Kaiser as stating during the First World War that "Three Punic wars will be needed to crush the Anglo-American powers." He has reported the statements of leading German geopoliticians: "The First World War destroyed France as a first-rate power. The Second World War inflicted deadly wounds on the British Empire, and the third world war will deal the death blow to the United States." Professor Foerster has also quoted Hitler's leading geopolitician and adviser, Haushofer, as telling an American newspaper correspondent, Carlton Smith, "Young men, we think in terms of centuries. In case we should lose this war you may be sure that from the first hour of the armistice we shall prepare for the next war."

Is it any wonder that the people who founded the Society stressed the importance of preventing the recurrence of German militarism? They were well aware of the nature of Pan-Germanism in all its guises, whether it be nazism, supernationalism, or aggressive militarism. The Society has constantly refused to underestimate the intentions of the German master minds. They have never indulged in wishful thinking. That is why the Society's educational program is based on the record of German history and on the nature of Pan-Germanism.

The Society was determined to inform the people as to the dangers not merely of nazism but of the whole complex of militaristic and chauvinistic doctrines which have saturated the German mind for almost 100 years.

From 1943 to the present, the Society has endeavored to explain and enlighten the American people as to the meaning of the German problem and its relationship to world peace and security. In planning the peace, the Society, on the basis of its studies, suggested that a realistic solution of the German problem would involve the following:

1. That Germany's war potential be whittled down to genuine peacetime needs.

2. That encouragement be given to the development of German light industries.

3. That Germany compensate at least in part in reparations to those nations victimized by her aggressions.

4. That the huge German cartels and economic concentrations be smashed so as to foster the development of genuine free enterprise, something which the Germans have never known.

5. That all the major war criminals who were responsible for the mass slaughter of millions of human beings be apprehended and prosecuted to the fullest extent of international law.

6. That a realistic and thorough denazification program be enforced so as to prevent the same forces which served the Kaiser and then Hitler from regaining positions of power.

7. That German political institutions be decentralized, thereby avoiding the re-creation of a new Reich

8. That all German assets and loot salted away in neutral countries be vested in the allies and allocated proportionately to all the victims of German aggression.

9. That a broad program of democratization be instituted as a first step toward eradicating the superman obsession of the German people.

10. That such institutions and organizations as churches, trade unions, business associations, be encouraged to partake in the development of a truly democratic Germany which could be accepted into the family of nations.

These fundamental recommendations were not out of step with our national interests. On the contrary, they formed the core of American policy in Germany in 1945. This fact alone demonstrates that the Society's educational program was predicated at all times on the basic desire to serve the national interest. Through the years the Society has endeavored through its manifold educational program to enlighten the people on the German problem. The Society's literature, particularly its bimonthly magazine, Prevent World War III, and the booklet, Know Your Enemy, has been widely read and circulated. During the war requests for the Society's regular publications as well as requests for specific research jobs in connection with Army orientation programs came to the Society from military establishments in the United States and abroad. All of this material was provided free of charge. I think it appropriate to read excerpts from some of the letters I have seen from Army establishments which assess the Society's educational work in relation to the Army orientation programs.

Here are some examples:

"[This Society's magazine] is splendid source material for the lectures that my orientation officer and I have been working up, and I am most anxious to obtain a copy. I should be very grateful to learn how I can do so. I should like also to get approximately three copies of Know Your Enemy for my orientation reading room. It is most encouraging to learn that this educational work, so necessary to prevent a recurrence of war, is being carried on. I feel that informing my men on this subject is a vital part of their training." (Letter to Rex Stout, president, Society for the Prevention of World War III; signed by Brig. Gen. Eric S. Molitor, Camp Mackall, N. C.)

"I was much taken by the first-rate analysis of the troop information problem as presented in your October letter to the Secretary of War. * * * I enjoyed my brief visit to New York, the meeting of the writers' board and the opportunity to meet you and some of your friends." (Letter to Isidore Lipschutz, treasurer, Society for the Prevention of World War III; signed by Brig. Gen. C. T. Lanham, Director, Information and Education Division of the War Department.)

In connection with this, it is interesting to note that Brigadier General Lanham incorporated some of the Society's studies in official publications.

"I wish to take this occasion to acknowledge receipt of and to thank you for your literature dedicated to the prevention of world war III. The material was extremely interesting to me and is very vividly and effectively presented. Your line of reasoning and logical conclusions cannot fail to impress all who see it with the scope and importance of your venture. It is one which should not fail." (Signed by Col. Delmar T. Spivey, of the Army Air Corps in Barksdale Field, La.)

"I have been distributing society material to every suborganization in the field artillery school and the field artillery replacement training center as well as post headquarters organizations. I have also checked with other officers and they state my distribution has been their only source of supply. They also praise very highly the type of material you are putting out." (Signed by Maj. Albert W. Holt, post information educational officer, Fort Sill, Okla.)

"A copy of your booklet Know Your Enemy, by T. H. Tetens, has come into my possession. The factual data contained in the text of this booklet is considered of such importance in the conduct of the activities of this office that it is desired that additional copies of this book be obtained for the use of officers engaged in the activities of morale services in this theater. I regret that I have no available budget to procure these booklets but if it is possible I would like to have any number from 25 to 100." (Signed by Col. William P. Scobey, of the North African Theater of Operations, SOS NATOUSA.)

Gilbert C. Ashley, first lieutenant and orientation officer for the Second Parachute Training Regiment at Fort Benning, Ga., wrote that the Society had "exceptionally interesting and educational material for public consumption." In addition, he told the Society that this material would "be incorporated into the general educational program displayed in day rooms, service clubs, and our library."

Capt. Richard F. Eggers, attached to the Information and Education Section, Headquarters, Forty-third Infantry Division, wrote:

"I am taking this opportunity to thank you very much for all the valuable literature that you have been sending us from your organization. Your literature had had a wide circulation and is invaluable."

First Lt. Arthur B. Lawrence, assistant orientation officer at Camp Mackall, N. C., commenting on the book What To Do With Germany, written by Louis Nizer, one of the members of the Society's advisory council, and distributed by the Society, wrote:

"I can say without qualification that it is one of the finest I have ever read on this politically and diplomatically vague subject."

I could go on reading numerous other letters expressing deep appreciation for the Society's educational work. However, I believe the above samples are indicative of the Society's patriotic services which helped to buttress our Army's morale during the most difficult days of the war.

Indeed, as late as January 15, 1948, R. T. Alexander, Chief of the Educational and Religious Affairs Branch of the Office of Military Government in Germany, wrote the Society as follows:

"I am sure that there are many ways in which your organization could be of assistance to our program of education here, either through visitation or direct assistance and advice."

Letters requesting the Society's publications have come from the highest quarters of our Defense Establishment, such as the United States Military Academy at West Point, the War Department, and from the Army War College.

Lt. Gen. Hoyt Vandenberg, former head of the Central Intelligence Group, wrote the Society expressing appreciation for its offer to assist in the "full establishment and operation of the Central Intelligence Group." In addition, he declared his hopes "for the complete success of your own [that is, the Society's] vitally important mission."

Maj. Gen. John H. Hilldring, of the War Department, wrote the Society a letter, from which I quote:

"I think it is highly important that our citizens maintain an interest in the vital business of establishing a peaceful world, and I have been very much interested in the lively manner in which your Society is doing its part in this enormously important and difficult task."

Col. Herman Beukema, professor at the Military Academy at West Point, wrote the following:

"The material in your magazine is of more than usual interest to the officers of this department and likewise to our cadets. As future officers, the latter can anticipate a long spell of duty in Germany. The manner and effectiveness of their performance will have a definite relationship to the allies' success or failure in salting the roots of World War III."

The Society has also received the warm commendations of many of our civilian officials both from the executive as well as legislative branches of the Government.

In a letter dated August 9, 1945, President of the United States Harry S. Truman wrote to the executive secretary of the Society as follows:

"I am strengthened and encouraged by the fine message received today signed by you as executive secretary and by Mr. Rex Stout as president and the many other citizens associated with you in the Society for the Prevention of World War III.

"These are indeed grave days and the whole effort of serious-minded men and women is and must be directed increasingly to the task of preventing another holocaust such as that which the civilized world has suffered now for almost 6 years. It is well, therefore, that so earnest a group as yours is already working to prevent its repetition."

Owen J. Roberts, then Supreme Court Justice, wrote the Society acknowledging a copy of Know Your Enemy. He said:

"Let me congratulate you on your work for the prevention of another war. Too few of the thinking and influential citizens of the nation are working on this problem. More power to you."

William Power Maloney, assistant to the Attorney General, said of the Society's magazine:

"I received the October Bulletin today and I read it through without putting it down.

"It is a grand job you are doing and one that is vitally necessary in these days when the kind-hearted muddleheads are doing their best to set us up for the third and possibly the last strike."

C. S. Black, Third Assistant Postmaster General, wrote the following in a letter to the Society:

"I have received your letter of March 13 and also your booklet, Know Your Enemy, which I have read with a great deal of interest. The contents of Know Your Enemy should be read by every thinking person who is concerned with the problem which faces us right now as well as a reconstruction period after the war is won.

"It is my opinion that you have dealt with your subject in a reasonable and logical manner and without any attempt to distort the facts."

From the United States Senate the Society has received praise both from Republicans and Democrats alike.

In praising the Society's educational work, Senator HENDRICKSON wrote the following:

"A cursory examination of the latest issues of your magazine furnishes eloquent testimony to the fact that you have a well coordinated program and that you are directing your enthusiastic support toward the major issue of the world today, and, namely, that of establishing a just and lasting peace."

The former Senator and now Supreme Court Justice Harold H. Burton having received a copy of Know Your Enemy wrote:

"I have received the copy which you sent me of Know Your Enemy. This had come to my attention before, but I am glad to have this special opportunity to take it up and go further with it. I may add that Mrs. Burton picked up Know Your Enemy this morning, read it through and was deeply impressed with the strength and seriousness of the message it presented."

Senator MCMAHON replying to the receipt of the Society's literature said:

"I am anxious to keep up with the facts on Germany's condition and your letter has been a help."

The many articles published by the Society have been extensively used and quoted in the press. Many newspaper correspondents and columnists have also referred to its splendid work. The News published in Lynchburg, Va. (July 1, 1944), recommended that all individuals who were interested in international problems obtain copies of the Society's magazine, Prevent World War III. The newspaper editorial continued:

"So soundly edited is this bulletin, Prevent World War III, that it is difficult to see how its contents can be effectively challenged. The material covers every phase of German culpability at present and in the past.

"We know of no organization better able to guide properly and soundly the thinking of the American people along lines of winning the war and the peace and preventing another world war than the Society for the Prevention of World War III as represented in its bulletin."

The radio commentator Foster Williams devoted an entire program to the Society's work (December 10, 1944). Mentioning the danger of the German fifth column in this country, he said:

"Isn't anyone combating these groups—you will ask? * * * Have they the field to themselves? Is everyone in America sitting back and letting them get away with what they are doing completely unchallenged? No, thank God, there is one organization that is fighting them with all the might they can muster—the Society for the Prevention of World War III."

He further remarked that he desired "everyone who is listening to me tonight to read the literature of the Society for the Prevention of World War II. You owe it to yourselves to be informed on the thing that is second only in importance to winning the present war—the making of a permanent peace."

The Servicemen's Magazine of June 21, 1945, contained the following item:

"The Society for the Prevention of World War III has made reprints of a brilliant study of this highy topical subject by Francis X. C. Balling, associate research professor at the Graduate School of Fordham University. Based on thorough research, Professor Balling's piece gives figures and facts on why Germany should and could be deindustrialized without endangering the livelihood of the German people."

The Independent Star of Indianapolis (January 13, 1946) ran an editorial which began as follows:

"Delegates at the London General Assembly meeting of the United Nations organization will take courage in knowing that help is being mobilized in this country. The Society for the Prevention of World War III has been incorporated and is functioning from a suite of New York offices. It has supporters in all parts of the country. Theirs is a spirit of patriotic endeavor that deserves commendation."

The Honolulu Star-Bulletin (August 8, 1946) in reviewing the Society's magazine, Prevent World War III, said:

"The periodic publication of this pamphlet (Prevent World War III) enables us to keep in mind the major premises upon which our European occupation plans were first established and to check the progress or difficulties which are being encountered. This nonprofit organization is working with honest zeal to check the short-sighted sympathy which would aid Germany once again to triumph over her neighbors."

On September 18, 1948, the Denver Post wrote the following:

"In our preoccupation with the Soviet-American struggle Americans tend to forget that there are forces in this country working for the revival of German might, for Deutschland ueber alles.

"The voices of the pro-Germans and pro-Nazis in the United States were stilled by the war, and even now are not yet much more than a whisper. But they are whispering constantly to advocate the rebuilding of the German military machine.

"The most tangible evidence of this appears in the German-language press in this country. A few examples from the bimonthly magazine of the Society for the Prevention of World War III indicate that there is a definite move in America to rebuild Germany—not as a productive nation in an integrated European economy but as a strong military state."

On June 29, 1949, Edward A. Harris, Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, mentioning reports from the Office of Military Government regarding the resurgence of neo-nazism said:

"This report lends weight to the repeated contention of the Society for the Prevention of World War III that nazism is on the rise in Germany and that efforts to democratize the defeated nation have been largely ineffectual."

The Society's educational program and work is quite large in scope considering that it employs a small staff and that it depends on voluntary contributions. For example, the Society established a radio department which presents the Society's educational material in dramatic form. Literally, thousands upon thousands of requests are received for the scripts put out by this department. More than 1,000 schools and 55 radio stations utilize the material put out by the radio department. I have seen many letters ranging from elementary schools to universities praising these scripts which are sent out free of charge.

More than 100,000 books dealing with various aspects of the German problem were distributed free of charge. The Society's literature has a nation-wide circulation. A remarkable booklet, Know Your Enemy, has been distributed in the hands of tens of thousands, not only among the civilian population, but in Army camps both here and abroad. Its magazine, Prevent World War III, also has a nation-wide circulation; its fine articles and studies have been used by well-known newspaper columnists, radio commentators and students of international affairs. Practically every newspaper editor in the country receives Prevent World War III as do thousands of universities, libraries, professional organizations, etc. It is widely read among the American officials in the office of the high commissioner for Germany. Because of the excellence of many of the studies prepared by the Society for the Prevention of World War III, they have often been inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In addition to these educational services the Society for the Prevention of World War III has provided many organizations with speakers and consultants who are experts on international affairs. Veterans' organizations, women's organizations, church groups, business associations and trade unions have from time to time consulted with the Society's experts and have used the Society's material. The frequency with which the Society's material is used may not always be obvious in view of the fact that it has never sought publicity. Indeed, it is the policy of the Society for the Prevention of World War III that all of the original material published in its magazine may be reprinted or quoted. The Society is primarily concerned with the security of our people and with the problem of enlightening them with regard to the prerequisites for lasting peace.

It is not without significance, I believe, that the Society's literature is constantly referred to and quoted in the foreign press whether it be in Europe or as far away as Australia.

As I have mentioned, the Society does not harbor any illusions as to the future role of Germany in world affairs. To some extent the Society's assessment of the German problem is summed up by the words of Mr. Herbert Hoover in the introduction to the Future of German Industrial Exports, by H. Herzog, published by Doubleday, Page & Co., 1918:

"Not content with dominion by force of arms, we find Germany plotting for commercial supremacy, with that insolent disregard of the rights of others and that resort to deception that has characterized all her policies since Frederick the Great's reign. * * * For 40 years the Germans have been plotting to realize their dream of Pan-Germanism—eventual world conquest and dominion. For two generations they have been thinking in terms unknown or little understood by an innocent and unsuspecting world * * * deception and fraud form the background of their most important international relations and undertakings. They have made Germany an inherently dishonest nation. * * * Well organized and comprehensive espionage and insidious German propaganda have been at work for two generations to plan the success of German victories. * * * Let the manufacturing, the banking interests, and the laboring and professional classes of all nations be warned in time to devise antidotes and counterattacks to the Machiavellian devices of a class gone mad with lust of conquest, deliberately plotting to fatten itself upon the life blood of other peoples even after the war. Let us consider in making peace what protection we can give to the commercial existence of the freed nations."

This statement by Mr. Herbert Hoover was reprinted in the February-March 1947 issue of Prevent World War III.

From Mr. Hoover's remarks, with which the Society wholeheartedly concurs in its publications, the belief that Germany can be a reliable bulwark in the defense of the west against the forces of aggressive communism is sheer day dreaming. The Society has shown that through the years before and since the war the Germans have played a double game, playing east against west, extracting as much as it could from the present cold war. More than that, the Society has shown that the Germans, given the opportunity, would not hesitate to enter into an alliance with the Soviets against the west.

In its publication, Prevent World War III, the Society pioneered in exposing the Soviet-sponsored Free German Committee, which had as one of its main objectives the preparation of such a tie-up once the war was over. The Society has published authentic documents showing the close collaboration between the German General Staff and the Russians. In the September-October 1949 issue of Prevent World War III, one of these sensational documents entitled "Germany Looks to the East," revealed how the German General Staff was planning their postwar resurgence based on an alliance with the Soviets, even while pretending that they were the arch foes of communism. This memorandum, written a few days before the German surrender in 1945, was initialed by the chief of the high command of Hitler's Wehrmacht, Field Marshal Keitel and Grand Admiral Doenitz.

In the most recent issue of Prevent World War III, the Society published an extended analysis by Dr. Jean Pajus, entitled "Back Door Trade Between Ruhr Industrialists and the Iron Curtain Countries." In this article, Dr. Pajus cites facts proving that the Ruhr barons who supported Hitler are trying by hook or crook to establish close ties with the Russians and their satellites. Indeed, the Society discloses the amazing fact, which incidentally received scant publicity in the American press, that some of the leading German trusts had recently been advertising in the Communist papers in the western zones. These factual exposés of German-Russian relations are intended to keep the American people vigilant as to the true designs of the Germans. They are intended to prevent the American people from falling into the trap of complacency with regard to the ramifications of the revival of Germany's economic power.

The Society has long warned against the danger of a German-Russian tie-up. Historically, militarists in both countries have long dreamed of the Juggernaut which might be built, by combining German technical resources and Russian manpower.

The obvious facts of geography, and the repeated lessons of history, should warn us that this danger is no mere dream-world phantasmagoria. Level-headed reflection will tell us that it is in fact the one greatest danger which might suddenly confront the free world of today.

Just as the Krupp family of pre-World War II days did "good business," both with the Russians and with the Third Reich, so may Krupp today, newly freed, again do "good business" with both sides, if we permit, in the not far distant future. Only by reducing Germany's economic power to the minimum of genuine peacetime needs, the society maintains, can the danger of a German-Russian rapprochement be safely averted.

Today's back-door trading between Russia and Germany, given the opportunity, can develop overnight into a full-fledged German-Russian combine. This is the grim prospective which the society spotlights.

The possible harnessing of German economy by Russia would of course lose most of its potential danger if Germany's war power were whittled down in advance, for then any eventual alliance between Germans and Russians would not significantly increase Russia's aggressive strength. Such a realistic approach to the German problem, the Society believes, would be the best means of averting the catastrophe of a Russo-German alliance.

The Society has maintained its position against the revival of the German war machine, against the resurgence of nazism and of the cartels, and against the possibility of a Russo-German alliance.

In the first issue of its magazine in May 1944, the Society for the Prevention of World War III carried a sensational secret memorandum attributed to General von Stulpnagel, one of the most influential of the German militarists. This secret memorandum said that Germany must avoid the mistakes of World War II. Von Stulpnagel said:

"In the next world war, which should take place within 25 years, the same mistake must not be made. The principal adversary will be the United States and the entire effort must be concentrated against this country from the beginning. * * * We shall be wrong if we try to conquer Russia, while leaving intact the American industrial potential."

In planning for German resurgence, the memorandum said:

"Our enemies will grow weary before we do. We shall have to organize a campaign of pity designed to induce them to send us needed supplies at the earliest possible moment. Above all, we must hold on to the assets we have deposited in neutral countries. * * *

"The present war will thus have been victorious in spite of our provisional defeat because it will have been a march forward toward our supremacy. * * * We have not to fear conditions of peace analogous to those we have imposed because our adversaries will always be divided and disunited. * * * We must force ourselves to create in the coming peace treaty the germs of future divisions. * * * These are the conditions for victory."

Thus spoke General von Stulpnagel and, as the Society has proven, he is not the only important German general who has expressed such views.

It is the considered judgment of the Society that Pan-Germanism has not been destroyed. A reading of the Society's literature shows that the forces of Pan-Germanism are rising again under new disguises and new slogans.

The reprieves and pardons just granted a large number of important Nazi personages by Commissioner McCloy and General Handy serve only to underline the manner in which we again fall prey to the wiles of German militarism. Why should we have to release from prison Nazi officers who helped plot the massacre of American soldiers? Why should we have to pardon the chief munitions suppliers of Adolf Hitler? There is a certain school of psychiatry which contends that when people get together to do a great crime, they end up with a subconscious desire to exterminate themselves. Perhaps, in the crime that we are now doing, by preparing the way for the revival of German militarism, we are indeed moved by a subconscious motive of self-destruction.

In ending my comments on the Society for the Prevention of World War III, I think it appropriate to quote from the Christian Science Monitor of March 3, 1950. Writing under the title of "Neo-Nazism; Unfinished Business," Mr. Ernest S. Pisko, special writer of the Christian Science Monitor, said the following:

"To remind him of unfinished business of the previous war, Xerxes, King of Persia, had a 'remembrance slave.' The Roman Senate, for the same purpose, had Marcus Porcius Cato. And we have the Society for the Prevention of World War III. * * * Still we must not forget the neo-Nazis. That is why it is useful to give the publications of the Society for the Prevention of World War III a more than perfunctory reading—and file them for reference just in case."

This is a fitting tribute to the Society's work, with which I have been long familiar. I have attended the meetings of this organization from time to time, have spoken to the various officers and experts of the Society, have listened to their brilliant analyses of the German problem. Yes; the Society is a unique organization and so long as our security is threatened, may it endure.

The right to dissent is an old-fashioned American privilege and I know that the Society subscribes to and upholds this basic principle of Americanism. It is, therefore, understandable that the Society should expect that it be accorded the same treatment and respect as it gives to the opinions of others. Those who disagree with the Society's objectives, however, should stick to the issues involved. I say let the people exercise their free choice in a marketplace of ideas. They have always been able to discern truth from falsehood and when an idea runs counter to the needs and interests of our people, it is bound to wither and die. This is the way democracy works. It should be clear, however, that the American people will never support a campaign of calumny and smear which is intended to deliberately confuse the issues and thereby muddy the waters of public information. The people want facts and not fairy tales.

Before ending my remarks I wish especially to add a few words of praise concerning the activities of Mr. Isidore Lipschutz, the man who has served as treasurer of the Society since its inception, and who has, incidentally, been foully traduced in certain publications on account of his patriotic leadership in this fight. Mr. Lipschutz was the first industrialist of importance to see the menace which the rising power of Hitler's brown shirts raised for the world. As early as 1932 and 1933 he personally organized the publication of underground German newspapers, which were printed in Belgium and secretly distributed in Germany, and which provided the pattern for subsequent activities officially engaged upon by the United States and our allies, as the inevitability of war with Germany became clearer.

Because of his anti-Nazi activities in Europe Mr. Lipschutz was singled out for attack in the Stuermer by the war criminal Julius Streicher, who was hanged at Nuremberg.

When Mr. Lipschutz removed his business to America he continued his work for democracy and world peace, and I may say from my personal knowledge that ever since his immigration here he has devoted more attention to the public interest than to his own business.

That his services to his native country and to world peace were generally appreciated is evidenced by the many distinctions bestowed upon him:

In 1931: By special decree of the King of Belgium, the title of "Chevalier de l'Ordre de Leopold" (Knight of the Order of Leopold) was awarded to him.

In 1936: By special decree of the King of Belgium, the title of "Officer de l'Ordre de Leopold II" (Officer of the Order of Leopold II) was awarded to him.

In 1937: The Belgian Red Cross awarded him the Medaille de Merite (Medal of Merit).

In 1938: The French Government awarded him the title of "Chevalier de la Legion d'Honneur" (Knight of the Legion of Honor).

In discussing the activities of the Society for the Prevention of World War III, vis-à-vis, the alarming situation confronting us in the world, I have taken some trouble to set forth the origins of this Society and the fine backgrounds of the men who are its leaders.

This seems to me to be pertinent, and especially deserved in view of the bitter attacks which some of these men have had to face, as a result of patriotically standing up for the right.

In times of international tension, like today, it is of the greatest importance that public opinion be well and accurately informed on the grave issues confronting our country. In a democracy, public opinion must and should determine our course; but only ar informed public opinion, supplied with the true facts, can serve as a safe guide. It is our problem, in these times, to distinguish informed and patriotic opinion from propaganda and selfish pressure. Once the true facts are appreciated, our people will be united and resolute in their action.

Three Important Questions Raised by General Bradley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 18, 1591

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask three questions.

In his testimony at the MacArthur hearings Tuesday, Gen. Omar Bradley said he believed that the MacArthur strategy would involve the United States "in the wrong war, at the wrong place, at the wrong time, and with the wrong enemy"?

Mr. Speaker, I believe the American people are entitled to an answer to my three questions:

First, in those fateful days last June when President Truman decided to put the United States into the Korean war, did General Bradley or anyone else suggest to the President that he might thereby be involving the United States "in the wrong war, at the wrong place, at the wrong time, and with the wrong enemy"?

Second, if and when the next Korean war breaks out—whether in Iran or elsewhere—will the President again arrogate to himself, in disregard of the Constitution and the Congress, the decision as to whether the United States is to enlist in that war also?

Third, in other words, Mr. Speaker, is President Truman to have a free hand to engage in a one-man trial-and-error effort to find "the right war, at the right place, at the right time, and with the right enemy"?

In Praise of Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 16, 1951

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, too often one hears nothing but derogatory remarks for the fair city of Washington which is the seat of our Nation's Government; which by the time they reach the furthermost limits of this great Nation, contain only a very small particle of truth. Such stories tend to paint a dismal picture of this great city and result in a feeling amongst our citizens that it is a place to stay away from, despite the fact that it is a historic spot and one that should be closest to the hearts of our people.

However, Mr. Speaker, every so often a refreshing article appears praising our Nation's Capital and for that reason, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a letter which appeared in the May 16 issue of the Washington Post entitled "In Praise of Washington" written by a man who emigrated to this city to do his share in this Nation's defense effort:

IN PRAISE OF WASHINGTON

I am on leave from the Pennsylvania State College to fill an assignment in the Defense Department. My wife and I and our four small children have been living here in the District community now for about a year. My amusement almost balanced my pique when recently I read Dr. Clifford R. Adams' pronouncement that married couples who live in Washington and hope for a happy home life and a successful marrige should "go and live somewhere else." Since Dr. Adams is my friend as well as my colleague at Penn State, may I gently rebut this frivolous advice.

Cliff, I think that your crystal ball must need a shine, or that your fact gatherers must have been briefing you too briefly, or (heaven forbid) possibly you have been reading a popular dreggy but misleading book about Washington.

To state it truly, Washington adds up to a stimulating, challenging, and satisfying city in which to live. Our Nation's Capital is a beautiful city filled with monumental buildings, great museums, and exquisite art galleries. We have superior music and Broadway theater, even though the latter may be a little late in arriving. If Washington is not the cleanest large city in America, it must compare favorably with whatever urban center has that distinction.

Washington is a city with stately churches of every faith and many congregations find it necessary to hold two services on their Sabbath Day in order to serve all of their communicants.

From village, farm, and metropolis, the Nation sends its most highly trained and competitively selected superior citizens to Washington to serve in its Government. The population of this community has a larger percentage of members of Phi Beta Kappa and Sigma Xi than any other American community, including university centers. The IQ curve of the city's public-school children shows more individuals with superior ratings than are found in our population generally or other specific cities.

My work here has acquainted me with many persons in that large segment of the district's population which is comprised of career personnel in the three military services. It is my observation that these families of military folks are unusually stable and and successful, frequently following a proud family tradition of several generations' standing; and their children (contrary to the stereotyped military-brat idea) are well disciplined, gracious-mannered, and happily adjusted boys and girls. It is logical to assume that many equally successful families exist in other large elements of the population such as the Diplomatic Corps, Civil Service careerists, etc.

Even a word of praise is in order for Washington weather. Taking the year as a whole, the climate is pleasant. Admitting a few weeks of hot weather, throughout the year there is more sunshine than cloudiness, and the winters are open and free from the discomfort and inconvenience of excessive cold and snow.

Here then is a clean and beautiful city with a salubrious climate, where the standard of living and the community's earnings are high, where the population is representative of the selected best garnered from the whole country. We submit that a couple unable to make a success of marriage in an environment so favorable physically, socially, culturally, and economically should indeed go and live somewhere else—alone.

DR. PAUL R. BEALL,
Director, Information Division Research and Development Board, Department of Defense.
WASHINGTON.

They Heard You

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, May 15, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, though the dismissal of General MacArthur from command in the Far East was the spark which touched off the people's resentment against the policies of this administration, Members of Congress indicate they are not only aware of, but intended to give some heed to, the protests for economy which have been overwhelming them.

For a long, long time Members of Congress have been hearing suggestions from the voters that, if they did not mend their ways and do some of the obvious things which were necessary to bring a little efficiency and economy into the Federal Government's activities which the people were convinced would sooner or later ruin us, they might hear a different protest in November 1952.

The thought has finally penetrated some congressional heads that the people were fully aware of what has been going on. Some Members of Congress mistook charitable complacency for a lack of information and determination.

The MacArthur incident—or, more accurately, the protests growing out of it—convinced these gentlemen that the people were not quite as complacent as some thought; hence, the awakening of the Congress.

May 2 the Congress was called upon to vote on an appropriation bill for the Interior Department. The Department's request for funds had been cut some $39,000,000 by the House Appropriations Committee which sent the bill to the floor. After several days of debate, the House, by amendment, cut the bill another $23,000,000.

Mr. Truman's leadership in the House, amazed at that action, called for a record vote on nine amendments. The vote was taken and on nine separate and distinct roll calls the administration was defeated, the cuts were approved.

The moral: Before the MacArthur incident, the economy-efficiency-minded members would not have had a chance of making even these cuts, which, by the way, are inadequate.

The protests growing out of the MacArthur incident, if continued, will eventually result in other savings, the prevention of additional waste and extravagance and, it is my hope, in the removal of Secretary of State Dean Acheson. He, as I have repeatedly advised you, has acted in the interest of the British Government. His policies, whatever his intention—I repeat it again—have aided the Communist cause.

My record indicates that I do not need prodding on any of the points above suggested; in fact, I have been criticized as being too economy-minded, too inclined to disagree with the Administration, particularly with the State Department's activities.

To be effective, the people's protests should be directed to those Senators and Representatives who, in the past, have supported the socialistic program of the administration, adopted and followed the suggestions of an international-minded State Department.

Here is your opportunity, talk with your friends and neighbors, point out to them where this administration's policies—especially in foreign affairs—are taking us; then, all of you write to those Senators and Congressmen who go along with the New Deal, and insist that they, your servants, do the things you want done.

It is unfortunate that such a protest should be necessary but, because the people have so long complacently gone along with, and, at election time, approved the programs advocated by the preceding and this administration, such a protest seems to be necessary.

Containment of Russian Communist Influence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Christian Science Monitor, Tuesday, May 15, 1951:

TWO WAYS OF OPPOSING COMMUNISM

Just what does it mean to say that American policy aims at "containment" of Russian Communist influence in the world today? A recent survey by the Council on Foreign Relations indicated that this policy is supported by a large majority of the leading citizens who form its committees in 24 cities. Yet, common observation indicates that the objectives of the policy could and should be more widely understood.

First of all, is the United States engaged in a mission to suppress communism? Over 99 percent of Americans evidently disagree with communism; its theories can be disproved and its practice has shown cavernous weaknesses. Yet, Americans could view communism with relative equanimity if its spread depended on adoption by free consent of self-governing peoples. Its propaganda could be met on the ideological level with assurance, as indeed it must be.

But the nature and doctrine of international communism is to seize power by violence and to exert minority rule through dictatorship. In practice it has spread by extending the power of the Soviet Union, either through direct expansion or through satellites—in either case by various forms of aggression against free governments and the liberties of free men.

It is that aggression, that subjugation of free peoples by violence, which constitutes communism's crime in the world today, just as it constituted the crime of Nazi-Fascist totalitarianism.

And it is that aggression, that expansionism by force over unwilling victims, against which the policy of "containment" is legitimately directed. This does not mean a crusade or holy war to extirpate communism from the earth; eradication of mistaken doctrines must come by other means. But it does signify, in the phrase of the Council on Foreign Relations, that America should "try to frustrate the expansion of Soviet power whenever it shows signs of encroaching upon the territorial integrity" of free nations.

That is something like the distinction drawn by the American Government and by most thoughtful citizens in dealing with communism as a domestic problem. Majority judgment has held against attempting to punish the mere holding of communistic opinions as a crime; but it has supported heartily the endeavor to punish the commission of illegal acts, as in the trial of 11 Communist leaders for conspiracy against the Government.

Most serious students of Stalinist Marxism are convinced that if it is deprived of unfair, coercive, and violent means for its extension it cannot survive. Most of the Foreign Relations Council members believe that the Soviet regime is such that it must expand or lose power internally. If that is true, then resistance to its expansion amounts to resistance to communism itself.

But the distinction earlier stated is still important. It is aggression that is the enemy. It is the attack on other people's lives and liberties that constitutes a ground for war. In the absence of such a casus belli, a military crusade, or "preventive war" against certain people simply because they are Communists or ruled by Communists would become itself an aggression and would forfeit moral stature.

Let's keep the sights on the target. It is aggression that constitutes the international crime. Only a system that can succeed by appealing to intellects and loyalties of free men deserves to succeed. Only such a system can expand, or long endure, if aggression is resisted.

The MacArthur Controversy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the following letter which I have received typifies the approach of every citizen who has the interest of our country at heart. I hope that many of our colleagues here will adopt that attitude. If they do we can look forward with hope for, and faith in, the future of this country:

E-Z MILLS, INC.,
New York, N. Y., May 10, 1951.

Hon. ABRAHAM J. MULTER,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MULTER: No reply is expected to this letter, because if my judgment is correct it will be merely one of thousands of similar letters you will receive on the same subject. All I ask is acknowledgment so that I may be sure it has been received by you.

During the past months I have not been a supporter of General MacArthur in his controversy with the President. My reason has been that as a manufacturer I have learned through years of experience that anyone directing a large organization cannot do so effectively if he does not have the wholehearted support of his associates regarding his policies.

I am not prepared to go all out for General MacArthur today, regardless of the profound impression his speech to Congress made upon me, for the simple reason that I, like most American citizens, am not in possession of the pertinent facts upon which to make a sound decision.

There is one point upon which I have very definite ideas. General MacArthur has raised questions of differences on basic policy which I feel if not decided correctly will have a very adverse effect on the lives and happiness of my children and their children.

This letter is to urge you to go to the root of this controversy which has developed between the President and General MacArthur and to use your influence to have it decided to the best interest of our country and its people. The subject is far beyond partisan politics, as I know you will agree.

Very sincerely,
SHERMAN P. HAIGHT,
Chairman of Board, E-Z Mills, Inc.

George Catlett Marshall Day at Virginia Military Institute

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an address of great wisdom and merit, delivered in Lexington, Va., on May 15, 1951, by Hon. Bernard M. Baruch on the occasion of George Catlett Marshall Day at Virginia Military Institute.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is hallowed ground. Northern and Southern troops fought for the possession of this lovely Shenandoah Valley, and none more gallantly than the students and officers of the Virginia Military Institute.

My father, a Confederate doctor, campaigned in this valley. He had a favorite tale he liked to tell on himself. During one battle, the Confederate troops were thrown into a panic. The Southern commander cried to my father, "Help rally the men!" My father, with a standard in hand, rode among the men shouting, "Rally! Rally, men, for God's sake!" Just then a shell burst close. His horse dashed madly off while father sought to bring the animal under control. Whereupon one of the soldiers nearby shouted, "Rally? Why in hell won't you rally?"

We have come here to dedicate this new arch to VMI's barracks. To our left we can see the arch which commemorates Stonewall Jackson, who taught here, and who was one of the greatest military tacticians of all times. Beyond these buildings is another arch erected to the memory of America's first soldier, George Washington. He not only won us our first victories, but it was he who first cast the mold which shaped the tradition of American soldiering. In an age of military adventurers—Napoleon was only a few years off—George Washington established the role of the American soldier as a servant of peace and a guardian of liberty.

That your third arch should be dedicated to George Catlett Marshall is singularly fitting. He is a living example of the tradition of the civilian soldier which Washington began. VMI's most illustrious graduate, George Marshall is symbolic of the new union of Americans which was demonstrated in the last two world wars and which has banished forever the disunity that made possible the war between North and South.

But this arch, which we are dedicating today, does more than look back upon the past. It also looks out toward the future. In honoring George Marshall we also do honor to a concept which saved the free world once and which can save it again.

That concept was the strategy of global defense. As history's first global strategist, George Marshall was called upon to organize the most stupendous military effort man has ever known. Its climax came in the two greatest amphibious landings upon hostile foreign shores—Normandy in the Atlantic and the Philippines in the Pacific. Each landing half the globe apart, yet conducted almost simultaneously. Think what a host of problems had to be overcome to make those victorious landings possible—assembling the men and weapons, the food and medcal care, the convoys and landing craft, with everything transported across thousands of miles of ocean to meet a D-day schedule.

Today, as Secretary of Defense, George Marshall, perhaps under even more difficult conditions, is called upon to devise the global strategy which will bring us victory in the peacemaking, and avoid the need for any amphibious landings on hostile shores.

When I was asked last March to join in dedicating this arch to General Marshall, I immediately thought of a remark which Gen. John J. Pershing made in 1939. We were to have dinner together. When General Pershing came in he said, "I have just done a fine thing for our country. President Roosevelt asked me who would be a good man for Chief of Staff. I recommended George Marshall."

The years that followed more than amply confirmed General Pershing's confidence. It was General Marshall who organized the means which made possible victories on all fronts.

I wonder how much of the controversy in recent days is really a reflection of the difference between the leader of troops and the organizer. A great leader of troops naturally is zealous in desiring that when his men become locked in battle that every resource be marshaled which might increase the chance of their winning or of decreasing their losses. The very qualities which made him so valiant a leader of troops would make him impatient of any limitations on his action.

But the organizer has to think not only of the men fighting on the one front, but of all the fronts of war and defense. He must weigh each theater and its relative importance upon the scales of a globe-flung strategy. Where to concentrate our forces and where to hold? Will action in one part of the world invite a counterblow somewhere else? What of our allies? Are they prepared or do they need time to ready their defenses? how much can they be hurried?

And what of the American people? How quickly can their strength be mobilized? By how much can they be hurried?

Like those of the troop commander, the decisions of the organizer are also weighted in lives; like the troop commander, the organizer also labors under inhibitions.

Whatever the demands from the commanders abroad, the organizer can allocate only the weapons he has been permitted to procure. He can draft and train only the men permitted under the law. When the commander in the field asks how far he is permitted to go, the organizer must decide first whether the troops and equipment will be available to see the offensive through, without jeopardizing other areas. And if the organizer, looking into the future, a year, or two or three ahead, asks for what he thinks will be needed—and he is turned down, what does he do?

Many issues have become involved in the raging controversy over far-eastern policy. I would not want to seem to be answering or dismissing them. Still, I would like to put forward this one thought of my own—much of our trouble is the result of military weakness.

In our present situation, whatever is attempted on behalf of peace must fall short because of a lack of supporting military strength.

We are trying to enforce a global doctrine of opposition to communism with a Military Establishment which is sorely strained by the demands of only one theater.

Many of the issues—and choices—raised by the controversy would solve themselves if more of America's strength were mobilized. Until we have mobilized, few, if any, of the issues which have been raised can really be solved.

There is strength in unity. But there is also unity in strength.

We—our allies as well as this country—must first grow stronger militarily before we can have a unified foreign policy.

In Korea today we are buying time—no; it is not we who are buying time; it is our young men who are buying the time—for the whole free world to rearm. Are we doing as much as we possibly can with this time? As quickly as we can? That is the question we should be asking ourselves—what are we doing with the time being bought for us at so great a price?

I would be less than frank if I did not say I do not believe that we, as a nation, or our allies, are doing enough. I might add that even if the fighting in Korea is brought to an end, as we all hope, the need to rearm would remain.

But I am straying from the purpose of this occasion. I have known George Marshall since he served as an aide to General Pershing. I have watched him rise and grow as he rose. Always he has seemed to me the very prototype of the soldier-statesman.

In outward demeanor he may appear austere. Yet he is warmly aware of the human side. During the last war he would insist that the members of the General Staff get away from Washington frequently. "I don't want tired men making decisions that affect human lives," he once told me.

Although he had to make many of the decisions of grand strategy, he was always deeply concerned for the welfare of the men and women on the fighting fronts and their families at home. He saw that our troops had the best this country could furnish—in rations and clothing, in medical care and nursing, in equipment and leadership. Before we entered the war some armchair strategists were saying the day of the mass army was gone. The day of the mass army in the old sense of trying to win by sheer force of manpower was, indeed, gone, but not the skillful command of forces of considerable size to maneuver, to strike, and to pursue. This required leadership on an unprecedented scale. General Marshall foresaw the tactics and the strategy that would be needed in case of a world war. I remember his explaining the necessity for training our commanders in handling large numbers of troops. He expanded the scale of army maneuvers in this country to where they covered areas as large as some European countries.

How often have I marveled at the apparent ease with which he has borne his responsibilities. Nor has it been easy for him to unburden himself. At times, I believe, General Marshall has talked quite freely to me of things on his mind. But I can also remember a week end at my place in South Carolina during which he hardly spoke beyond the routine courtesies. General Marshall has been singularly fortunate in his choice—or maybe she chose him—of so charming, gracious, and understanding a wife. Yet there have been times when he couldn't take even her into his confidence.

Both of them now like to tell the story of an incident a few days before our landings in North Africa. It was our first amphibious expedition. Had it been repulsed, the effect might have been disastrous. There was grave fear the Germans might learn of our plans. There was the even more serious question of what the French in North Africa would do. Would they welcome our soldiers, or would they fight them?

The responsibility for ironing out all these problems had been entrusted by the Combined Chiefs of Staff to General Marshall. Finally, all the details were worked out. Our hope for winning over the French was General Giraud, who was to issue the orders to the French in North Africa to lay down their arms.

Noticing how hard General Marshall had been working, Mrs. Marshall arranged a duck-shooting party for him. The night before the duck hunt the General's bedside phone rang. It was the War Department calling with a message from Robert Murphy that Giraud was insisting that the invasion be postponed for 3 weeks or he would be unable to guarantee French support. The convoys were already at sea, 800 ships off the entrance to the Mediterranean sailing under radio silence. Could this vast naval force be turned back? If not, what would happen when they landed in North Africa?

After listening to the message General Marshall said he would be in the office in the morning and hung up. Mrs. Marshall, hearing him, asked, "Does that mean you won't be able to go duck hunting tomorrow?"

"I'm afraid it does," General Marshall replied, "but it's pretty important."

Mrs. Marshall said, "Oh, you think every little thing is important."

General Marshall has worn a soldier's uniform for so long that it is difficult to penetrate to his true qualities. He is a warm friend, a fine fishing and hunting companion. In all matters of national security, though, he strives to be impersonally right, knowing how many lives rest upon the integrity of his military judgments. That integrity won him the complete confidence of President Roosevelt, even when they disagreed; it won him the equally complete confidence of the British, with whom he also had his differences; and it gained him the respect, if not the confidence, of the Russians, who don't even trust their own people.

No one has been more respectful of our civilian institutions and traditions. The one problem which has never been out of General Marshall's mind, these last years, has been how to build a military establishment which would be adequate for our national security and yet be one which the American people will maintain indefinitely, without bankruptcy.

Even before the last war ended, he was worried over the kind of military establishment we would maintain in the after-war period. We talked often of this problem. Always he would hark back to the same conviction—if the American Nation were to survive, we had to break with the old feast-and-famine tradition of military spending, or alternating between frantic all-out mobilization for war and equally frantic all-out demobilization for peace. We had to develop a military policy which we would sustain year in and year out and which could serve as the enduring foundation for an equally enduring foreign policy. That is why General Marshall has been so insistent upon universal military training.

In this, he and I have been of one mind.

General Marshall impresses one as being so much the good soldier, and yet I know how deeply he has yearned for the quiet of civilian life. At the first chance after the last war ended, he retired to his home at Leesburg. There he struggled with the problems of gardening, with the logistics of weeds and fertilizer. He was called from his gardening three times. Once to go to China on a mission for the President; a second time to serve as Secretary of State; and a third time to head the American Red Cross, dropping that to take on his present responsibilities.

One tree which General Marshall planted in these latter posts is already bearing fruit—the Marshall plan. Other undertakings are still seedlings, of uncertain fruition. For a full measure of his accomplishments we will have to wait for the battle of peace to be decided. The measure of his greatness as a man we already have.

Let me conclude by relating one more incident. One day I noticed a portrait of Robert E. Lee hanging on the wall in General Marshall's Leesburg home. I have always revered General Lee, who lies not far from here. He was to the southern people and their soldier sons what no commander has ever been to any people.

I asked General Marshall, "Tell me what you think of General Lee."

General Marshall replied, "You know he had many offers of enormous sums of money to take commercial positions. He refused them all because he thought he owed a duty to the young men of the South and so he took a position for $125 per month as president of what is now Washington and Lee University."

Sometimes a person will reveal more of himself when talking about others. That response of General Marshall's—the trait of Lee's character which immediately came to his mind—etches an indelible portrait of the man we honor here today.

"Do your duty in all things," General Lee urged. "You cannot do more. You would not wish to do less."

I congratulate you, General Marshall. I congratulate the students and faculty of the Virginia Military Institute, who can justly take pride in the school which could produce a George Catlett Marshall.

I know that the whole free world joins with us in wishing you, General Marshall, continued success in your present task as freedom's global strategist, and that with the peace won, you can return to your gardening.

The St. Lawrence Project

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which was printed in the Utica (N. Y.) Press, on March 17, 1951, with reference to the St. Lawrence project.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT

Utica Chamber of Commerce is taking another look at the St. Lawrence seaway-power project and we hope it will finally recognize the potential benefits to northern New York and to Utica. The matter is now before Congress in what may be the decisive struggle over that long-planned development. Unless now accepted as necessary to the national defense, the project as at present conceived may never be undertaken.

Congress remained unmoved when the St. Lawrence development was pressed upon it by President Roosevelt during World War II as a means of providing additional supplies of electric power for defense plants in the Northeastern States. But now the project has been given a new angle by the depletion in the last war and since of the high-grade iron ore reserves of the Mesabi Range near Lake Superior. President Truman is asking quick approval of the project on the ground that the proposed 27-foot channel from Lake Superior to the sea is needed to give midwestern steel mills safe and economical access to newly discovered open-pit ore resources in Labrador.

The administration has sent an impressive list of witnesses to testify before the House Public Works Committee that the project is essential to the national security, that it can be made to pay for itself through sale of electricity and collection of tolls from ships using the waterway, and that it will make a mighty contribution to economic development in the North Atlantic area and the Great Lakes basin.

Opponents of the project include railroads, public utility companies, coal operators, shipping interests and port cities along the eastern seaboard which would lose traffic to the waterway. They have not yet made their case in formal testimony but their arguments are fairly familiar. For two decades these arguments have been sufficient to prevent acceptance of the seaway-power project by Congress.

Supporters of the St. Lawrence project admit that resources of the Mesabi-Lake Superior region, on which the steel industry has depended for 85 percent of its ore supply, are far from exhaustion. But all authorities agree that sooner or later there will be a sharp falling off in production. And because of increasing demands for steel, it is estimated by Secretary of the Interior Chapman that by 1960 "we must be prepared to import 40,000,000 tons of ore a year." The National Security Resources Board says that by the end of the present decade "50,000,000 tons must be furnished from entirely new sources of supply."

Steel is important but the power means more to Utica.

Small Business Is Hit by Defense Rationing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. THYE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, during the first 2 years of World War II, some 16 percent of the total number of business enterprises were forced to close their doors. The same problems are today facing the small, independent businessmen of the Nation who are faced with the twin spectres of material shortages and a lack of defense contracts. In the New York Times for Sunday, May 13, was a fine presentation of this situation written by Joseph A. Loftus. I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in full in the Appendix of today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SMALL BUSINESS IS HIT BY DEFENSE RATIONING—UNABLE TO GET MATERIALS, MANY FIRMS APPEAL TO GOVERNMENT FOR RELIEF

(By Joseph A. Loftus)

WASHINGTON, May 12.—Small business is one of the casualties of defense, just as it was in the early days of World War II. Why this should be so, in the face of booming production and the need for still more production, is one of the paradoxes of our economy.

On its face, it doesn't make sense. On closer examination, one finds that some casualties are unavoidable. The problem is one of degree—how to cut the losses.

In the first 2 years of World War II, 16 percent of the small business men of the country were forced to shut shop. Select committees of the Senate and the House are campaigning against a repetition of that debacle, but actual results are in doubt. There is already a suspicion at the Capitol that when the corpses are finally counted this time, the fatality rate may be even higher than it was in 1942 and 1943.

What is small business, and why all the to-do about its survival?

A simple definition of a small business is this: An establishment with fewer than 500 employees. Statistics are kept on that basis. The congressional committees are not rigid about the 500-man ceiling when they seek help for their constituents. In the Congressional view, any business that is not dominant in its field is a small business. That tent would cover some companies with far more than 500 employees—the secondary steel companies, for example.

BROAD BASE OF INDUSTRY

Small business commands so much attention from Congress that one may safely decide it is a politically significant area of our economy. It is numerically important. About 3,670,000 small businesses form the broad base of our industrial-commercial pyramid. It is articulate. The appeals to Congress for information and help have been enormous. Letters reaching the small-business committees ran to 9,000 one day. The average intake is 450 to 500 a day now.

There is an emotional attachment to small business that has made it, to many, the economic symbol of the American way of life. The independent entrepreneur commands a kind of admiration different from that accorded the big fellow who provides mass employment and boasts an efficient assembly line.

In economic actuality, small business is the bulwark against monopoly, the guaranty of a competitive economy. In a wartime economy, as contrasted with today's readiness economy, we need all the productive facilities obtainable. Hence the concern about the liquidation of those facilities now.

What's the trouble? The trouble is a shortage of materials. Take aluminum. There are 18,000 aluminum fabricators. Most of them have sprung up since the close of World War II. They have been making a couple hundred kinds of items for the civilian trade.

Now the military has placed large orders for aircraft. That calls for a lot of aluminum. There is not enough for the airplanes and all the civilian production, too. Small aluminum fabricators cannot make air-frames. They have had to cut back 35 percent on more than 200 products. They were to be cut back 100 percent on April 1, but the death sentence has been stayed till July 1. By that time new basic capacity may have brought in enough additional aluminum to win for these establishments a stay of execution. If so, the congressional committees will claim credit for saving hundreds of these concerns from extinction by getting delays in the death sentence.

SHORTAGES IN OTHER FIELDS

The story is somewhat the same in steel, plastics, and copper, and other areas. As military procurement was stepped up, material shortages developed in the civilian lines, making the small manufacturer's plight desperate. He turned to Government contracts as his only salvation.

It is clear that the small-business man, by definition, cannot qualify as a primary contractor for a ship, a tank, or a plane. He can qualify as a subcontractor on parts for these products; he can qualify as a primary contractor on many small items.

He did not do so badly, either, as long as the military advertised for competitive bids. But bidding has given way largely to negotiated contracts. That is the little fellow's big gripe—that and the lack of information about requirements and awards.

The small-business man complains that some big companies are expanding their manufacturing facilities to avoid subcontracting. The Senate committee reported a typical instance in which a small manufacturer of cellar doors made of sheet steel could not obtain sheets from his mill. The mill, however, shipped the sheet to its own fabricating plant and sold the manufacturer partially stamped cellar doors.

EQUIPMENT IS WASTED

Not only does that practice increase the cost of the product to the consumer—in this case, homeowners—but the small manufacturer's stamping equipment is idle and represents to him and to the country an economic waste.

The procurement agencies of Government are supposed to discourage expansion of facilities by a primary contractor if subcontractor facilities are available. They assert they have had some success in doing so.

To get a subcontract for a part of a tank, or a gun, or whatnot, the small enterprise has to know who got the primary contract. Complaints were lodged that the security-conscious military were withholding information about the size of primary contracts.

The Munitions Board's own figures show that the dollar amount of contracts awarded to small business dropped from 24.5 percent of the total awards in the fiscal year 1949–50 to 21 percent in the first 9 months of fiscal 1950–51. That means a few big companies, relatively, received 75 to 79 percent of the dollar volume. (From 1940 through 1944, for example, the hundred largest corporations got 60.6 percent of all prime contracts awarded.)

The Munitions Board does not know how much business went to small enterprises in the form of subcontracts and sub-subcontracts, and says it has no way of finding out without installing a costly statistic-collecting system.

The Board says primary awards to small business have been rising steadily month by month in the first quarter of this calendar year. In March the proportion was 25.9 percent. Congressional champions of small business propose to establish a small-defense-plants corporation, like the agency that operated in World War II. Both the Munitions Board and the National Production Authority have advised against it.

In sum, a lot of mechanism is in motion, but the returns are not all in yet.

Republican Band Wagon Will Become a Hearse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT S. KERR
OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a press release issued by me, relative to certain proposals by General MacArthur and Republican reaction thereto.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Republicans jumped into the MacArthur controversy, thinking it was a band wagon to roll them into the White House in 1952. Now, they jump out because it looks like that old familiar hearse ready to haul them back to the political graveyard.

Yes, even the Republican Party has caught on to the fact that the American people do not want to follow General MacArthur into an all-out war on the mainland of China. These Republican politicians who used MacArthur for all he was worth are now ready to pass him up.

This sudden change of face showed up plainly at the meeting of the Republican National Committee in Tulsa this week end, according to all reports I read and received. As one Washington newspaper headline summed it up: "GOP committee shuns MacArthur's program." And, further, "There is no talk here whatever of a possible presidential candidacy for General MacArthur."

This retreat away from the militant MacArthur was confirmed by another Washington correspondent who wrote (Saturday morning): "There was not so much as a sentence that favored Republican support of the program of Gen. Douglas MacArthur. The attitude of the Republican politicians here is that the party ought to benefit all it can from General MacArthur's quarrel with President Truman, but ought not to let itself get into position of being MacArthur's champion. * * * They think this (MacArthur program) is dangerous, politically."

Remember? This is the same Republican Party which has been on such a hysterical, emotional jag during the past month. They wailed loud and long about General MacArthur. Now, they just wail.

Frankly, I have never seen such a demonstration of political avarice and cowardice. I have believed all along that they were playing politics with the security of this Nation. I have believed all along that they had no real convictions about the issues involved in the controversy. This turn in Tulsa certainly proves both. Just listen to what they are saying.

Clarence Buddington Kelland, of Arizona: "I do not believe that the Republican Party should tie itself to the issue of military action as developed between General MacArthur and Mr. Truman."

Sinclair Weeks, of Massachusetts: "I do not think that the Republican Party should tie itself to MacArthur in this controversy or make a party issue of it."

General MacArthur, however, had boldly declared that his policy differences with the administration would be the issue in the regular referendum occurring next year, as it does—in his words—"each 4 years." I guess MacArthur thought if he got out of their way for President, they could at least stick by his program.

In the presidential push, Senator TAFT was said to be losing ground with the grassroots politicos because of his excessive enthusiasm for the militant MacArthur program. His supporters and admirers at Tulsa expressed surprise and concern over his course.

Yes, those Republicans have frozen up on General MacArthur. I am told that seven Republican governors made speeches, and not one so much as mentioned his name.

Apparently, the GOP
Just doesn't want to be
The "General's Own Part-ee."

The Small-Town Editor and Conditions in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALLACE F. BENNETT
OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I send to the desk two editorials from the Ephraim Enterprise, a weekly newspaper published each Friday in Ephraim, Utah, a small town of 1,991 people. The views expressed by Roscoe C. Cox, editor and publisher of this paper, are significant because they show that the small-town country editor is right on top of the important events transpiring in our Nation. This editor, like the editors of the many weekly newspapers of my State, exemplifies the editorial prerogative in its finest tradition—in a manner typified by the late William Allen White. The process by which national issues infiltrate to the grass roots of our communities and are discussed intelligently and with understanding by our small-town editors is one of the most healthy conditions existing in our country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the two editorials from the Ephraim Enterprise inserted in the Appendix to the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHERE TO, AMERICA?

America, where are you headed?

Many signposts along the way indicate that you are on the wrong track and going ever farther in the wrong direction.

To be frank, America, it seems you have denied the faith and forsaken the God of the founding fathers; that you have dethroned the Goddess of Right and the endeavoring to enthrone the champion might as your present deity.

The founding fathers, the leaders for many generations, Abraham Lincoln, the savior of the Union, all acknowledged God as the King of America.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator, with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," states the Declaration of Independence.

Patrick Henry, in urging that all delegates sign the Declaration, pointed to America as the refuge for the downtrodden of Europe, and said:

"But hark! The voice of Jehovah speaks out from the awful cloud. 'Let there be light again. Let there be a new world. Tell My people, the poor, downtrodden millions, to go out from the Old World—tell them to go out from wrong, oppression, and blood. Tell them to build up My altar in the New.'

"As God lives, my friends, I believe that to be His voice. Yes; were my soul trembling on the wing of eternity, were this hand freezing to death, were my voice choking with the last struggle, I would still, with the last gasp of that voice, implore you to remember the truth—God has given America to be free. * * * In the name of the One who made you, the Savior who redeemed you, in the name of the millions whose very breath is now hushed, as, in intense expectation, they look up to you for the awful words, 'You are free'."

Abraham Lincoln, on leaving Springfield, Ill., on February 11, 1861, to take up his duties as President, expressed his sorrow at leaving and:

"I now leave, not knowing when or whether ever I may return, with a task before me greater than that which rested upon Washington. Without the assistance of that Divine Being who ever attended him, I cannot succeed. With that assistance, I cannot fail.

"Trusting in Him, who can go with me, and remain with you, and be everywhere for good, let us confidently hope that all will yet be well."

An account of a parade by the American Army the morning of May 7, 1778, after the terrible winter at Valley Forge, tells that "in solemn silence the American Army at Valley Forge united in thanksgiving to Almighty God that He had given them one friend on earth. One theme was universal and it flutters yet in the breasts of millions: 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow.'"

Daniel Webster, in a speech before the New York Historical Society, February 22, 1852, said:

"And let me say, gentlemen, that if we and our posterity shall be true to the Christian religion, if we and they shall live always in the fear of God, and shall respect His commandments, if we and they shall maintain just, moral sentiments, and such conscientious convictions of duty as shall control the heart of life—we may have the highest hopes of the future of our country."

And so it was in the speeches of leaders of all parties. All spoke of God and acknowledged His help in forming and prospering the United States of America. They accepted sincerely the adopted motto, "In God we trust." They believed literally in the prophecy in the last verse of the national anthem, "Then conquer we must, when our cause it is just; let this be our motto, 'In God is our trust,' and the Star-Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

But where are we today? The mention of God is not permitted in many of our publicly supported schools. Teaching of religion is tabu in all public schools, yet atheism and communism have been taught both openly and secretly, and the former still is being openly taught in many schools of the Nation.

In place of acknowledgment of divine favors and appeals for divine guidance, many leaders today mention God only by using His name in vain in hurling epithets at someone opposing them.

One of the latest acts of replacing right with supposed might is the ruling made which does not exempt from the draft young men called as missionaries for the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. Real leaders all over the Nation are pleading for a rebirth of morality and spirituality among the people of America and the world. It is doubtful if any system in the world is so potent in producing lasting spirituality and morality as is the Mormon missionary system. Yet now that system is being subordinated to the draft—another victory of so-called might over right.

Abundant evidence is readily available to show that these missionaries, after spending 2 to 2½ years in church service, have been outstanding in the military organizations of our country. Not only have they lived righteously in the midst of temptations, but they have helped countless numbers of their buddies to live high moral standards not common in the Armed Forces. As the knight of old said: "My strength is as the strength of 10, because my heart is pure," so have these returned missionaries been an outstanding asset to the armed services.

But now the powers that be have said that this missionary training must stop, except as permission might be given by the draft boards.

America, whither are you going? Can you hope to overcome evil with still more evil? Armed might with still more armed might? Remember it has been said "He that lives by the sword shall perish by the sword."

Let's not dry up our fountains of righteousness in our frenzy to rearm. No weapon is so potent against the evils of communism as are Christian standards. Let's be sure these are maintained, lest we in America, though blest with victory in armed conflict, may find that we have lost something even more precious—our ability and desire to champion right.

Surely the words of Abraham Lincoln, written in a proclamation of March 20, 1863, are even more applicable today than then:

"We have grown in numbers, wealth, and power, as no other nation has ever grown. But we have forgotten God. We have forgotten the gracious hand which preserved us in peace, and multiplied and enriched and strengthened us; and we have vainly imagined, in the deceitfulness of our hearts, that all these blessings were produced by some superior wisdom and virtue of our own. Intoxicated with unbroken success, we have become too self-sufficient to feel the necessity of redeeming and preserving grace, too proud to pray to the God that made us. It behooves us, then, to humble ourselves before the offended power, to confess our national sins, and to pray for clemency and forgiveness."

Pity the Poor Businessman

With the imposition of price controls, a mere protective dike against the surging tide of inflated currency and easy credit, we can expect to see the groceryman, the drygoods dealer, the furniture dealer, and other businessmen putting in a supply of aspirin as though to compete with the drug stores. But these merchants will not be stocking the aspirin for sale, but as a relief from the headaches they are now experiencing in trying to go along with the price-control program.

The first headache comes with the receipt of the voluminous and, often, confusing mass of directives, instructions, etc., which pour out uninterruptedly from the various Office of Price Stabilization offices. These require hours of study and cause more hours of worry for the groceryman and others, hours formerly spent in giving better service to customers at the lowest possible prices.

The next headache comes when the merchant tries to carry out the numerous directives which often, to him, seem contradictory, useless, or meaningless. He finds in marking his goods with both the ceiling price permitted by OPS and his own selling price, that the latter is almost always by far the lower of the two. Why, then, the ceiling price, when competition and the grocer's (or other businessman's) natural American desire to give his customers as much in goods and service as possible for the lowest possible price have kept and are keeping prices down? But here again go many hours of labor that ordinarily would be spent in service to customers, care of store, examination of stocks, etc.

Then comes a third headache in making out reports of this, reports of that, triplicate and duplicate reports seemingly without end. "When, oh, when, will I get time to take care of my business so as to serve the wants of my customers?" the exasperated businessman moans.

Then the final convulsion, the one which is liable to blow the top right off that businessman's noggin, will probably come when some politically appointed director, without experience in running a grocery or other store, comes in and starts telling the bewildered manager what to do, what not to do, what he has done wrong—and penalties which might be imposed—what he has failed to do at all, and so on and on and on until the groceryman (or other businessman) is liable to exclaim:

"Here, take my store, stock and all, run it the way it should be run, and I'll go out and get one of those common laborer jobs at a defense project or somewhere else and reap some of those inflated wages without this inflated headache the OPS is imposing on me."

Talk about waste of manpower. When a nation's energies, or even a considerable part thereof, are primarily used up in following directives from bureaucrats, instead of being used for production and service, that nation is on the road to decay. And when increasing numbers of men are taken from useful pursuits to police and enforce the directives, there is another great loss of productive power.

At best controls are but a dike against the flood of inflationary money, credit, featherbedding, etc., created or openly permitted by the same government which imposes the controls.

There are several ways of fighting inflation and every one calls for sacrifice on the part of some portion of or the entire citizenry.

The first and most important step is for the Federal Government to repeal the many inflationary laws and practices inaugurated during depression days to overcome deflation, such as easy credit, abundant currency without solid foundation, hundreds of thousands of Federal employees doing nonessential work or, as was the case of the former Georgia Governor, doing no work at all.

The next move is for States and counties and other taxing units to reduce nonessential expenditures for luxuries which are nice (for some) and to which many are now accustomed but which we cannot afford if we are to go all-out in defeating inflation at home and the Red menace abroad. Some of these luxuries may mean the trimming drastically of some unemployment compensation and of welfare assistance for persons who are perfectly able to work but who gladly accept—and in many cases demand—a living supplied by the sweat and toil of their neighbors.

Another step in defeating inflation must be longer working hours with no increase in pay for millions of laborers. There must be no more wage or salary increases, anywhere, without a corresponding increase in production or service.

Another way to fight inflation will be for people to buy more savings bonds and otherwise put part of their earnings into savings. But, until the Federal Government acts to show it is sincere in its desire to stop inflation, it's going to have a mighty hard job in selling savings bonds. People just don't want to put hard-earned money away in bonds which, when they mature, won't buy half as much as the money invested would have bought.

And finally, we must pay as we go for all defense and preparedness projects. This will mean higher taxes, of course, but if people feel their taxes are being used wisely and not squandered on unnecessary activities and Government featherbedding, if they feel sure such taxes will help defeat both the Reds and inflation, they are not going to kick a great deal at tax increases.

Yes, to fight inflation calls for the same patriotism, the same sacrifices, the same determination that is required to fight a foe in Korea or elsewhere. And, as men are wounded and even die on that battlefield over there, so is the fight on inflation going to hurt some individuals and some groups here at home. But this inflation fight must be won if freedom is to continue in America. Have we, as a people, enough individual and group patriotism and fortitude to win that battle? An affirmative answer to that question must come very, very soon or America will go over the brink of national disaster.

One thing sure, controls are not the answer.

Policy Based on Fear

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Policy Based on Fear," which appeared recently in the Idaho Statesman, Boise, Idaho.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLICY BASED ON FEAR

The administration rebuttal to MacArthur, on the part of the President and the Secretary of Defense, practically guarantees that the continued conduct of the Korean war will be along lines prevailing at present. Main contentions in the administration position could be summarized as follows:

1. China may be defeated, and peace restored, after enough Chinese soldiers have been killed in Korea to convince the Peiping Government of the futility of further conflict.

2. Carrying the war to the Chinese mainland would alienate America's allies, and perhaps bring Russia into the struggle.

3. War with Russia would almost certainly mean devastation of American cities by atomic bombs.

In addition to these points, the contention was made that General MacArthur had destroyed a peace possibility in his battlefield overture to the Red commander, and that his abrupt dismissal had kept him from making farewell statements which would have complicated General Ridgway's task.

The latter two items can be dismissed with the observation that they have not an iota of fact to justify their utterance. The remainder of the administration position can be summarized in one sentence: fear that an attempt to crush the Chinese Reds and end a war of indecision will convince Russia that the hour has struck in which to make its final, all-out bid for world conquest.

There is no denying the possibility of such an event, but its probability, as MacArthur emphasizes, is clearly another matter. Dictatorships, as Hitler proved, go to war when a careful assessment of relative strength convinces them that they have achieved a state of final readiness, with a better than 50–50 possibility of sudden victory—and with a careful attention to the element of planned surprise. No indication exists today that Russian strength has either been pushed to its total limit of war readiness or that its existing supply of military equipment would see it through a world war show-down—keeping in mind the massive superiority of American industrial production.

But always the counsel of the men around the President is to emphasize and overemphasize what Russia could do to this country in the event of a war, with little attention paid to what it would mean for any country to take on the United States in a final struggle for world ascendancy. General MacArthur labeled this attitude "defeatism," and it would seem to be an appropriate term.

A policy based on fear of Russia, rather than one based on actions calculated to make Russia fear this country, is the factor presently standing in the way of making Red China rue the day it asked for war. Pusillanimous actions and minimum assistance from U. N. allies have contributed to this sorry state of affairs, destroying any real hope of a truly unified offensive against a common foe, and laying the dreadful cost of protracted war squarely on the American people.

How long can the Korean war be allowed to continue, while a confused leadership hopes that the light of sweet reason will dawn upon Mao Tse-tung and the remainder of the Chinese puppet prisoners of Russia?

How long can the steadily increasing costs be borne—in lives and dollars?

The time is not too far off, it would seem, when these questions must either be answered, or the validity of continuing a halfway and hopeless conflict must be questioned.

The Korean war can easily drag on for years (as General Marshall himself admits) and in the meantime Russia will grow stronger (never using its own troops) while the United States is bled of its strength. The net result will be to weaken anti-Communist force throughout the world, in Europe and elsewhere, for American responsibilities are far-flung.

If no effort is to be made to knock China out of the war, in the interests of husbanding strength for the inevitable day of reckoning with Russia, then any further conduct of the Korean war appears to be without sound objective. Plainly the role which has been assigned to China is that of tying the United States down in a costly conflict, while feverish effort is being readied for Russia's final bid.

Better the United States should recognize that Korea has been a horrible trap, pull its army out entirely and fall back on Japan and Okinawa, than to keep it forever tied down in a stupid conflict in which it has no decent allied support and in which no final decision is to be sought.

New Sources of Steel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN
OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "New Sources of Steel" which appeared in the Washington Post, of March 10, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW SOURCES OF STEEL

Sponsors of the St. Lawrence seaway have marshaled some convincing arguments before the House Public Works Committee. Among the most impressive is the contention that the seaway, opening the Great Lakes to oceangoing vessels in the Atlantic, is needed to make the rich iron-ore beds of Quebec and Labrador more available to American mills. With the present strong indications that this country will be drawing heavily upon these deposits in future years, it would not make sense to leave the development of the seaway to Canada alone. It is the type of project that preeminently calls for international cooperation.

Of course, the United States is not facing any critical shortage of iron ore. The Bureau of Mines estimates that only 25 to 30 percent of the Lake Superior-Mesabi deposits of 1,750,000,000 tons have been drilled. Other deposits are available in this country, in Venezuela, Mexico, and various parts of Canada. But in this age of steel a nation the size of ours must be forehanded in tapping mineral resources that may be urgently needed in the foreseeable future. Our standard of living no less than our security is dependent upon steel. For these reasons alone there are substantial advantages in drawing upon the estimated 2,000,000,000 tons of ore in the Labrador-Quebec ranges before our domestic supplies are exhausted. The St. Lawrence seaway would also make available by easier shipping methods an estimated billion tons of iron deposits in Newfoundland.

George M. Humphrey, president of the Cleveland company which is now developing huge iron-ore deposits in Labrador, called the seaway a vital necessity when he appeared before the House committee on Monday. It is natural that he should think so. But many others who have nothing directly to gain from the new shipping lanes that the St. Lawrence seaway would afford have come to think in similar terms. And their demands upon Congress are supported by still others who see widespread advantages in the new supplies of power that the project would create.

Beef Roll-Back Is Unfair to the Cattle Feeders

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. THYE
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, since the announced roll-back on beef prices, there has been confusion and much misunderstanding. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter addressed by Max E. Markley, a cattle feeder, to the editor of the Minneapolis Tribune, and published in the May 13 issue of that newspaper under the heading, "Beef Roll-Back Is Unfair to the Cattle Feeders."

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BEEF ROLL-BACK IS UNFAIR TO THE CATTLE FEEDERS

To the EDITOR:

In the controversy over the beef roll-back order the administration takes the position that the returns to the producer are adequately covered by the parity figures. There is some merit in this argument with regard to the position of the primary producer of beef animal, but parity prices mean little or nothing in determining the profit or loss in the later or fattening stages of beef production.

Beef production has quite generally passed the stage where one man has the cow herd, raises calves, carries them on until ready for grain feeding, and then fattens them before selling. Now it is usual for one rancher to specialize in the production of weanling calves, selling them in the fall to another specialist who winters these calves on hay and then runs them on grass through the second summer. When these calves are from 15 to 18 months old they are shipped to the central market and so'd to the Corn Belt feeder. Some large feeding operations are conducted upon small acreages close to the terminal markets with all feeds purchased.

It is in these latter stages of beef production that the parity principle does not apply and where the roll-back is creating the grave injustice. To demonstrate, the following shows a somewhat simplified balance sheet of feed-lot operations.

100 choice 800-pound feeder steers at 36 cents	$28,800
Interest 6 months at 6 percent	864
Trucking, commissions, yardage, taxes, etc	1,650
Corn, 5,000 bushels at $1.40	7,000
Alfalfa hay, 20 tons at $30	600
Linseed oil meal, 18 tons at $60	1,280
Labor and power	1,440
Total costs	41,634

With a 1-percent death loss and a 2-pound-per-day gain there will be 113,850 pounds of live weight to sell. To cover all costs the feeder must have a price of 36 cents per pound to break even. At the pre-roll-back price of 40 cents per pound his net profit would have been but $4,554 for this sizable business operation. Under the present order his selling price for high-choice cattle is reduced to approximately 32 cents and this gives him a net loss of over $4,500.

Without the feeder beef supplies would be highly seasonal with an overabundance in the fall and early winter and a dearth during the balance of the year. The total supply would also be very short. The 800-pound feeder steer would yield but 400 pounds of tough stringy grass beef but after 6 months full feed in the lot the yield would be 700 pounds of top-quality tender meat.

MAX C. MARKLEY,
Cattle Feeder.

The Constitution: Worth Having, Worth Defending

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALLACE F. BENNETT
OF UTAH
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I send to the desk a short statement by me, and a copy of the oration delivered by Miss Kay Jon Mildon, the winner of the American Legion Oratorical Contest in my State. I ask unanimous consent that my statement and the oration be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement and oration were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BENNETT

Not many months ago the hearings before the House Un-American Activities Committee on communism developed that some of the graduates of America's most prominent educational institutions are allowed to receive their degrees without exposing themselves to a single course in American history, civics, or government. It is apparent to many of us that this real gap in the education of some of our so-called educated people is one of the reasons the totalitarian governments have been able to make impressions of their philosophies upon persons who do not realize the true nature of the heritage we Americans have, as a result of the struggle and fighting of our progenitors for our Government and its principles.

I am proud that the schools of my State are teaching history and government to the pupils. The oration of Miss Kay Jon Mildon, of Weber County High School, Ogden, Utah, the winner of the State American Legion oratorical contest in my State of Utah, indicates that she has been taught the real value of our heritage and the importance of our preserving it. I am having the oration printed in the RECORD so the Senate will know the views of this high-school girl on the Constitution, and will know what the schools of my State are teaching the youth.

THE CONSTITUTION: WORTH HAVING, WORTH DEFENDING

(Oration by Miss Kay Jon Mildon)

Man's destiny is progress. Across the centuries each thrust back has been canceled by a longer surge forward. The American Constitution crowned the best of all the ages which preceded it. It was the freedom of Greece and Rome, the Magna Carta, the defense of reason, the search for truth. It was the accumulated declaration of all human dignity.

"We, the people of the United States"—with these revolutionary words the writers of the Constitution introduced an instrument of government launching the greatest adventure in human liberty ever known to man. "We, the people"—our Government in our hands. Here is the true revolution of world history.

The Constitution is a design for independent men. It inspires critical thinking without conformity to any mind or time and lays aside all remorseless limits of inheritance. It dignifies the human spirit and says, "With what you are build your future." William Morton challenges pain and human suffering is eased; Cyrus Field believes the immensity of an ocean is not too wide for words and the Atlantic cable is laid; Benjamin Franklin makes service and wisdom and humor American trade-marks; Henry Ford gives distance a smaller meaning.

Poet and explorer, inventor, laborer, statesman, and architect—here is a legion of free men, each building America in the way he finds best, savoring the magic of the land, pushing back frontiers, justifying a way of life endorsed by the signers of the Constitution.

And a people worked and dreamed. The thing that was they made better. That which was not they created. The sun shone on an empire rising from a people's total genius. The burdens were lifted from men and animals to engines and machines. No unsolved problem went unchallenged. New power and skill brought higher productivity. They call it American know-how. Its other name is freedom.

From a compact of a people with themselves has evolved a state spanning a continent, whose wounds of civil war healed in insoluble oneness of spirit and purpose. There has grown up a mutuality of pride that this sovereign people could achieve so well.

For we are not a unique people except as our opportunities and heritage make us unique. We are the Slav and the Greek, the Norwegian and the Dane; we are the Welchman from the coal mine and the peasant from the field; we are the refugee from tyranny; we are the outcast and the adventurer, but we are freedom too—the product of the circumstances which gave us the power of decision.

We are nurtured where the first instinctive reaction is one of trust, for the protection of the constitution is constant. We can attend to our civic duties and then go about our affairs satisfied that our security is not hourly menaced.

Insecurity and fear are well known in America, but it isn't the pervasive fear of the informer, or the fear of guilt by supposition; it isn't the late knock at the door striking the heart cold. Our fears are tangible and capable of alternatives. They are tempered with the knowledge that extreme cases will be justly served.

Today with ours the strongest state left on the side of Christian civilization, we are confronted with the question, "Is the Constitution worth having, worth defending?" The freedom or slavery of mankind for hundreds of years may rest with our answer. Our time is now.

What are we going to do with our time? One man said, "I give you peace in our time." But men of good will declared peace was not enough. Another grasped for power. It was not enough. What is enough? How shall we acquit ourselves before the tribunal of the future? The noble objectives stated in the preamble of the Constitution have survived a turbulent century littered with the wrecks of governments and constitutions. Those whose footsteps preceded ours across the vast unknown of history have not faltered. They kept faith with destiny.

Let us ask ourselves what duties and obligations are ours and accept them with the same readiness that we do our privileges.

We have the duty, civic and moral, of social responsibility. Our time is now.

Our first civic duty is political insight. Knowing the fundamental concepts of our democracy is the surest avenue to its security. We shall not build it wide enough with ignorance. It has been the recurrent tragedy of history that men who had achieved a measure of freedom have let it slip from their grasp. Justice and liberty do not automatically reproduce themselves. They are born again and again from the vigilance of the people. It must be a realistic vigilance which considers both our limitations and potentialities. We are in need of competence in the basic operation of self-government.

Our second civic duty is action. We must vote according to our most considered conviction. We shall follow the performance of those whom we entrust with our Government and reinstate only those who are faithful to that trust.

It is our third civic duty to pay our taxes honestly. They secure for us blessings which no amount of money can safeguard elsewhere in the world. What price freedom to speak, to read, to hear, and choose? What would you bid for a fair trial, the right of habeas corpus, and property? For how much would you sell your right to vote? What price freedom to worship? What price freedom? The privileges and security we enjoy should be paid for by us who possess them.

And there are other civic duties we must assume. We shall give our laws and respect of observance; we shall serve on juries as called and be willing witnesses in court as the occasion arises; we shall act to seek out those who wrap themselves in the protective cover of the Constitution they conspire to destroy; we shall promote the settlement of disputes by peaceful means which unites our strength or the common welfare.

Exploding in headlines across our daily newspapers is the news which is no longer news—that democracy is in danger. The nations sit like competitors at a game board, wary of every move, jostling for advantages, real or imaginary. What will happen to the Constitution? The answer will have to come from the actions of common men.

Our social responsibility includes moral duties based on the Christian ethic. The Christian ethic is the tap root of our national greatness. From it our moral code derives its vitality. Let us not assume that we can defend our Constitution without a deep and abiding faith in God, and the fulfillment of our duties in accordance to that faith.

We need to think not alone in terms of our rights but also of the rights of others; not always in terms of what's in it for me, but what can I put in it for him. It is a practical principle which means further that we will insist upon justice and equality for others. The loss of a single right can weaken or destroy democracy. We shall corrupt no man to gain a privilege and refuse corruption to ourselves. We should be as eager to be worthy of success as we are to be successful. We should keep our spiritual and intellectual forces abreast of our material gains. Otherwise the very means we use for self-defense may be self-defeating. The fulfilling of our best possibilities will not be too much. Our time is now.

It is our duty to direct the immense productive energies of America toward the end of poverty and want and the causes of war. We must keep the power of world decisions in the hands of those who love justice and right. Otherwise we may have no Constitution to defend. Our destiny of greatness is ours only by performance.

There are many called upon to defend the Constitution in ways more heroic than words. In places of Government upholding their highest convictions unswerved and unbought. Upon the battlefield there is a price for freedom. In our lives so little altered by the rumble of distant guns it is easy to forget. We must be fortified with our cause. America was built by a people unafraid of the future. It shall be upheld by a people who are unafraid, a people fulfilling their civic and moral responsibilities.

Turning from the last momentous struggle to preserve our freedom we took stock of the miracle of accomplishment, and the price which had been paid. From the peaceful American soil had sprung the giant machines of war, and the valiant hands to use them. Together they went out to explain a free man's love of freedom and his determination to keep it. It came at a price. But there are better ways to measure lives than by their years. These had been spent for the bright coin of freedom.

We are the children of a way of life made possible by the Constitution. The present effort may have to speak even more eloquently than the last to preserve our civil liberties. Our time is now.

Is the Constitution worth having, worth defending? There is only one answer—given in sober dedication.

Yes, America.

American Legion Proposes a Strong, Sound, and Thoroughly American Foreign Policy

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the national executive committee of the American Legion at its spring meeting in Indianapolis has adopted a fighting program against communism. If by some happy miracle the main points of this program would suddenly be adopted by our Government, it would be like a blast of fresh air across the Nation inspiring new life in our decaying foreign policy.

True to its tradition, the Legion plainly recognizes America's foes. The Legion is not fooled by the propaganda of the Communists. It is well aware of the fact that America is in a fight to the finish with communism and that we can afford no compromise with it.

If the Legion program for America were adopted in the main we would be through forever with coddling Communists at home and appeasing them abroad. Childish notions that the Communists may drop their aggressive ideas play no part in shaping this program which maps a path for America's survival.

I include herewith a news item which appeared in the May 10, 1951, issue of the National Tribune—the Stars and Stripes, which article sets forth the high lights of the foreign relations resolution adopted by the national executive committee of the American Legion:

NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF LEGION SEEKS TO BREAK REDS—MAY MEETING ADOPTS AGGRESSIVE PROGRAM AGAINST COMMUNISM AT HOME AND ABROAD—BACKS COCKE IN MACARTHUR CONTROVERSY—WOULD CHALLENGE KREMLIN WITH FORCE—WANTS ACHESON FIRED

The national executive committee of the American Legion got tough May 2–4 at Indianapolis, Ind., when, at its spring meeting, it molded an aggressive program to "break the hammer and blunt the sickle" of communism both at home and abroad.

The first action of the committee backed completely by resolution the attitude and policy voiced courageously by National Commander Erle Cocke, Jr., of Dawson, Ga., when he came out publicly for the removal of restrictions on military operations in the Korean war. Cocke recently completed an unprecedented world tour, during which he visited 32 countries and traveled 32,000 miles in 37 days. During that period he had conversed with Gen. Douglas MacArthur in Tokyo. He went to Korea for first-hand battle-line information, spent time with Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek on Formosa, and covered pretty thoroughly the European theaters of possible world war III action. The Legion supported its national commander when it reaffirmed policies earlier adopted by the organization seeking the use of Chiang's troops in the Korean war, calling for the bombing of strategic areas in Manchuria, for the blockading of Red Chinese ports, and demanding a defense of Formosa.

The committee, with a few minor changes, went on record in a 36-point resolution in support of the report of the foreign relations commission, headed by Donald R. Wilson, of West Virginia. This long resolution also in large measure reaffirmed Legion policy which seeks to gird this country for a possible global war with communism.

It not only called once more for the ouster of Dean Acheson as Secretary of State, but it also pulled no punches in condemning Great Britain for "trafficking with the enemy" by carrying on trade with Red China.

The committee adopted a series of resolutions presented by its Americanism commission, through A. Luke Crispe, of Vermont, seeking a "get tough" policy with Reds at home. It reiterated by resolution further demands of the Legion, through its security commission headed by Bruce P. Henderson, of Ohio. In all, some 14 commissions and a half dozen committees made strong reports on international and national affairs and dealt with internal organization matters.

FOREIGN RELATIONS DEMANDS

High lights of the Foreign Relations resolution included:

1. Branding of the Soviet Union and her satellites as having embarked upon a course of conduct calculated to enslave the world, characterized by duplicity, savagery, immorality and lawlessness, and condemning their international banditry.

2. Reaffirmation of faith in the ultimate victory of the principles and ideals of the United Nations and rededication to the effort to strengthen this international organization.

3. Reiteration of opposition to United States participation in any form of world federation.

4. We must continue to aid those nations of Western Europe and others throughout the world which have joined with us in the global struggle to destroy the forces of Communist aggression. But we say the time for give-away programs has ended. The Santa Claus attitude of our State Department has not won us fighting friends but has only increased the cries from all over the world for more and more of the American taxpayers' dollar.

5. Limiting, reducing, and discontinuing as soon as possible Marshall plan aid so that the drain on the United States Treasury will be stopped and limiting point 4 aid to offering American technical know-how.

6. We see a growing tendency on the part of the State Department to become an operating department rather than a policy-making agency. Instead of giving away the substance of America in a very unrealistic way, we suggest that the State Department concentrate on the major task of formulating American plans to combat the very real threats to our security throughout the world. • • • We don't have that kind of leadership in our State Department today. To get the leadership required, we must remove the present corps of leaders whose every action has reflected incompetency, indecision, and defeatism. They must be replaced by a corps of realists—men of high purpose and courage—who are not afraid, who have undeviating confidence in American power and ingenuity and who will by meriting our respect, face the future with resolution and faith.

7. Continued strengthening of the military and political effectiveness of the North Atlantic Treaty organization and the inclusion of Spain, Greece, and Turkey.

8. Strengthening of Western Germany economically, politically, and militarily.

9. Treating Communist China in every sense as an aggressor.

10. Opposition to recognition of Red China by the United States and against seating Red China in the United Nations.

SCORES TRAFFIC WITH ENEMY

11. Calling on Congress and the U. N. to take the necessary steps, including the imposition of a blockade, to stop trading in war materials with Communist countries.

12. Bombing of Communist bases, concentration of troops, supplies, and equipment in China or wherever they may be found to prevent their being used by the forces of aggression to forestall and make more costly the successful prosecution of the present conflict in Korea.

13. Continue defense of Formosa.

14. Remove all restrictions against the use of Chinese Nationalists in fight against Communist aggressors.

15. Speedy conclusion of a peace treaty with Japan.

16. Aid to the fullest extent to the Philippine Government.

17. Creation of a regional defense pact by the free nations of the far Pacific and southeastern Asia.

18. We are practicularly concerned with the precarious geographical location and the strategic and economic importance of Iran and we urge that any attempt by outside influences to take over control of that country be vigorously opposed by the United Nations.

19. Providing grain for India only in exchange for the strategic materials which we need and which they can provide to us.

20. Revitalizing of the Voice of America program and transferring it from the Department of State to an independent administrative and operating agency.

21. Development of guerrilla forces in Communist countries to carry on a campaign of sabotage such as Russia is carrying on against other nations of the world.

AMERICANISM PROPOSALS

Resolutions of the Americanism chairman included:

1. Swift and adequate retaliation against Czechoslovakia for the imprisonment of Associated Press Correspondent William N. Oatis to end the persecution of American citizens by Communist governments.

2. Immediate arrest and establishment of detention camps for 14,000 highly skilled saboteurs now under surveillance and awaiting only the Communist order to unloose violence and destruction.

3. Denial of bail for persons found guilty of subversive acts, pending their appeal.

4. Disbarment of Communist lawyers.

5. Denial of the use of the mails to subversive groups.

6. Full-scale probes by the House Committee on Un-American Activities of the extent of subversive infiltrations in defense industries, communications, transportation, Government agencies, the field of entertainment and other sensitive branches of the country's nerve system.

7. Setting forth a five-point sincerity test for recanting Communist and Communist front supporters.

1951 Merchandising and Management Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, on Monday, May 14, our colleague the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] delivered a fine address before the 1951 merchandising and management conference held under the auspices of the University of Maryland. Through long experience in his present post as chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee, the junior Senator from Alabama is well qualified to discuss the problems facing the 2,000,000 retailers who constitute so large a segment of our economy. I ask unanimous consent that his address be printed in full in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Gentlemen, I am especially pleased to be with you this evening and to have the opportunity to participate in the University of Maryland's merchandising and management conference. One reason is that I believe in times of economic stress the problems of the distributive services do not in general receive the attention they deserve.

In any industrial mobilization program, with its heavy emphasis on production, there is perhaps a natural tendency for manufacturing to be in the limelight. It is regrettable that there is not a more general awareness of the problems and difficulties encountered by retailers. That is why such conferences as this which stimulate discussion and thinking about retailing in a defense effort serve such a useful purpose.

Another reason why I welcomed this occasion to talk with you is because, as chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Small Business, I have a deep and active interest in the problems and welfare of retail establishments, the majority of which, as you know, are considered small business.

No one will fail to agree, I am sure, that our almost 2,000,000 retail outlets form, in large part, the economic backbone of every American community. Our tremendous national talent for production has its fruition when an article of merchandise crosses a store counter into the hands of a consumer.

There can be no doubt that the key factor in our ability to sustain a major and extended defense effort is the continued expansion of our entire economy. This means that we must not overlook a single workable method of maintaining a balance between our military production and the continuance, at as high a rate as circumstances allow, of goods and services for our civilian needs. Achieving that state of balance is one of the most difficult problems confronting the Congress and the executive branch today.

Those officials charged with the management of our mobilization program are trying—and rightly so, I believe—to achieve a rate of armament production which will make us as strong as we need to be militarily, while at the same time they are attempting to minimize the disruptions in our civilian markets. It is really a problem of scheduling. We are trying to avoid a rising curve of military production which would be straight up for the next year or two. If we did that and overloaded ourselves with munitions, and if by then there was no outbreak of a general war, our economy would certainly be strained by the abrupt cessation of military purchases.

Currently, we are spending some $5,000,000,000 a month on military goods. About 8 percent of our productive capacity is channeled into defense production. This rate is expected to increase until, in 1953, about 20 percent of our industrial effort will be on a war footing. It is my sincere hope that we shall be able to achieve this goal without the economic dislocations which raised such havoc with small-business establishments during the early years of World War II.

Then, as you will easily remember, many small enterprises become home-front casualties. In 1941, total retail establishments numbered 1,590,000. A year later there were but 1,433,700. In 1943, a further decrease brought the figure down to 1,324,700. In other words, 18 percent—almost one out of five—of our retailers closed their doors between 1941 and 1943.

The situation now, of course, is nowhere as grave as it was during the dark early days of the last war. Let us not on that account, however, become complacent. We must guard carefully against that. For I need not tell you that we are living from day to day with the possibility that the Kremlin may decide at any time to set the civilized world aflame.

One of the prices which as individuals and as businessmen we must pay to make our country strong is a greater participation by Government in the affairs of business. In a word, controls.

Regimentation, as such, is repugnant to all of us. We are now as a Nation, in fact, fighting a war against an enemy who would fetter the bodies and minds of free men. There is probably no one here this evening who does not realize that our very existence depends on our ability so to manage our economy that it will be able to withstand the tremendous pressure we are placing on it.

It was Stalin's predecessor, Lenin, who said: "The easiest way to conquer a country is to debauch its currency." That is frightening truth. The valor of our fighting men will be nullified if we at home permit inflation to sap the strength from our economy. To get out of the shadow of printing-press money we have had to impose price, wage, rent, and credit controls.

Only last week the President stated that there is a better chance during the next 2 years of our controls having to be made tighter instead of their easing off. It looks as though we are going to have to learn to live in a partially controlled economy. I think the best way to do that is to increase our awareness of the objectives of those who have been given the very heavy responsibility of guiding our national economy in the troubled days ahead. Most reasonable men, I feel confident, will be willing to trade, on a temporary basis, a few of their time-honored ways of doing business in order to help preserve our national heritage of freedom.

I realize that the pricing regulations of the Office of Price Stabilization have been a burden to many businessmen. They bear, of course, most heavily on the small retailers, such as hardware-store owners, who must establish prices on hundreds of small items. Admittedly the reporting requirements will at first be troublesome. There are bound to be inconveniences, even possibly some inequitables, in the early stages of any program of national scope. Efforts will be made to correct them, I am sure. And I can assure you that the staff of the Senate Small Business Committee is constantly in touch with the regulatory agencies in an effort to represent the interests of the smaller members of our business community.

Because of my interest in the problems of small retailers, I had recently brought to my attention a suggestion which certainly seems worth exploring. The idea, in brief, is that all retail stores with an annual sales volume of less than $50,000 could be exempted from all pricing regulations. The points made by the advocates of this plan contend that the smaller stores are overburdened with the task of complying with the complicated pricing regulations, especially the time and manpower involved in preparing the pricing charts under ceiling price regulation 7. It is further contended that OPS will have to have a tremendous enforcement staff to check on the approximately 987,000 retail establishments which fall within the group of those doing less than $50,000 business.

Those who favor this small-business exemption feel that the price competition afforded by the larger stores which would be under regulation would force the smaller store owners to keep their prices in line with the ceilings. As I have said, the proposal is interesting and certainly one which our Small Business Committee will look into carefully. It does occur to me, however, that there must be many communities in this vast country of ours in which there are no stores with sales much over $50,000 a year, and these small towns and villages would then, in a price sense, not be in a competitive area.

I cannot emphasize too strongly that, when it comes to combating inflation, we must move on a level which is above the narrow interests of any particular groups. One of the most insidious aspects of inflation is that it gives many persons a false sense of well-being. This is psychological sabotage in its least detectible and therefore most dangerous form. Wages, income, and profits are high. Everybody likes that. Personal income in March was at the record high annual rate of $242,000,000,000. Despite the wage stabilization order of last January, wages rose for the thirteenth consecutive month.

It is estimated that since March of 1950, the total wages paid by private industry climbed 18 percent. Corporate profits, of course, have more than kept pace with wages, to say nothing of the cost of living index.

It is not to be wondered then, that some harsh economic realities tend to be glossed over by those who are unmindful of the danger inherent in a runaway type of inflation. For instance, the tax bill passed by the Congress last October was designed to raise the Government's revenue by about $4,500,000,000. Since then, spiraling price increases, totaling some $6,000,000,000, have wiped out that gain.

Or to state it another way, rising prices have chewed up $2,000,000,000 out of every $10,000,000,000 that has been appropriated for the mobilization program. As retailers, as consumers, and certainly as taxpayers you should have a very direct interest in your Government's efforts to curtail all unnecessary expenditures in connection with our defense activities. We could afford to buy a great many long-range bombers with the money we have let run down the drainpipe of inflation.

You in the retail trade will probably agree that our wage and price controls have already had a breaking effect on "scarce" buying. I am told that since the first of the year, consumer buying has resumed a more normal pattern. Present heavy inventories have produced price reductions in many lines.

On the subject of pricing regulations and of retail inventories, I recently received an interesting letter from a department-store owner in my own State, which said, in part:

"I don't think you are going to have to worry much longer about price ceilings because the consumer market is glutted with merchandise. Somebody woefully underestimates the ability of industry in this country to produce. Unless something is done, my opinion is that by 1952 it will require the most phenomenal selling effort in history to move the merchandise produced in the factories of the United States."

I do not believe, however, that we can look for a continuation of the present inventory picture. As our mobilization program gains speed in the months ahead, we can almost certainly expect spot shortages in some classes of consumer goods. The military is going to take bigger and bigger bites out of the available supply of materials. It now appears that by July more than half of our steel production will be earmarked for defense and defense-supporting programs. That means that unless we place some curbs on consumer purchasing power, more and more dollars will be competing for less and less goods. That is also why our real battle with inflationary forces is yet to come.

The Congress has started to frame new tax legislation which is expected to raise revenue estimated to be in the neighborhood of $7,000,000,000. Taxes, of course, are always painful. But I do not believe that any tax program in the history of our Nation can have a more salutary effect than those which we must raise to finance our present defense effort.

Current taxes provide us with two direct benefits. They help us, in the first place, to keep our rearmament program on a pay-as-you-go basis. The desirability of this, the absolute necessity, in fact, needs no explanation. If we do not foot our defense bill as it falls due, we shall certainly have to pay a higher price for it in terms of skyrocketing living costs and higher defense costs.

Secondly, I think we all by now realize that price and credit controls cannot by themselves effectively clamp a ceiling on prices. The amount of spending money in corporate and consumer hands must also be curbed if we are to avoid the disastrous effects of a widespread buying spree.

If present deliberations on the subject prevail, we as individuals will have our tax rate increased by three percentage points in each bracket. That will provide the Government with slightly less than $3,000,000,000. In addition, levies will be made on your companies to raise between two and three billion.

In the field of taxation I and my colleagues on the Senate Small Business Committee have tried to protect the interests of small independent enterprises. I think our efforts have met with some success. Under the original excess-profits tax, as you will recall, no minimum credit was provided. Now, any company or store earning less than $25,000 does not have to pay an excess-profits tax. In addition, new companies, started since the beginning of 1946, are entitled to a credit equal to their entire industry's average rate of return on assets during the base period.

The exemption for the smaller retailers becomes quite significant when you stop to realize that about 56 percent of all retail establishments have annual sales under $50,000.

No discussion of retailing and our defense effort can be complete, I am well aware, without commenting on regulation W. I can recall that last September, just before this curb on credit was instituted, many businessmen, and especially small retailers, felt that they were going to be badly hurt. I think there was a sense of relief when it became clear that our own installment-credit regulations turned out to be much less stringent than those in Canada, which require 50 percent cash down with only 12 months in which to pay the balance.

We all know that a great part of consumer and business spending since 1950 had been, so to speak, on the cuff. From the end of June 1950, through March, bank loans increased by more than $12,000,000,000. This splurge in credit was almost as much as had taken place in the entire years of 1947 and 1948. There seemed to be a mass impulse for the buying public to dip into savings for current expenditures. From June through March of this year redemptions of savings bonds exceeded bond purchases by over a billion dollars. Savings accounts themselves shrank by three-quarters of a billion dollars.

Regulation W then was a necessary hold-the-line action until such times as we could throw our price ceiling mechanism into gear. The anti-inflationary effect is seen in the reduction between December 1950 and March of this year of $364,000,000 in installment credits.

Softening markets in some consumer durable items have created demands for the relaxation of regulation W. The television industry, for instance, has requested the Federal Reserve Board to ease the credit terms on television-set sales. The industry would like to see dealers permitted to accept old sets to count as trade-ins as part of the down payment or, better yet, a reduction in the down payment from 25 to 15 percent.

At present the Reserve Board is disinclined to tamper with the present terms of the regulation, on the grounds, I am informed, that a firm case has not been made that the credit restrictions alone are responsible for the slacking TV sales.

I do not believe that anyone will disagree that regulation W's bark turned out to be much worse than its bite. The dollar sales volume of department stores, for instance, are substantially ahead of last year's figures, with consumer durable and semi-durable goods seeming to have had the greatest appeal to the buying public. In the District of Columbia for March, the sales index of department stores stands at 249 as opposed to 234 for March a year ago.

On a Nation-wide basis, department-store sales for the week ending May 5 rose 8 percent above the figure for the same period of 1950. Specialty stores recorded only half that gain.

From what we know about the effects of restricting installment-credit buying, I do not think we can reasonably take a harsh view toward regulation W. In fact, I should not be surprised if there are not some small retailers who have actually benefitted from it, at least to the extent that it has placed all sellers on an equal basis. The lower down payment with longer balance periods by which heavily capitalized firms were able to entice customers possibly worked to the disadvantage of smaller firms which could not wait so long for their money on a sale.

I am not at all sure that some action should not also be taken to restrict charge accounts, which can easily be viewed as the installment buying of the relatively well-to-do. In this connection it would perhaps be pertinent to cite another phase of the problem which was brought to my attention recently in a letter from a small appliance dealer in Mississippi.

The letter reads in part: "The Federal Reserve Board is basing their decision on factory sales figures, which represent buying by large well-financed outlets for stockpiling purposes. The large well-financed outlet is also selling the appliances on a 30- or 60-day charge account, knowing full well that the customer cannot pay this in that time. The customer will then go to a bank on credit company to pay the debt in full, and then pay for the appliance without making any down payment at all. A large outlet is also able to put a specific article in the lay-away-plan, which we cannot do."

It seems to me that retailers will directly benefit from the general manufacturers' order, recently issued by the Office of Price Stabilization, to establish new and more realistic ceiling prices for some 75,000 industrial firms. This order obliges manufacturers to roll back those prices which have risen excessively since Korea. We know that price increases have been more on the producer and wholesale level than at retail. For example, the retail price of woolen blankets has increased approximately 25 percent. Raw wool, however, is almost 100 percent more than it was last June. Consumer resistance has made it impossible for stores to match the increase at the producer level. One result is that some stores are replacing wool blanket inventory with less expensive, but more salable, synthetic blankets.

I would like to give you my assurance that the Congress, and especially the Senate Small Business Committee, intends to make the burden of our mobilization program fall as lightly as possible on the smaller business units, whether they be factories, wholesalers, retailers, or operators of service-type establishments.

I think that you may accept as a token of this intent the fact that the Small Business Committee, the chairmanship of which I consider a high privilege, is the first permanent committee created by the Senate to maintain a watchful guard over the interests of our smaller independent businesses.

In addition, the Defense Production Act of 1950, which provides the legislative framework for our war effort, clearly states that it is the policy of Congress to encourage small businesses to make the maximum contribution toward our defense program. It also contains such safeguards as providing that small business shall have representation on all business advisory committees, and that special efforts shall be made for the expeditious handling of all requests, applications, or appeals from hardships and regulations by small concerns.

The act, moreover, directs the Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission to study any factors which may tend to eliminate competition, strengthen monopolies, or in any way injure small business by promoting undue concentration of economic power.

Even so, I am not personally satisfied that we have succeeded in setting up adequate safeguards for smaller firms. In order, therefore, to make as certain as possible that small concerns are given a square deal, I have reintroduced in the Senate a bill now known as the Small Business Defense Plants Act of 1951.

Briefly, the bill provides for the establishment of an independent agency with the authority to make loans to small businesses and to provide many other general services required by smaller companies which must meet the keen competition of big business.

Meanwhile, our Senate committee is trying to fill the gap. For we realize that there are many disadvantages, many instabilities inherent in smallness. These are accentuated in times of economic stress. Our job is to see to it that the rules of fair play are observed. As the momentum of our war effort mounts, business dislocations will create continuous problems for all businessmen.

Some concerns dealing in nonessential lines will undoubtedly suffer hardships. There will be consumer shortages. Do not lose sight of the fact that we must share many of our basic materials with our friends throughout the world who share with us a dread of communistic aggression. We know that we are going to have to shoulder a much heavier tax burden. And business is going to be called upon to operate with many restrictions until the present emergency is past.

These are facts which we shall have to face and live with for an undetermined number of years. It will require sacrifices and much self-discipline. For we are in this struggle for better or for worse. We cannot hope for victory in this struggle for freedom if very many of us fail to accept our full responsibility as citizens and, most importantly, as businessmen.

You, as representatives of retailing, have a vital role to play from now on out. To a considerable extent our civilian economy is in your hands. Our standard of living, our entire American way of life is symbolized by the goods and services you provide. I know they are in good hands.

Need for Full and Careful Study of Various Services to the Blind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. CALEB BOGGS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct attention to the fact that I have introduced H. R. 4079, a bill to establish a Temporary National Advisory Committee for the Blind.

At the present time the various Federal programs for services to the blind are being handled by nearly a dozen bureaus and agencies. You can readily visualize the confusion that has developed in the mind of the average blind person seeking guidance and assistance when that person makes an inquiry for help from the Federal Government and does not direct the inquiry specifically to one of the immediate agencies concerned. Days and weeks pass sometimes before a letter finally reaches the correct office for attention. When we realize that Government expenditures for services to the blind amount to approximately $80,000,000 annually and that many other agencies, including private agencies, expend approximately $60,000,000 annually in this important and worth-while effort, it is readily apparent that careful planning and coordination are essential to accomplish the maximum benefits and services intended.

The problems arising from blindness constitute a major social and economic problem in our country. I am told that approximately 30,000 people are going blind in our land every year. We must, therefore, make every effort to plan and coordinate all activities in order to accomplish the maximum benefits and services in meeting this most important problem.

The recent expansion in welfare work supported by taxation frequently raises questions regarding the relationship between publicly supported and privately supported activities in behalf of the blind, specifically in regard to possible duplication or overlapping of efforts. A well coordinated and integrated program should result in maximum services which in no way compete with each other, duplicate or overlap the various efforts. Every consideration should be directed toward making these services more complete and more effective.

As early as 1862, legislation was enacted in this field which has from time to time been supplemented, amended, and added to, without much, if any, reference to any preconceived plan. Future development will probably follow the same lines unless a careful over-all study is made at this time with a view to making recommendations to the President and to the Congress for complete, intelligent, coordinated effort in this important field. Until such a study and recommendations are made, it is doubtful if there will be anything approaching uniform services to the blind throughout the country.

I wish to emphasize that such a study would in no way lessen the need for the effectiveness of national private agencies for the blind, because there is a definite area of opportunity both for private agencies and public agencies on all levels—national, State, and local.

I sincerely believe that the efforts of this national committee would materially strengthen the work for the blind throughout the Nation. I am hopeful that the Members of Congress will give early and favorable consideration to this proposal.

The provisions of H. R. 4079 are as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

Conditions in Pacific Coast Shipyards

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, with further reference to my remarks today on the danger to national security presented by the weakened condition of our American merchant marine and the maritime industry as a whole, I wish to place in the RECORD a resolution passed by the Bay Cities Metal Trades Council, an organization of San Francisco area unions, at their meeting of April 16. This resolution calls particular attention to the disastrous state of affairs now existing in Pacific coast shipyards and presents a program for their betterment. I certainly subscribe to the two recommendations in the resolution and urge that immediate steps be taken to effectuate them.

The resolution follows:

Whereas since 1947 contracts for the construction of only a few small vessels have been awarded the private yards of the Pacific coast; and

Whereas recognizing the danger to national defense of a policy of not maintaining well dispersed shipyards, staffed with a nucleus of skilled workmen, constant efforts have been made to win an allocation of contracts to the private yards of the Pacific coast; and

Whereas despite the recognition of this principle, agencies of the Government have opposed allocation, contending that in peacetime only a relatively small number of vessels would be constructed, and that any arbitrary division of work would "destroy the more efficient yards"; and

Whereas specifically the Maritime Commission said "The volume of work involved in a wartime or emergency program makes the allocation of work desirable, whereas a peacetime limited construction program does not." (Letter from Philip B. Fleming to Schuyler Otis Bland, chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, July 6, 1949); and

Whereas specifically the Munitions Board said "The proposed allocation would be effective only when applied to a large Government construction program. When applied to the current program, the work may be spread so thin as to put out of business valuable east coast yards with many years of experience." (Letter of May 27, 1949 to Schuyler Otis Bland from Maj. Gen. Patrick W. Timberlake, Munitions Board Deputy Director of Staff, Merchant Marine Committee hearings, p. 118); and

Whereas specifically the Navy said "Recognition of the fact that there is less than a desirable distribution of shipbuilding throughout the country does not permit the conclusion that part of the existing effort should be transferred elsewhere. Rather should it follow that additional shipbuilding should be fostered, and the industry nurtured to a healthy condition." (Supplementary statement of Rear Adm. Charles D. Wheelock, Deputy and Assistant Chief of the Bureau of Ships, made to the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, June 23, 1949, contained on p. 122 of hearings); and

Whereas Congress preparing intelligently to meet this emergency has authorized:

1. The construction of Mariner type vessels by the Maritime Board.

2. The construction of 170 naval vessels and the conversion of 291 others; and

Whereas the private yards of the Pacific coast, which built 42 percent of the vessels constructed during World War II, have little work, unstable employment conditions, are forcing skilled shipyard employees into other industries in this a time of national emergency: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Bay Cities Metal Trades Council, in meeting at San Francisco, Calif., the evening of the 16th day of April 1951, That the mobilization base be expanded to embrace the private yards of the Pacific coast, the construction records of which were unequaled in World War II; and be it further

Resolved, That—

1. The remaining Mariner type construction contracts (10 estimated) be allocated to Pacific coast yards—25 already having been assigned Atlantic and Gulf coast yards, and

2. A fair share of the Navy construction and conversion program be assigned to the private yards of the Pacific coast; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Defense, the Chairman of the Maritime Board, the Navy Bureau of Ships, and to all Congressman and Senators from the States of California, Washington, and Oregon, and the metal trades department, A. F. of L.

Postal Pay Increase Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACK Z. ANDERSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a self-explanatory newspaper article from the San Jose Mercury-Herald:

FIFTY-FIVE TO QUIT POST OFFICE IN SAN JOSE IF NO PAY RAISE, POLL SHOWS

San Jose Post Office may face a help shortage if Congress fails to authorize a 17 percent across-the-board pay raise under bills pending in Senate and House bills propose raises for all postal workers in the United States, including supervisory.

Cross-section poll of 118 out of 150 San Jose carriers showed that 55 plan leaving the service if Congress does not approve the raise, according to C. C. Renshaw, legislative committee chairman, branch 193, National Association of Letter Carriers. "Twenty-four percent have part-time outside jobs to make ends meet," he said. "Wives of 25 percent also work to help out."

"We are appealing to the public to write California Representatives and Senators urging passage of the bills," said Renshaw. "Pending is Senate bill 355 and H. R. 244. Senate hearings have been held but not even a subcommittee has acted in the House.

"Our survey showed," said Renshaw, "that the average carrier has approximately three dependents, besides his own upkeep. Twenty-three percent rent homes. 16 percent live with relatives, and 52 percent are buying homes. Nine percent were unaccounted for.

"Take-home pay averages $233 a month. Total income last year was $3,200, which was subject to withholding, retirement, and other deductions. On top of that were State and Federal income taxes. Too little remains."

Renshaw said that carriers' starting wage is $2,670 and graduates up to $3,970 after 25 years service, but that the $3,200 is today's average for all. Affected here in wage raise efforts are 400 employees. Clerks are represented by National Federation of Post Office Clerks. Al Gould, W. J. Sheeby, and Clarence Ashford are other members of Renshaw's committee.

Malicious Attacks Against Leaders Reach New Extremes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, during times of prolonged crisis and great emotional stress, some persons have a tendency to lose all sense of balance. From such persons, we can expect some rather uncontrolled outbursts. Our mail is apt to contain, and lately has contained, vicious personal attacks on our national leaders.

We can overlook much of it as the work of harmless cranks. Criticism, calm, or heated, we welcome as signifying a healthy democracy. But we in a democracy have a limit beyond which our rules of fair play will not allow us to go. One scurrilous piece which came to my attention this week has gone beyond the limit. It reeks of malice and attempts to incite violence.

I do not mean to dignify it by bringing it to the attention of this House. I mention it here only so that the Members can be warned that such material is being distributed, and so they can be on guard against it in their own districts and can make sure that the proper action is taken to see that their constituents are placed on guard against these irresponsible enemies of democracy.

The particular piece which I refer to is one which actually threatens the lives of some members of the present administration. It suggests that the death sentence is the proper reward for their Government service and attempts to class them with convicted traitors.

I know that the Members on the other side of the House will join me in showing their abhorrence of this viciousness. It is true that those on the minority side have directed heavy political attacks at many of the same persons for whom the death sentence is suggested, but I know that I am speaking for all parties when I say that all true and patriotic Americans want to keep our present discussions on a level of decency and honest discussion.

I am turning this vile piece of literature over to the proper Government authorities to investigate the possibilities of taking action. I am doing this, as I give this information to the House, so that we can be on guard against this type of enemy within.

The Story of a State Department Call

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend and revise my remarks, I wish to include an editorial which appeared in the Johnstown Democrat on May 16, 1951, entitled "The Story of a State Department Call."

This story which has now been disclosed and carefully documented should be investigated immediately by the House Foreign Affairs Committee to determine who in our State Department should issue orders such as this.

The editorial follows:

INSIDE LABOR—THE STORY OF A STATE DEPARTMENT CALL

(By Victor Riesel)

It can now be disclosed, and documented that a representative of Dean Acheson's State Department recently visited the most strategic waterfront union headquarters in this country—and urged its leaders to have their wharf-working followers refuse to load guns and ammo on ships rushing military supplies to our friends in Europe.

This spokesman for the United States Department of State introduced herself as Edith Cameron Wall. She carried the usual credentials used by Federal agents. In addition, she presented a letter from Secretary of Labor Maurice Tobin, which, in effect, urged union leaders to cooperate with her.

This conversation took place in the national headquarters of the A. F. of L. International Longshoremen's Association, long a target of the opposition. Through its dockwallopers it controls all ocean traffic to and from almost the entire world.

Lest there be the slightest doubt as to time, place and participants, I record here that the lady (still in the employ of the State Department at this very minute) made this proposal in a talk with husky ILA chief, Joe Ryan, in his private office at 265 West Fourteenth Street, New York City, at about 4:30 on the afternoon of March 13.

Joe threw the lady out, gently, and immediately telephoned top A. F. of L. leaders in Washington. Protests were rushed to the State Department. But labor got no satisfaction—and the lady is on her way to Europe on a special mission starting in Paris.

The best that the indignant Ryan and national A. F. of L. secretary George Meany, could get was a State Department apology—a polite brushoff—saying, so sorry the lady took up so much of your time.

It all began some days after Ryan had made certain that special Italian cargo ships were swiftly loaded with war stuff and sped on their way to Rome's military depots. Ryan had to see to this personally early in March when he was informed that a Communist propaganda spree was growing in Brooklyn, at the army waterfront base there.

Apparently an Italian Commie squad, operating out of its Henry Street catacomb, had spread out among the Italian longshoremen on the military piers and was urging the cargo slingers not to load the Italian freighters.

Joe got out there fast. So did Pentagon officers and city officials, including the mayor. The ships were loaded.

Some days later, Ryan received what he believed was a routine call from one of the many Government officials who seek his union's aid in this war. It was a lady. She was from the State Department and said she also had the Labor Department credentials. She wanted to discuss the union's manpower problems. They got together about 4:15 p. m. There was some technical talk. She saw union records. She revealed she had just returned from Norway—and was going to the other United States ports before leaving on a special mission to France.

Suddenly and sweetly the lady said:

"You have just issued orders to your men to load war supplies. And when I go over to France, the French longshoremen will ask me about their brothers in America and what they're doing. When I tell them that you are going to persist in your policy of sending the cargoes over there, will that not drive them into Communist hands?

"Won't you let me have your word that I can give them practical assurances that you will change your policy on loading these ships?"

Never famous for his shyness, Joe Ryan got slightly apoplectic.

"Listen, girlie," he snapped, "those French longshoremen are in the Communist Party. They went in back on December 4, 1936, when they refused to unload our steamship George Washington, of the United States Lines, and you, or your people, know it. They even refused to take off baggage. What kind of a quiz program am I in here? Is this your opinion, or did the State Department send you in here to tell me not to load these ships? You got in here only because of the State Department and I know you've been visiting other waterfront unions."

Startled, she stuttered:

"No; I'm voicing my own opinion."

Joe opened the door, and shouted for his secretary to throw her out before he lost his temper and forgot he wasn't on the docks.

Then the protests were shot to the State Department. But it has refused to condemn her, or dissociate itself from her.

Who sent her? It doesn't seem possible that she could dare to do this without orders from some superior. Who is he?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAURIE C. BATTLE
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, it is a special privilege to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a beautiful letter from the staff of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs to Mrs. John Kee, wife of our late beloved chairman:

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
May 16, 1951.

MRS. JOHN KEE,
George Washington Inn,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MRS. KEE: In the passing of our beloved chairman, Judge Kee, all of us on the staff of the committee feel a profound sense of personal loss.

The judge was a great chairman, with an outstanding record of unselfish public service and devotion. But he was more than that to us, however. Despite his heavy and demanding work load, he always found time to take an active interest in us and our problems, and was anxious that we find a maximum degree of happiness in our work. His kindliness, friendliness, and deep understanding made it a simple matter for us to achieve that happiness.

You and your family can be justly proud of, and comforted by, the great and noble reputation he leaves behind.

We wish for you and each member of your family many years of health and happiness.

Sincerely,

Boyd Crawford, Ira E. Bennett, Sheldon Z. Kaplan, George Lee Millikan, Roy J. Bullock, Albert C. F. Westphal, June Nigh, Winifred Osborne, Mabel Wofford, Mary G. Chace, Helen Mattas.

State Department Negotiations Cut Plywood Imports 50 Percent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT B. SCUDDER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Speaker, our State Department, through its negotiations at Torquay, England, has entered into trade agreements with 17 foreign nations and has brought about a 50-percent decrease in the tariff which now applies on the importation of plywood into the United States by foreign countries. Under the favored-nations clause, countries not included in this trade agreement may also be permitted to import plywood into this country under the agreements negotiated.

On February 9, 1949, in a speech on the floor of the House of Representatives, I called attention to the fact that we had a threat in foreign-produced plywood to our American industry which, at that time, was employing about 13,000 workers in this industry.

On June 20, 1950, I appeared before the Committee for Reciprocity Information protesting the contemplated cut in the import levies and called attention to the fact that there were eight Douglas fir plywood and veneer plants located in the First Congressional District, which I represent, and are centered in the counties of Sonoma, Mendocino, Humboldt, and Del Norte. I also pointed out that the average wage existent at that time for the American worker in this industry was $1.725 per hour while, in British Columbia, the nearest to our wage scale had workers receiving the equivalent of $1.10 in United States currency. I called attention to the fact that, in the United States, the man hours necessary to produce 1,000 square feet of plywood cost $23.88; while, in Canada, the cost in equivalent American dollars was $15.18. In the United States, the logs necessary to produce 1,000 square feet of plywood cost $37.50; in Canada the cost in equivalent American dollars was $26.52. I proceeded to give further comparisons of the difference in the cost of production and the threat to this industry should tariff reductions be made.

At that time, the best information I had was that there were some 18,500 men employed in this industry on our coast. The three Pacific Coast States of California, Oregon, and Washington are the main producers of plywood in the United States, and I am informed now that there are between 35,000 and 40,000 people engaged in these mills and the supplying of material for their operation. New plants have been built and only this week I assisted in the procurement of necessary materials to put into operation the Arcata Plywood Co., located in Arcata, Calif.

Of course, I realize that damage to the industry is not one of immediate concern as plywood is in such heavy demand. However, if this demand for materials eases off, there is bound to be a tremendous reaction in the areas in which these plywood plants operate. In many instances, they become the important source of employment for many people and any slackening of production would adversely affect every businessman in the area.

The tariff agreements entered into at Torquay, England, amount to a 50 percent reduction. Under the present 40 percent ad valorem—on value—of every $100 of plywood sent into this country, a tariff of $40 is levied. The reduction means that, for every $100 of plywood shipped into our country, there would be only a $20 duty required.

Under the present tariff arrangement, there was imported from Canada last year $11,032,465 worth of plywood and veneers. Despite the $40 per $100 tax on this import, Canada was able to compete in the market with American production. Within a few years, it may again be profitable for Japan to engage in the plywood industry as it has in the past. They have supplies of timber and, furthermore, shiploads of our American logs were shipped to Japan for processing into plywood.

I am greatly concerned over this last action of the State Department as I feel that it not only threatens this industry in my district, but it will adversely affect the many thousands of men and women who are employed in this comparatively new and essential industry to northern California. I protest this action and call upon those who are financially concerned to register their protests and to be on the alert that this trade agreement may be rescinded before its evil effects are reflected on the industry.

The extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act is still pending before the Senate. When this bill passed the House, we had written into it the "peril point" and the "escape clause." If the Senate approves of this bill as written in the House, we will have some right to insist under the escape clause that we be able to renegotiate if and when our industry is adversely affected.

We must be ever vigilant and watchful if we are to keep our American industry, our laboring men, and our economy from having to face competition created by substandard conditions which they cannot meet.

Federal Tort Claims Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to include the following very interesting article that appeared in the Bar Bulletin, issued by the Boston Bar Association, entitled "The GI and the Federal Tort Claims Act," by Attorney Lenahan O'Connell.

Mr. O'Connell is an able and capable member of the bar and is now assistant attorney general in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. He has given considerable thought and study to military legislation and has had considerable experience with the administration of the Federal Tort Claims Act:

THE GI AND THE FEDERAL TORT CLAIMS ACT
(By Lenahan O'Connell)

When Congress enacted the Federal Tort Claims Act (which is now 28 U. S., sec. 2672), the public-at-large, in my opinion, did not realize that there would be claims presented to the United States District Court by members of the Armed Forces for injuries arising out of accidents in which they were involved while still in uniform. However, a series of claims were lodged in the several district courts of the United States; and, finally, the Supreme Court granted a writ of certiorari in a case arising from the Court of Appeals, Fourth Circuit. It was the case of Brooks v. United States (337 U. S. 49), where two soldiers, who were brothers, on furlough, accompanied by their father, were driving along a highway and were struck by a Government-owned and operated vehicle, causing one soldier's death and severely injuring the others. The Brooks case opened a new chapter in the realm of claims against the United States. The late Mr. Justice Murphy, who was an active Army Reservist, said quite succinctly: "We are not persuaded that 'any claim' means any claim but that of servicemen." The Court seemed to lay great stress on the fact that Congress must have had servicemen in mind because, under the Federal Tort Claims Act, they made two specific exceptions, namely, claims arising in foreign countries; and, also, claims arising out of combat activities. The Court said that the remedy under the act was an exclusive remedy. However, the Brooks case did leave the door open for further discussion and reasoning by the Court because they said in their decision: "We are dealing with an accident which had nothing to do with the Brooks' Army careers; injuries were not caused by their service, except in the sense that all human events depend upon what has already transpired. Were the accident incidental to the Brooks' service, a wholly different case would be presented."

A most interesting excerpt in the majority opinion of the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, denying the Brooks' recovery, is as follows: "If a soldier could sue for such injury or illness based on the alleged negligence of the company cook or mess sergeant, or if soldiers who contract sickness on wintry sentry duty had a right of action against the Government on this allegation of a negligent order given by the company commander, then the traditional grousing of the American soldier would result in the devastation of military discipline and morale."

It should be of interest to the members of the bar that, even if recovery is had under circumstances outlined in the Brooks case, the Brookses are fully protected under all the other remedies afforded to military personnel, if their accident was classified as "line of duty." The Feres decision, referred to below, does not overrule this phase of the Brooks' decision.

Following the Brooks' decision, the several district courts and courts of appeal were in disagreement as to whether any claim should be allowed wherein the plaintiff was a serviceman.

In the Feres case, the New York district court dismissed an action brought by the petitioner to recover for death caused by negligence. The decedent perished by fire in an Army barracks, which the petitioner said was unsafe because of a defective heating plant. The Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, affirmed the dismissal.

The Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, in the Jefferson case, affirmed a decision whereby the plaintiff was denied recovery where, on active duty, he was required to undergo an abdominal operation and the Army doctor failed to remove a 30 x 18 inch towel marked: "Medical Department, United States Army."

In the Griggs case, the Court of Appeals, Tenth Circuit, allowed the petitioner to state a cause of action wherein the petitioner alleged that, while on active duty, death was caused by the negligent and unskillful treatment by the Army surgeons.

The Supreme Court granted certiorari in these three cases and they were argued together. The decision is Feres v. United States (340 U. S., 135). The Court, after a long decision, came to the conclusion that the Government is not liable under the Federal Tort Claims Act for injuries arising out of or in the course of activity incident to service.

While the Court said they did not think the Congress, in drafting the Federal Tort Claims Act, created a new cause of action, it did not reverse the Brooks case, stating that the Feres case is a wholly different case.

The Court, in writing its conclusions that no new cause of action was created by the Federal Tort Claims Act, stated, "Congress was suffering from no plague of private bills on behalf of military and naval personnel because a comprehensive system of relief had been authorized for them and their dependents by statute."

The Court went on to explain that there is nowhere in our body of law any precedent where members of the armed services were permitted to maintain a tort action for injuries sustained in the military service; and, thus, the act really, in effect, waived immunity from recognized causes of action, and was not to visit the Government with novel and unprecedented liabilities.

The Feres decision leaves a still further question open to members of the armed services and that is: just what, exactly, is an injury that arises out of or in the course of activity incident to service? There are several problems that would be presented, one of which comes to my mind: If a soldier lives outside the garrison and is injured after he leaves the area encompassed by the post camp or station and before he arrives home, is he covered by the Federal Tort Claims Act? It might be of interest for the bar to know that the enlisted and officer personnel stationed at the Army base, Boston, do not have quarters provided for them and must live around the city of Boston; several of them live at the YMCA. What would be the status of a soldier injured by a Government vehicle, after the soldier left the Army base and prior to his arrival at the YMCA?

In view of the large numbers of men we have in the Federal service, now, the problem will multiply, and the courts will be confronted with the fine question: What injuries arise out of and in the course of activity incident to service? As far as the armed services are concerned, when an injury results—unless a man is a. w. o. l.—he is, invariably, marked: "Line of duty." Will this over-all presumption of duty preclude a soldier from presenting a claim under the Federal Tort Claims Act? In the Brooks case, line of duty does not enter into the picture, if a soldier is outside the camp post or station on furlough.

It is the writer's opinion that the Brooks and Feres cases still allow a wide margin of latitude for presentation of claims under the Federal Tort Claims Act because the courts must determine the very fine question of what is an activity incident to military service.

Until Congress definitely bars military personnel, stating that separate legislation covers them, our United States district courts will have an increasingly large number of cases to determine, especially where so many of the married officers and enlisted men live off the military reservations and commute daily; and, on a permanent change of station, use privately owned vehicles for transportation.

The concluding thought in my mind is this: Is a soldier on furlough to have his rights under the Federal Tort Claims Act open to him; and the soldier, on change of station, to be precluded?

I recommend to the members of the bar a very fine article on this subject which appears in the George Washington Review, volume 18, No. 1.

Free Enterprise Is a Producer, Not a Consumer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT B. SCUDDER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I would like to include an editorial appearing April 21, 1951, in the Enterprise-Record, published at Chico, Calif., wherein the importance of the tax bill paid by the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. to Butte County is graphically disclosed. This could be extended to include every county in the State where facilities of the power company are located.

Private power companies adequately pay their way through the huge tax burdens they carry. Without this source of revenue, it would be necessary for all levels of government to impose larger burdens upon individuals, property, business concerns, and every source from which they derive revenue.

Those who argue that cheap electricity is obtainable only through Government power development, are standing on unstable ground. As private enterprise, power companies not only maintain a high standard of service to their consumers, but have consistently shown a decline in their rates over the years.

Government plants, on the other hand, are subsidized and operate largely tax free. They are not faced with the incentive that comes from competition, so therefore it is reasonable to assume they would render an inferior brand of service.

The needs of our country and the standards we demand, are best served by free enterprise. Government intervention into any field adequately served by private interests tends to produce more waste, extravagance, and confusion—than the good it accomplishes.

The editorial referred to above, is as follows:

ONE OF THE FEW BARGAINS LEFT

George L. Works, manager of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co.'s DeSabla division, has just announced the company's tax payments to Butte County for the 1950–51 fiscal year.

The staggering sum of $1,006,658 (million, that is) was paid into the county treasury for the support of county government, public schools, district taxes, and support of municipalities.

Six hundred and thirty-six thousand nine hundred and forty-five dollars went for the support of county government, $302,229 to support public schools, $47,982 for other district taxes, and $19,502 was paid to the cities.

With figures like these it is not strange that the voters of Redding, in an election last year, voted to renew a contract with the P. G. & E. and turned down an offer from the Bureau of Reclamation.

Works aptly put it when he said, "The significance of these figures is that a business-managed utility company produces taxes instead of consuming them."

There are those that advance the argument that the utility doesn't pay the taxes—that the $1,006,658 the P. G. & E. turned over to Butte County last year was actually paid by the consumers. That in our opinions is stupid (we were going to say asinine but President Truman has overworked the word) reasoning. For, if those who think that way are right, no enterprise pays taxes—not the motor manufacturer, not the oil company, not the farmer, not the corner store. It just collects the money from the consumers and gives Government a part of it.

Reasoning on from this point, it is now clear that we need not worry at all when Government destroys taxpaying industry. Let the Government run the farms, the stores, the newspapers, the factories—everything. After all, if the Government is to supply your power, it could just as logically supply your shoes, your food, and your radio programs, and comic strips. And what have we now? The answer can be expressed in one word. We have communism.

While we are thinking of utility companies and electricity, let us consider the price of electricity as compared to other things in these times of inflation. An article in the New York Times by John P. Callahan sums it up quite well:

"Last week the power and light industry rustled through price index components and underscored the one item that tends downward in the spiral-like consumers' price index. The item, of course, is electricity.

"While the dollar today has less than one-third the purchasing power it had at the beginning of the twentieth century, that depreciated dollar buys more than twice as much electricity as the far more valuable dollar did in 1913.

"Fifteen years ago the average revenue per kilowatt-hour for all the residential electricity used was 5.01 cents a kilowatt-hour. Since then it has dropped to 2.89 cents."

The present average rate for Chico under P. G. & E. is 2.5 cents per kilowatt-hour.

That, as Mr. Callahan observed, is good news for the household consumer. And it is good news for the agricultural and industrial consumer, too. On the farm and in the factory, as in the home, electric power is usually one of the smallest items of total operating cost.

Moreover, here is the answer to those who emptily argue that socialized government power development is the only road to "cheap electricity." We have cheap electricity now, all we want of it—and the industry which provides us with it pays out some 20 percent of all its revenues in taxes. Government plants, by contrast, are tax-subsidized, and wholly or largely tax free.

When you push that light button, you're getting a bargain.

The Great Decline

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the San Diego (Calif.) Union of April 29, 1951:

THE GREAT DECLINE

To understand the tragic decline in national morality over the last few years it is necessary to look into the political antecedents of Harry S. Truman. For generations we have looked to the White House for exemplars of moral, ethical, and social standards. Seldom have we been disappointed or disillusioned. But in later years we have witnessed a sort of cynicism in political and civic standards which has been reflected in the indifference toward American idealism on the part of the masses of our people.

It is not to the discredit of Harry Truman that he failed in business; many honorable men have had the same experience. Probably he served capably in his minor capacity as a county judge, a job requiring no brilliant legal talent and involving no heavy responsibilities.

The particular trouble was that this small job was a link tying him with one of the most conscienceless political machines in the United States—the Pendergast machine of Kansas City.

Harry Truman no doubt was almost as greatly surprised to be named as the machine's candidate for United States Senator—with assurance of election by the methods of this machine—as he was to fall into the Presidency. His service as a Senator was mostly undistinguished, but gave him some publicity as head of a committee investigating war industries. Even this negative role was not to his discredit.

His weakness, from the time of his county judgeship to his incumbency in the White House, has been a mistaken loyalty to his political godfather, Pendergast. This trait has colored numerous of his official activities. One of his first acts as President was to "fire" the able Federal district attorney who sent Pendergast to prison. A sequel was his granting of full pardon to some 30 members of the machine convicted of corruption, restoring their voting rights on the eve of a congressional election in which he was backing a favored candidate. A sequel to this sequel was his utter failure to prosecute the machine conspirators who aided his candidate by stuffing ballot boxes and later dynamiting a courthouse vault to destroy the evidences of their crime.

In keeping with this trait of "loyalty," Harry Truman has retained in his intimate service officials of the presidential household who have made grain speculations on "inside information," 5 percenters who have used their White House connections to collect fat commissions; such characters as Harry Vaughan, of deep-freezer fame, and Margolis, the goat for an international graft project. Typical is the "mink-coat scandal" involving influence in the multibillion-dollar RFC.

Now these things may not directly affect the operation of the Government. But they do have immense psychological import.

The low standards of the White House are reflected in the cynicism or indifference of the citizenship.

New B. & O. Railroad Pier at Baltimore

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. GLENN BEALL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, on May 15, Gov. Theodore R. McKeldin, of the great free State of Maryland, dedicated a new pier—the largest of its kind on either coast—at Baltimore. This pier, erected by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad at a cost of more than $5,000,000 is the finest example of free enterprise at work in the American way for the creation of more business and more jobs for the American people. For a thoughtful and splendid exposition of what this free-enterprise system means to our Nation, I commend the address made by Governor McKeldin.

The address follows:

While great debates rage and greater debates follow about where and when wars should be fought; while politicians, statesmen, near-statesmen, and would-be statesmen fret and fume over the issues; while generals fail, and others rise to take their places, American industry marches on.

Here is the real strength of the United States.

Here, today, in the initial utilization of this great ore pier, is a concrete symbol of that which makes our Nation the greatest, the strongest, and the winner of the decisive battles, whether in war or peace—the free-enterprise system.

We read and we hear that potential legislation of great moment gathers dust in committee-room pigeonholes while personalities clash and bitterness holds sway as some Members of the Congress seek to resolve—and others seek to complicate—the diplomatic and military problems of the times.

But the wheels of American industry, without the shackles of socialization and minus the dictator's regimentation, speed on to build and stock the arsenal which is the best hope for our continued freedom, and eventually, for the freedom of the world.

Allies worry over what they call our disagreements in official circles and enemies rejoice over what they seek to interpret as a lack of American unity within our Government and among our people.

But while the tongues wag and the gloomy prophets shake their heads our muscles grow stronger as we add new facilities and increase our real, free wealth.

It is, indeed, proper and fitting that this pier, the greatest of its kind on either coast, and perhaps the greatest in the world for the importation of ores from other lands, should be located in the great, free-enterprise port of Baltimore. Here, unlike many other ports of the Nation, we have proved that socialization can be avoided in the operation of a port and that competition can be successfully and profitably encouraged.

The erection of this pier here by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad at a cost of more than $5,000,000 therefore becomes double proof of the wisdom and success of the free-enterprise system.

This facility will be of the utmost importance to the Nation in its preparations for defense and possibly for war.

It will continue to be of great value to the Nation in the years of peace that we all hope will come as it provides the raw materials for the metals to build a greater and greater America. Aiding with the importation of ores from Venezuela, Liberia, Brazil, and other places, it will help to conserve our own deposits.

If stronger bonds were possible, this new facility would tie this great transportation system—the B. & O.—even closer to the State of Maryland and the City of Baltimore. The State and city owe much to the Baltimore & Ohio, and I believe the officials of the railroad will agree that they like the city and the State. The relationships have been of the best—as they should be. We are proud of this carrier, of its long line of past executives, present executives, and the great body of men who man the engines, the cars, the shops, the maintenance lines, the piers, and all of the great road's facilities. This new pier will add considerably to the payroll and will greatly increase the importance of this harbor.

When we look at this fine pier and think of its use, we must think of the carload after carload of coal that will be brought here for shipment from the port by the same cars that will receive the ore for use in this country.

We must think of the miles upon miles of rail over which the laden cars travel to and from this pier. We must think of the mills to which this ore will be carried, and the new mills that will be built to receive it. We must think of the plants to which the refined metals will go and of the products that they will produce for use in war, in the homes, in the mines, on the farms, in great and little factories. Looking at this pier we can see the beginnings of bridges and skyscrapers, tanks and cannon, plows, bulldozers, hammers and nails, bathtubs, kitchen stoves, and baby carriages.

Yes, this is more than just a great, new pier, modern in type, and highly useful in purpose. It is a symbol of America. It is industrial progress.

We can criticize the politicians, the statesmen, the near statesmen and would-be statesmen, and their great and greater debates. We can take sides with this general or that general on ideas and plans for winning a war or preventing a bigger war. We can ridicule the men at the head of our Government or the men who want to be at the head of it.

But with all its debates, with all its delays, with all its shortcomings, we'll never ridicule the form of that government—the form under which free enterprise is made possible.

A Review and a Warning

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, the American Federationist, official monthly publication of the American Federation of Labor carries in its May 1951 issue an article by Mr. James A. Brownlow, president of the Metal Trades Department of the A. F. of L. The article is entitled "A Review and a Warning." Because of its timeliness, its logic, and the tremendous importance to the United States of the message it brings, I ask that it be printed in full following these remarks.

The review to which the article refers is a review of the wartime and post-wartime history of the American merchant marine in its relation to our foreign competitors. The warning, which Mr. Brownlow voices, is raised against a continuation of present policies which are fast making the American maritime industry a weak and inadequate arm of our national security.

Mr. Brownlow calls attention to a situation the seriousness of which can scarcely be exaggerated. It is a situation which the maritime unions and the maritime industry as a whole have pounded on through the years. The previous warnings were not listened to, and we paid dearly for the failure to listen. As an example, shortly after World War II and since that time the A. F. of L. maritime and metal trades unions recommended and urged that a large number of ships from the reserve fleet be kept in operable condition at a cost of about $25,000,000. The proposal was shouted down as being "rank extravagance." We have just gone through, and are still going through, the process of pulling those ships out and rehabilitating them at a cost many times higher than $25,000,000. It is about time that Congress and the American people pay some attention to maritime industry and union men who are actually on the job and know the score on these matters. Men who are primarily interested in the security of their homes and families and of the Nation as a whole, rather than in the sacred dollar. There are still people around who, unfortunately, and for some unknown reason, cannot see the relationship between national security and a flourishing American merchant marine. If we do not keep our ships sailing, and our repair yards and construction yards operating, those people will wake up to find that their blindness has cost far more than the sums required to put Mr. Brownlow's recommendations into effect. Those recommendations follow the program I have been fighting for ever since coming to Congress. I hope that the review and warning in this article will make some of us who have refused to see the very real danger it points to sit up and take notice:

A REVIEW AND A WARNING

(By James A. Brownlow)

In 1946 the metal-trades department of the American Federation of Labor, through its representatives, called to the attention of the Government the need of a sustained merchant marine. During the years following—1947, 1948, 1949, and 1950—this merchant-marine need of the United States was reiterated more emphatically each succeeding year.

The essence of the metal-trades department's support of an American merchant marine might be summed up in these three reasons:

First, the United States should retain its standing among the commercial nations of the world. United States flagships should sail all seas and penetrate all harbors, carrying our exports and imports.

Second, as a Nation we should not allow our skilled shipbuilding mechanics and ship-operating personnel to become dispersed and be deprived of the opportunity to engage in the work in which they are skilled, or our shipyards and other ship-maintenance facilities to become dissipated, deteriorated, and, in many instances, unfit for future use.

The last and perhaps most important reason is that the United States must remain independent of any nation or group of nations in the carrying of our commerce and in maintaining our first line of national defense. National emergencies must never find us again dependent upon the ships of other nations to carry our troops or implements of war.

It would be assumed that two experiences would suffice to impress upon us the magnitude of successive blunders and fully prepare us for future needs. Quite the contrary is true, however. As late as mid-1950 there were loud clamors emanating from some spokesmen for Government that the sacrificing of our merchant marine would aid in the closing of the dollar gap existing between the United States and some foreign countries.

The belief that American products and exports should be carried in foreign bottoms also had its strong advocates. In fact, this advocacy was put into practice to the exclusion of the use of American ships until Congress insisted, by statute, that at least one-half of United States Government financed and provided goods and produce be carried in American bottoms.

With war clouds growing darker each day over the world's horizon, and with hostilities raging in Korea, not so much is heard about the closing of the dollar gap at the cost of the remnants of the United States merchant marine. But it must be confessed that it was incidental that the merchant marine was not wholly obliterated, rather than because of any deep conviction or planned preservation of it as a means of carrying commerce or of national defense on the part of some agencies of government.

We must examine our merchant marine as it is today and face up to the needs of our Nation with the determination that we can be and will be independent of any country or group of countries in the carrying of our commerce during peacetime as well as when we are confronted with war.

Gen. Philip Fleming, then Chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, said in 1949:

"There are four essentials to the development and maintenance of shipping services under our flag, adequate for the needs of commerce and defense. These are, first, an active fleet; second, an active shipbuilding and ship-repair industry; third, an adequate training program; fourth, a national defense reserve fleet."

All with an interest in our merchant marine will readily subscribe to the general's statement. But even with him, as Chairman of the Maritime Commission, taking that strong position, there was little done about rebuilding or operating a larger fleet of merchant vessels. There continued the operation under foreign flags of vessels once owned by the United States Government. The repair of these vessels in foreign ports continued, and the United States merchant marine further declined.

This went on until the sad awakening came for the third time, and we found ourselves facing an emergency, one which may well be our Nation's greatest trial.: We are responding by recognizing our need of ships and shipping, of skilled shipbuilding mechanics, and of modern, up-to-date facilities for repair and new ship construction.

Yes, we are even recognizing it to the extent that we are requesting the return of several hundred vessels which we loaned to Russia during the latter part of the last emergency and which we had conveniently forgotten about until it seemed as though they might be used against us.

We are rehabilitating hundreds of vessels of the Liberty and Victory type which have been laid up in rivers and harbors in all coastal areas. There is some activity in the repair yards because of this work, and it is reflected in the employment of skilled shipbuilding and ship repair mechanics.

The administrative branch of Government and Congress have recognized that the recommissioning of old vessels is not enough to fill our needs. They have recommended and there have been enacted statutes providing for the construction of a number of fast cargo vessels. In addition, large sums of money have been appropriated for future development and expansion of our merchant marine.

It must be recognized that present appropriations are inadequate to restore our Nation to its proper place in relation to other nations of the world engaged in commerce. The day of being second or third or lower in the list of nations of the world, and not first, is gone. We must never again be dependent upon the ships of any other nation or combination of nations to carry our commerce during peacetime or our commerce, troops and other necessities of war during periods when we may be engaged in war. We must be and must remain self-sustaining.

We might examine briefly our status in relation to other nations in both shipbuilding and operation. The National Federation of American Shipping recently made poignant comments on present trends as they affect shipbuilding and ship operation. They emphasized that America's multi-billion-dollar waterfront is showing a remarkably large and steadily increasing number of foreign flags flying from the masts of merchant ships and that American flag merchant ship entrances and clearances are steadily declining in American ports.

The total net registered tonnage of all vessels entering and clearing United States ports in 1950 with commercial cargo was 112,466,000. Only 42.7 percent of this tonnage was merchant ships carrying the stars and stripes. In 1949 the figure was 48.5 percent. In sharp contrast, in 1950, of the 102,775,000 net registered tons of vessels entering and clearing United Kingdom ports with cargo, 65.7 percent were of British registry.

The federation study also showed that while vessel entrances into United States ports with cargo totaled 27,500, vessel clearances with cargo totaled only 16,671, a greater imbalance than that recorded in 1949.

These figures indicate a loss of 6 percent carried in American bottoms from 1949.

That the United States is losing ground in the international race aimed at restoration of the world's merchant passenger vessel fleet to its pre-World War II size is becoming more and more obvious.

In a study of world merchant passenger vessel construction, it must be noted that while the stars and stripes flew over 8 percent of the world's passenger fleet prior to World War II, today it flies over only 5 percent. Further, it may be pointed out that while foreign nations are building or have under contract 97 passenger-carrying vessels of close to 1,000,000 gross tons, the United States is building only 2 passenger ships totaling 71,719 gross tons.

Statistics show that at the beginning of 1951 the world's merchant passenger vessel fleet was 75 percent by number and 70 percent by gross tonnage of its pre-World War II level of 1,500 ships of 12,000,000 gross tons. But it is difficult to reconcile the position of the United States when one considers the far better job being performed by other nations of the world in rebuilding their passenger fleets, as evidenced by the fact that, upon completion of present construction, the United Kingdom will have about 92 percent of her prewar passenger tonnage, the Netherlands will have about 78 percent, and France 76 percent. Among the smaller maritime nations, Argentina will have increased her passenger fleet 10 times over her prewar level.

The United States, after completion of ships under construction, will have only 62 percent of her prewar tonnage, or slightly more, relatively, than Italy, which will soon have over 54 percent of her prewar passenger fleet.

Among all the maritime nations of the world, the United States ranks only fifth in the amount of gross tonnage of passenger vessels being constructed and a poor eleventh in numbers of such ships being built. In contrast the United Kingdom is in first place, followed by France, Italy, and Argentina.

These statements point up the peril with which we are confronted as a result of our failure to keep pace with the other nations of the world in proportion to our standing as the first nation of the world.

It is of interest to note that though at the present there are 23 vessels of 516,064 gross tons in some stage of construction or contracted for in the yards of the United States, 25 vessels of 315,000 gross tons are the recent ones contracted for but not started. In Japan there are 35 seagoing vessels of 240,986 gross tons in some stage of construction.

These comparisons with other nations may bring forth the comment that there is a selfishness predominant which would destroy the merchant marines of other nations and confer the carrying of commerce and the ship construction to the United States. This is a mistaken premise. However, the maritime interests of the United States have not been protected with nearly the same zeal as other facets of our economy have.

We have but to witness the policy being carried out in Germany to see what is happening to our merchant marine.

In April 1949, the Washington agreement, entered into by the military governors of three major nations, provided that up to 100,000 gross tons of tankers, not to exceed 10,700 gross tons each, and 300,000 gross tons of dry cargo ships, none to exceed 7,200 gross tons, be authorized as being adequate for German recovery.

There were many modifications of this program in ensuing months up to April 1951, at which time all restrictions were removed except that the vessels built could not have characteristics which would permit them to be readily convertible for military purposes. At the time of the last agreement, as a result of the amendments from April 1949, the tonnage had catapulted to 650,000 gross tons and will shortly be 800,000 gross tons.

Prior to the last war German merchant ships carried 45 percent of her aggregate overseas commerce. In 1949 her ships carried 19 percent. In 1950 Germany's merchant ships were again carrying 45 percent. In contrast, the United States-flag vessels are currently carrying 35 percent of the United States overseas dry cargo commerce.

This comparison clearly indicates that again foreign nations are progressively increasing their commerce-carrying shipbuilding facilities, while the United States is failing to keep pace.

Further consideration of foreign nations' shipbuilding and operating expansion may well provoke conjecture in connection with the Russian merchant marine. The building of ships for the Soviet Union by nations receiving ECA assistance may well be challenged.

Under trade agreements, nations receiving ECA funds are building freighters, tankers, large deep-sea fishing boats and other vessels to augment the Soviet merchant fleet.

None can object to the expansion of the commercial strength of the Soviet. Neither can we, with good conscience, oppose, except in a competitive way, increased production in the shipyards of Holland, Belgium, Italy, France or any other nation. However, we should voice loud objections if the activities of the shipyards of the above countries are being financed, in whole or in part, by money from the Treasury of the United States.

We question that the Congress of the United States intended to give aid to the shipbuilding and operating companies of foreign countries while, at the same time, it is denying assistance to expand its own shipbuilding and operating facilities.

Neither did Congress intend to build a merchant fleet, far superior to that of other nations, for a country whose objectives are so contrary to those of our own that the differences may be resolved only by armed conflict.

It is imperative that the United States do something more than deplore the status among nations of our merchant marine. We are spending billions of dollars for national defense, including the development of the most highly technical machines of war, much of which development can be and will be used for commercial purposes, and the results of which will become part of our expanding economy during peacetime. This is true of all technical advances which are being made throughout the country with the exception of the Navy, which is solely an agency of defense.

The same cannot be said of our merchant marine. During this period we should be developing fast commercial vessels capable of being quickly converted into troop carriers and being equipped with the latest modern protective devices. These vessels should further be of such type as to enter most harbors, with quick loading and unloading facilities, and of fast turn-around ability. They should be built in such numbers as to replace the obsolete vessels built during the Second World War, which in many instances were built with the expectation that they would pay for themselves if they were successful in making one or two trips.

The day of the convoy is gone. We cannot afford to risk either our troops or our commerce in slow and antiquated vessels. The choice is not ours but is being forced upon us by the rapid development on the part of foreign nations of ever faster and faster commercial and war vessels.

It has been contended that private operators and builders cannot hope, from their own resources, to build and operate these vessels at a profit without some inducement from the Government. This being true, it is the obligation and duty of the Government to aid these operators through subsidies, grants, or other privileges which will enable them to compete on an equal basis with foreign ship operating and shipbuilding companies. Every other major nation in the world subsidizes its ship operating and shipbuilding companies to a much greater extent than the United States does.

There is another most essential reason why we must keep an ever-expanding merchant marine, and that is manpower. A merchant marine is only as strong as its operating personnel, and we cannot afford to have idle-ship operating forces. Men will no longer remain "on the beach" waiting to be assigned to a vessel when other attractive employment is available. It is essential that jobs be provided for these men, or the cost of training new workers will far exceed the provisions being made for those already trained. This will affect not only the operating personnel but also the shipbuilding and ship-repair mechanic.

The shipbuilding and ship-repair industry at its peak employed in excess of 1,500,000 persons. This was exclusive of those employed in the naval shipyards of the country. Today, on the three coasts and the inland waterways, there are approximately 54,000 employed in this industry. This means that the great bulk of trained shipbuilding workers and ship repairmen have gone into other industries. Should another emergency develop, this is not a sufficient number to serve as a nucleus to train the thousands of additional employees that will be necessary.

The metal trades department has long affirmed that shipbuilding and ship-repair work is essential to keep a reasonable number of skilled mechanics in training and available for ship construction and repair work. Also, these must be an equal distribution of new construction and repair yards on the respective coasts of the Nation. We cannot afford, during any national emergency, to have complete concentration of yards or manpower in any one area.

If the United States is to retain its place as the leading nation of the world, one of its most important assets is a strong merchant marine, adequately manned, reinforced by shipbuilding and ship-repair yards employing skilled shipbuilding and ship-repair mechanics in sufficient numbers to assure us of a merchant fleet commensurate with our standing among the nations of the world.

The Defense Production Act and Wool

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, May 4, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following:

NATIONAL WOOL TRADE ASSOCIATION,
Boston, Mass., May 15, 1951.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
House of Representatives Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We respectfully call to your attention the enclosed editorial published in the Boston Herald of May 15. We heartily endorse this editorial.

Very truly yours,
NATIONAL WOOL TRADE ASSOCIATION,
HUGH MUNRO, President.

WHO BUYS WOOL?

The wool trade is greatly concerned at the moment with a proposed amendment to the Defense Production Act which may or may not have anything to do with wool.

Under the act as adopted last year, the Government is empowered to purchase certain critical materials abroad and resell them to private businessmen here, but it is specifically debarred from acquiring agricultural products in this way. The new amendment, proposed, along with many others, by the President last month, would simply remove the agricultural restriction.

The wool men, who are already bruised and buffeted by the Government's mishandling of their problems since the outbreak of the Korean crisis, suspect a new move by the Fair Deal planners to get into the wool act, and they want no part of it.

We heartily sympathize with this attitude. Whatever the actual purpose of the proposed amendment, it should definitely not be used as a means for putting Uncle Sam in the wool business. The situation doesn't call for such drastic measures now and bulk purchasing by Government wouldn't recommend itself as a method even if the emergency were worse than it is.

The system of Government purchase has been tried before, but even where elaborate safeguards have been set up (as in Britain during the war) it has tended to be inflexible and unsatisfactory. Government buyers, no matter how conscientious, simply can't take over the function of private wool men with lifetimes of experience. When you are dealing with some 3,000 different types of wool and market conditions changing by the day and hour, you are either an expert or you are not good enough.

If Congress is wise, it will make certain either that existing safeguards stay in the Defense Act or that new ones, fully covering wool, are added.

The Late Leonce R. Legendre

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to the House of the sad passing of a great soldier and patriot and one who has given untold help to his comrades, especially the disabled of all the wars.

Leonce R. Legendre, 56, widely known assistant national adjutant of the American Legion, is dead of a heart attack here.

The two-war veteran who held a series of national American Legion positions over a period of 16 years, was stricken as he left his office at 5:30 p. m., May 15. Death occurred 5 minutes later in Farragut Park, one block from the new K Street American Legion branch headquarters. Watson B. Miller, American Legion official, was present.

Funeral services will be conducted Friday morning at the Church of the Annunciation with burial at Arlington National Cemetery. National Commander Erle Cocke, Jr., will lead American Legion representatives and an Army unit from nearby Fort Myer in according full military honors at the graveside.

A native of Thibodeaux, La., and a 30-year member of the American Legion, Legendre was in charge of the organization's national office in Washington from July 1, 1946. He came to the Nation's Capital as chief of contact in that office in 1938, following 6 years as American Legion national field secretary serving Southeastern States. For a brief time in 1940 he was department adjutant of the Louisiana American Legion.

Legendre also was chairman, from 1926 to 1932, of the Veterans' Administration claims rating board for the State of Louisiana.

A lieutenant of infantry with 28 months of service in World War I, he returned to active military duty in 1942. He held the rank of lieutenant colonel, as executive officer of the military district of Washington, in charge of the Capital's civilian-defense program. His active military service terminated in September 1946.

Surviving are his wife, Helen Murphy Legendre, of 4916 Westway Drive, Chevy Chase, Md., and a sister and two brothers, all residents of New Orleans, La.

Amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN A. McGUIRE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend my remarks, I include in the RECORD a very important statement by Mr. G. E. Leighty, chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association. Mr. Leighty testified before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on May 14 in support of H. R. 3669, a bill to amend the Railroad Retirement Act.

I am supporting H. R. 3669 and in my opinion the merit of that bill is very clearly set forth in Mr. Leighty's statement. The advice of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, for whom Mr. Leighty is spokesman, has always proven to be sound in matters of railroad retirement. All members of the House would be well advised to carefully study Mr. Leighty's presentation in order that they be completely advised in the field of railroad retirement.

Mr. Leighty's statement follows:

STATEMENT OF G. E. LEIGHTY BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE WITH RESPECT TO AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT

My name is G. E. Leighty. I am president of the Order of Railroad Telegraphers and chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association. I appear here as spokesman for the association.

The Railway Labor Executives' Association is an association composed of the chief executives of 18 standard railway labor organizations and the president of the Railway Employees' Department, A. F. of L., which is itself an association of the 7 shop craft organizations who are all individually represented in the association through their chief executives. The organizations represented are the following: Switchmen's Union of North America; the order of Railroad Telegraphers; American Train Dispatchers' Association; Railway Employes' Department, A. F. of L.; International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, and Helpers of America; International Association of Machinists; International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths, Drop Forgers, and Helpers; Sheet Metal Workers' International Association; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Brotherhood Railway Carmen of America; International Brotherhood of Firemen and Oilers; Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees; Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employes; Brotherhood of Railroad Signalmen of America; National Organization Masters, Mates, and Pilots of America; National Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association; International Longshoremen's Association; Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union; Railroad Yardmasters of America.

The employees represented by organizations whose chief executives compose the association constitute approximately three-fourths of all the railroad employees.

The association has, and has had for some years, a standing committee whose function it is to watch over the functioning of the railroad retirement system and particularly to develop and recommend amendatory legislation whenever such legislation appears desirable. The committee is under the chairmanship of Mr. George M. Harrison, grand president of the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees. In addition to Mr. Harrison, the committee includes Mr. T. C. Carroll, president, Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employes; Mr. Michael Fox, president, Railway Employes' Department, A. F. of L.; Mr. J. M. Burns, vice president, Sheet Metal Workers' International Association; Mr. William J. Van Buren, secretary-treasurer, National Organization Masters, Mates, and Pilots of America; and myself.

Over a year ago this committee concluded that the need for amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act was imminent. However, it has not been possible to bring to completion an integrated program of amendments until quite recently, partly because the problems to be met were difficult and it took much time and study to find the proper solutions and partly because, insofar as the problems are related to amendments recently made to the Social Security Act, any solutions had to be tentative until after those amendments were enacted and their final content was known.

The bill, H. R. 3669, which is before this committee, embodies the program of amendments which the Railway Labor Executives' Association is sponsoring as the result of the investigation and study that I have described. The bill was prepared by our counsel under the direction of the association, with the assistance of members of the staff of the Railroad Retirement Board and in consultation with interested Members of Congress. Its terms are identical to S. 1347 which has been introduced in the Senate by Senator MURRAY, of Montana, on behalf of himself and 11 other Senators. Full hearings on the bill have been held before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

I shall not undertake to present to you a detailed analysis of the bill itself. Our counsel, Mr. Lester P. Schoene, who will follow me as the next witness on behalf of the association, will do that. It is my purpose to place before you a statement of the problems with which we have been wrestling and a general description of the legislative changes which we believe to be necessary to solve these problems. The bill embodies these proposed solutions.

In the forefront of the problems with which we are confronted is the urgent necessity for increasing the amount of the monthly benefit payments both to retired employees and to the survivors of deceased employees. You as well as we are, of course, thoroughly aware of the tremendous increase that has occurred in the cost of living since 1937 when the railroad-retirement system was enacted. When the system was established its benefit provisions were set to bear a reasonable relationship to the cost of living as it then was and to the wage income that employees were accustomed to receiving prior to their retirement. As a result of the increase in living costs and to provide some improvement in the living standards of wage earners, wage rates generally, and the wages of railroad employees, have increased very substantially since 1937. As a consequence relationships of retirement income to living costs and wage rates existing in 1937 have no validity whatever today.

Some measure of relief, so far as retirement benefits are concerned, was attained in 1948 when the act was amended to increase these benefits by 20 percent. That increase, however, was inadequate at the time to reestablish the 1937 relationships and, as you know, both living costs and wages have again increased substantially since that time. So far as survivor benefits are concerned, there has been no increase since the provisions for paying survivor benefits were enacted in 1946. The level of those benefits as of that time was determined not with reference to living-cost requirements or wage rates but rather with reference to the survivor benefits paid under the Social Security Act. The level of those benefits was established in 1939 and was pitifully low even as of that time. Although the level of survivor benefits set in the Railroad Retirement Act was on the average about 25 percent higher than those provided in the Social Security Act, to give some slight recognition to the much higher tax rates paid by railroad employees, nevertheless the level of survivor benefits as so established in 1946 was less adequate to meet living-costs requirements as they then stood than the social-security benefits were when they were established in 1939. There has been no increase in the amounts payable to survivors since they were first established and the maximum benefit a survivor can now draw is approximately $41 a month.

That the amount of benefit payments should be increased no one can doubt. If we felt free to increase benefits to the levels warranted by the increase in the cost of living we would have to recommend much greater increases than those proposed in the bill. Necessarily, however, in a prudently financed system the extent to which benefits can be increased is limited by the prospective revenues coming into the system. Railroad employees feel very strongly that the tax rates now in effect for the support of the Railroad Retirement system should not be increased. They are now paying 6 percent on their compensation up to $300 per month and will pay 6¼ percent beginning next year. Employees in other industries covered by the Social Security Act until recently paid only 1 percent, are paying only 1½ percent now and the maximum they are scheduled to pay is 3¼ percent many years in the future. It is apparent from these comparisons that any increase in the present rates would make the discrepancy intolerable.

At the same time railroad employees feel equally strongly that the financing of the railroad retirement system must be maintained on a sound basis. Improvements in benefits are therefore limited to such improvements as can prudently be made within the limits of the present financing and such new financing as can be provided without increasing the tax rates.

The problems with which we are confronted are further complicated by the very far-reaching amendments that were made last year in the Social Security Act. The railroad retirement system grew out of and was specifically designed to meet the needs of the railroad industry independently of what might be provided to employees in other industries through the general social security system. It is important to the industry that the railroad retirement system continue on this independent basis to serve the needs of that industry. However, this does not mean that the existence of the Social Security system can be ignored. Benefits under that system have now reached such levels that comparisons unfavorable to the Railroad Retirement system cannot be avoided. At the present time all survivor benefits under the Social Security Act and many retirement benefits exceed the benefits that would be paid for equivalent service under the railroad retirement system notwithstanding the much higher contribution that railroad employees make. We have come to the conclusion that although, it is not necessary that the Railroad Retirement Act provide benefits in all cases exceeding those provided under the Social Security Act, we cannot justify the continuance of a condition in which an individual in railroad service, paying the higher tax rate, derives less benefit from that service than he would if it were covered by the Social Security Act.

The provisions of the Social Security Act give rise also to other problems. The Social Security Act does not in express terms give credit for service rendered prior to 1937, as the Railroad Retirement Act does. However, the formula used in computing benefits is so weighted in favor of those who retire in the early years as in effect to give recognition to prior service. If the same individuals have sufficient service covered by the Social Security Act to qualify for benefits under that act and also receive a railroad retirement annuity based on prior service, they are in effect getting double credit for service with respect to which no tax was paid. Such generosity cannot be justified in comparison with the benefits it is possible to provide to those who make their careers in the railroad industry or in some other industry covered by the Social Security Act.

The railroad retirement system was designed and has always been thought of as being a system covering career employees in the industry. When the system was formulated it was believed that the phrase "once a railroader always a railroader" had practically universal validity. Up to that time there were not available collected individual employment records from which it could be determined to what extent people whose major employment is elsewhere work casually in the railroad industry. Through the maintenance of the individual records that the Railroad Retirement Act requires, that information has become available, and what it shows is very disturbing. It does show that the basic assumption of career employment is correct with respect to the big solid core of employees working at any particular time. However, it also shows that there is always a substantial fringe of casual employees who do not make railroading their career and who in the aggregate over a period of years outnumber many times over, the career employees. The last Annual Report of the Railroad Retirement Board shows, for example, that 64 percent of the employees in service in 1948 had worked every year after they entered service and half of that group had entered service before 1937. On the other hand, out of the total number of new employees who entered service in 1938, only 13 percent were working in the industry in 1948. The aggregate result of this condition to date is shown by the fact that there are now approximately 8,000,000 individuals who have had some creditable service under the Railroad Retirement Act, although the number employed at the present time averages only 1,500,000 to 1,600,000.

I have already stated the conclusion that we cannot justify paying an individual less benefits for his railroad service than he would be paid for such service if it were covered by the general Social Security Act. However, the Railroad Retirement system cannot serve its primary function of meeting the requirements of the career employees, and also undertake to match social-security benefits for those short-term employees who work casually in the industry from time to time. Furthermore, since these short-term employees are virtually certain to have their major employment under the Social Security Act they are most likely to qualify for benefits under that act. If the Railroad Retirement system were to undertake to pay for such service independently of the employment covered by the Social Security Act there would be an unwarranted duplication of benefits and an unwarranted expense to the railroad-retirement account for the payment of benefits to individuals whose needs the System was not primarily designed to serve.

I have so far discussed the most serious and most difficult of the problems with which we are confronted. I should now like to tell you in a general way how the bill we are asking you to enact meets these problems together with a number of others that I shall develop in the course of the discussion. The bill contains a number of provisions which increase the amount of benefits payable. It provides for increasing retirement annuities by an average of 13.8 percent. The basic formula in the present law for computing annuities requires multiplying certain percentages of the average monthly compensation by the number of years of service. Those percentages of average monthly compensation under the present law are 2.4 percent of the first $50, 1.8 percent of the next $100, and 1.2 percent of the next $150. The bill would change these percentages to 2.8 percent, 2 percent, and 1.4 percent, respectively. The pensioners who were taken over from the railroad rolls at the beginning of the System and are receiving relatively smaller benefits than annuitants would have their pensions increased by a flat 15 percent.

From the changes just described all annuitants will receive a moderate but still substantial increase in benefits. The maximum annuity now payable would be based on an average monthly compensation of $300 per month with 30 years of service and comes to $144. Under the revised formula that would be increased to $165. Of course most employees do not get the maximum and the average is far under the maximum. The average now being paid is approximately $84 and that could be expected to increase under the bill to about $95. Such an amount appears particularly inadequate for an individual who has a wife to support. The Social Security Act has long recognized the greater need of such individuals. We believe the time has come when we should do likewise. The bill consequently provides that when a railroad employee has retired and is age 65 or over and has a spouse who is also age 65 or over the spouse shall be entitled to an annuity equal to one-half of the employee's annuity but with a maximum of $50. We believe that the combination of an increase for all annuitants with provision for the spouse's annuity makes a well-balanced program of recognizing the needs of all annuitants while at the same time recognizing the greater need of the man and wife.

With respect to survivor benefits the method of computation is liberalized and simplified. The new formula would allow 40 percent of the first $100 of average monthly remuneration plus 10 percent of the creditable remuneration over $100. This would provide a survivor benefit of $60 if the average monthly remuneration is $300, the maximum it is now possible to have. The amount so computed is equal to what the benefit would be under the amended Social Security Act on the same remuneration. However, in order to give some recognition to the higher tax rate paid by railroad employees our bill provides that there shall be added to the amount so computed $1 for each year of service on which taxes were paid.

In addition to these liberalized provisions for retirement and survivor benefits, the bill would establish an over-all minimum applicable both to retirement and survivor benefits that in no case shall the benefits paid be less than the benefit or additional benefit that would have been derived from the railroad employment if it had been covered by the Social Security Act. The Railroad Retirement Act as enacted in 1937 carried a similar minimum referring to the original Social Security Act, but that provision became inapplicable when the Social Security Act was completely revised in 1939. Until the last revision of the Social Security Act the level of social security benefits was so low that a restoration of such a minimum was not a matter of great importance. Social-security benefits, now, however, are of such a level as to make it important again to guarantee that no employee shall sacrifice benefits by working in the railroad industry.

The problem presented by the casual employees is met by introducing a 10-year minimum service requirement as a condition of eligibility for either retirement or survivor benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act. Provision is made that employees who at retirement or death have less than 10 years of service under the Railroad Retirement Act shall have their railroad service credited under the Social Security Act. They will thus receive under that act benefits based on a combination of their railroad and nonrailroad service, thus avoiding both dupilcation of benefits and a loss of benefits through having been in railroad service. In addition, such employees would continue to be subject to the guaranty now provided that the benefits derived from the railroad service shall not be less than the amount contributed in taxes plus an allowance in lieu of interest. By adjustments between the railroad retirement account and the old age and survivors' insurance trust fund, which I shall refer to more in detail later, the social security system is compensated for crediting this railroad service to the same extent as thought social security taxes had been collected on such employment.

Although the problems to be met which I I have already discussed are the most serious and difficult, there are other troublesome problems with which we are confronted but to which the solution is more readily apparent. In 1937, the maximum of compensation that is creditable and taxable was set at $300. At that time relatively few employees were making over $300 per month. The ceiling, therefore, did not result in reducing benefits in any large proportion of the cases and did not serve substantially to reduce the tax income. Under present wage scales, however, its effect in both these respects has become much greater. We are proposing, therefore, that beginning with compensation paid after this year the maximum creditable and taxable compensation should be increased to $400 per month. Since there is no prior service obligation in connection with this change and since the annuity factor applied to this additional $100 of compensation in computing the annuity is the smallest of the three percentages this change will result in a net gain to the railroad retirement account.

I have heretofore referred to the fact that the weighting of the social-security benefit formula in effect allows credit for service rendered before 1937. The Railroad Retirement Act expressly recognized such service for persons who held an employment relationship to the industry at the time the 1935 act was enacted. In order to avoid duplicate credit for service on which no taxes have been paid to either system the bill provides that individuals who are entitled to retirement benefits under the Social Security Act shall not be credited with prior service under the Railroad Retirement Act, with the qualification, however, that the resulting reduction in the annuity shall not be greater than the benefit to which the individual is entitled under the Social Security Act.

Under the present law an individual who continues in service after age 65 pays the same taxes on the compensation he then earns as other employees pay, but he receives no credit for that service or compensation in the computation of his annuity. At the time this provision was written it was considered a desirable inducement for the older employees to retire so as to help relieve the unemployment problem. During the last war, however, our problem changed from one of unemployment to one of a manpower shortage and that condition continues. That condition results in pressure on retired employees to reenter service and on employees eligible for retirement to continue in service. When such individuals have not accumulated 30 years of service at age 65 it appears to be an unwarranted discrimination against them not to allow them credit for such service up to the 30-year maximum which applies when prior service is used. The bill therefore proposes that in future awards service rendered after age 65 be credited in the same manner as service rendered prior to that time, retaining, of course, the 30-year maximum where prior service is used.

Prior to the 1946 amendments the Railroad Retirement Act made no provision for survivor benefits as such. However, the act did afford an employee the option, within certain limitations, to take a reduced annuity during his lifetime so as to provide a survivor annuity for his spouse if she survived him, the combined amounts being computed to have a value equivalent to the single life annuity to which the employee was entitled. With the introduction of survivor benefits the authority to make such elections was discontinued but a few such elections are still in effect by reason of action taken prior to 1946. In such cases if the spouse predeceases the employee the employee cannot understand why he must continue to take a reduced annuity even though it is an established fact that no survivor annuity will ever be paid. He feels that by taking the reduction during the period that there was any chance that a survivor annuity would be paid he has paid for the chance that did not materialize. This situation gives rise to bitter complaint that is all out of proportion to the savings that accrue to the Railroad Retirement Account through continuing the reduction after the death of the spouse. The bill therefore proposes that in such cases annuities accruing after the death of the spouse should be in the same amount that would have been payable if no election had been made.

At the present time the only restriction upon retired employees reentering employment is that the annuity is not paid for any month in which they work for a railroad employer or for the last person by whom they were employed before the annuity began to accrue. Under employment conditions existing in 1937 such a provision was deemed sufficient to assure that individuals who applied for annuities at a time when they were eligible to receive them genuinely meant to retire and not simply draw annuities to supplement wage payments. Retirement annuities are meant to support people who have retired and it is an abuse of the system to use them merely to supplement wage income. Under present employment conditions, such abuses can readily occur. We are consequently proposing the introduction, in addition to the existing restrictions, of a work clause like that in the Social Security Act, namely, that the annuity will not be paid in any month in which $50 or more is earned in wages or self-employment covered by the Social Security Act.

I think I have now covered the major subjects dealt with in the bill except the matter of financing. There are a number of changes in detail which I have not discussed but which will be covered in Mr. Schoene's testimony. I stated earlier that the available solutions to our problems were limited by the requirements of prudent financing without increasing the tax rates. We meet that limitation in a variety of ways. In the last actuarial valuation the level of future taxable payrolls was estimated as equal to an average of $4,600,000,000 per year. In making those estimates no account was taken of future increases in wage rates and substantial increases have already occurred. Under present conditions, it is reasonable, and in fact I think very conservative, to estimate the future level payroll at $5,200,000,000, particularly in view of the raising of the maximum creditable and taxable compensation from $300 per month to $400. This revision of payroll estimates has two important consequences with respect to financing. I have already pointed out that the raising of the taxable ceiling in itself results in a net gain. In addition, the cost of benefits based on prior service results in a smaller percentage charge on the payroll when it is spread over a larger taxable payroll.

The elimination of prior service credits for individuals who are entitled to benefits under the Social Security Act also will result in savings to the account. Similarly the more restrictive work clause will result in savings either through the postponement of retirement or through nonpayment of annuities. Likewise savings will result from the introduction of the 10-year minimum-service requirement. The bill contemplates that in the adjustments that will be made between the railroad retirement account and the old-age and survivors insurance trust fund the standard to be applied will be that the old-age and survivors insurance trust fund shall be placed in the same position in which it would be if railroad employment were covered by the general social-security system. Since the railroad population is a relatively higher cost segment of the working population than the working population as a whole, the separate maintenance of the railroad-retirement system relieves the general social-security system of obligations more than commensurate with the tax income that would be derived from the collection of social-security taxes on railroad service. It is contemplated that in the adjustments to be made between the two funds the railroad retirement account will be given due credit for what it thus contributes to the maintenance of old-age and survivors protection of the whole working population.

The actuarial experts of the Railroad Retirement Board have made an estimate, in terms of level percentage of payroll, of the cost of the railroad-retirement system as it would be amended by H. R. 3669. That estimate is included in the Board's report to this committee. In making that estimate, account was taken of both the increased benefits and the savings provided by the bill. The experts estimate that the cost is approximately 14 percent of payroll. The tax rate, beginning next year, yields 12½ percent of payroll. The difference between the tax rate and the estimated level cost is, therefore, only about 1½ percent. Taking into account the fact that the cost estimate must be based on predictions extending to perpetuity, it is obvious that such an estimate can at best be only an approximation by which to guide one's judgment. Necessarily as experience develops, adjustments in the system will have to be made from time to time. It is our considered judgment that when the tax rate is within a range of as little as 1½ percent of an estimate cost running to perpetuity, prudent financing does not require a change in the tax rate.

We exercised a similar judgment in 1948 when we recommended and Congress adopted amendments increasing retirement benefits by 20 percent. The estimated cost of the system as so amended was a little over 1 percent in excess of the tax rates. Developments since 1948 have already established the validity of the judgment then exercised.

All our experience under the Railroad Retirement Act, since the very beginning, indicates that our experience with the 1948 20-percent increase is not unique or accidental. We have never yet had an actuarial estimate that was not shown by developments in the next few years to be an overstatement of probable costs. The first actuarial valuation of the railroad retirement account, made as of December 31, 1938, but published in 1940, showed an apparent shortage of 3.6 percent of payroll between the established tax rates and the estimated cost. Without any increase in taxes or reduction in benefits, the second actuarial valuation, made as of December 31, 1941, and published in 1943, showed a reduction of this apparent shortage to about 3 percent of pay roll.

In the 1946 amendments there was included an increase in taxes to meet the apparent shortage disclosed by the first two valuations; but the increase provided was not the 3 percent or more indicated by the valuation, but only 1½ percent. The opponents of the bill argued vigorously that the shortage was at least 3 percent. However, when the third valuation was made as of December 31, 1946, the account was shown to be virtually in balance.

By 1948, estimates then made showed that no increase at all would have been necessary in 1946 to cover any shortage. It was because the 1946 increase of 1½ percent was not necessary to cover previously indicated shortages that it was possible in 1948 to make a 20-percent increase in retirement benefits, costing about 2½ percent of payroll by incurring a then apparent shortage of only about 1 percent. But such an apparent shortage was incurred to provide the 20-percent increase with no increase in taxes. It was recognized, of course, that if costs worked out exactly according to the estimates, or worse than the estimates indicated, some adjustment either in benefits or taxes would have to be made. However, it was our judgment and that of Congress that experience would show the apparent shortage to be nonexistent, and when the fourth valuation was made that judgment was vindicated. Current estimates of the cost of the present act come to 12.18 percent, as against a tax rate of 12.5 percent, or apparent overfinancing to the extent of .3 percent.

Just to see what would happen if, contrary to all previous experience, the costs of the act as we propose to amend it were to follow exactly the actuarial estimate of about 14 percent, we have had the Railroad Retirement Board actuaries run a projection of the progress of the Railroad Retirement Account on that assumption. I hand you that projection, and would like to have it incorporated in the record at this point. I offer it not as a prediction of things to come but as an indication of the time in which necessary adjustments can be determined and made if developments are worse than past experience leads us to believe. It indicates that for a period of about 15 years the reserve would continue to increase and would then reach a level of over $5,000,000,000 as against the present $2,100,000,000. Even at the end of 40 years the reserve would still exceed its present size. When we bear in mind the numbers of changes that have occurred in the last 10 years we have no reason to fear our inability to adjust ourselves to conditions as they actually develop. Such a program is practical and realistic. The comfort some people derive from precise mathematical equality between the present tax rate and predictions of cost is the comfort of an illusion.

Of course, we do not want to take chances with the solvency of the railroad retirement account. The bill does not propose to take such chances.

If experience indicates that changes should be made, we will have ample opportunity to make them. Neither we nor the Congress have any intention of going out of business in the foreseeable future.

We have devoted months of investigation and study to all phases of our railroad retirement system, including the innumerable amendments which have been suggested, and the proper financing of our system. We have arrived at certain conclusions as a result of our labors. We believe that we have prepared a well-rounded balanced program that meets all the really serious and difficult problems with which we are confronted. We recognize that many of the employees we represent would like to see a considerable number and variety of other changes in the act. Some of these might have merit if they could be considered in isolation and apart from all the other problems with which we have had to deal. We have given careful consideration to all suggested revisions that have come to us. We have had to choose and select and exercise our best judgment in relation to the total situation. In the exercise of that judgment we have developed the program I have discussed with you and we earnestly and respectfully solicit your cooperation in obtaining its enactment.

Obstacles to Exercise of State Rights

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, May 14, 1951

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a splendid article entitled "States in Strait-Jackets," by Hon. Richard L. Neuberger, a State senator in Oregon, which appeared in the April 1951 issue of the American magazine.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATES IN STRAIT-JACKETS

(By Richard L. Neuberger)

Have the elected officials in your State failed to give you promised improvements? Could be that they're stymied by a horse-and-buggy State charter. Here are some of the fantastic ways our outmoded constitutions can thwart the will of the voters.

Our Oregon Senate Committee on Local Affairs was listening to a delegation of high-school students from Portland telling us how they could not afford to go to college unless a State university was established in their community. The senators were sympathetic. We realized Portland was the only large city in the West without a State university in its environs.

Then from the corner came the dry voice of the committee's legal adviser. "I must remind you gentlemen," he said, "that article XIV, section 3, of our State constitution forbids the founding of any new public institution outside Marion County. Portland is not in Marion County."

This ended the matter. Only a vote of the people of the State could overturn the constitutional clause, and that would be after these particular students had matured beyond their college entrance years. I shall never forget the crestfallen faces of those high-school boys and girls, who had been so eagerly hopeful a short time before.

State government in America today is trussed and bound by a strait-jacket which perils all local sovereignty. This strait-jacket consists of State constitutions so absurdly cluttered with provisions promoted by pressure groups that the men and women under our capitol domes can barely carry out their responsibilities of office. In the vacuum thus created, the Federal Government has spread its heavy domination across the land, reaching into the lives of every individual family.

The Constitution of the United States, which rules the vast breadth of America from coast to coast, contains only 7,500 words. Forty-five States have constitutions longer than this. Indeed, many State constitutions actually triple and quadruple the length of the Constitution which the founding fathers wrote for the whole Nation. Political factions with an ax to grind have discovered that they can by-pass governors and legislatures if they put their pet theories, not on the statute books, but into the very heart of the State constitution.

As a member of the State Senate of Oregon, I have seen vividly how responsibile government can be thwarted by a constitution packed with clauses put there by selfish local interests.

Sometimes executives and judges become exasperated, and the express provisions of a constitution are disobeyed. This sentence is in Oregon's constitution: "The governor shall receive an annual salary of $1,500." At 1951 prices this would barely keep a canary alive, much less a governor. So, in spite of the clear constitutional language to the contrary, Oregon has been paying its chief executive $10,000.

Although the United States Constitution leaves the Federal Government free to pay its officials adequate salaries, State constitutions have not followed this example. They impose heavy shackles on pay scales. These restrictions drive able men out of State governments, with the result that States' rights are further endangered.

Maryland's Constitution, which is three times as long as the national charter, limits the governor to an annual salary of $4,500, which is less than he might earn clerking in a store. The governor of Alabama gets a constitutional salary of $6,000, and that of Oklahoma $6,500. For a time the State of Washington circumvented a pay limitation of $6,000 by bestowing on the governor a living allowance three times the size of his salary.

In the case of State legislators, the pay manacles clamped on by constitutions are even more ridiculous. New Hampshire's senators and representatives receive constitutional wages which amount to $3 a day. Those of Rhode Island are paid a token of $5.

These constitutional pittances, set by ironclad mandates stemming from an era when beefsteak retailed for 15 cents a pound, provide a field day for lobbyists, who need pick up only a few meal checks to win the gratitude of honest but hard-pressed legislators.

Service in State government was once the most direct route to the White House. Five of the past eight Presidents journeyed directly from gubernatorial chairs to a place on the national ticket of their parties—McKinley, Theodore Roosevelt, Wilson, Coolidge, and Franklin D. Roosevelt. Yet despite these historic examples, the trend today is for outstanding men to shake the dry dust of State government from their feet in a quest for a niche in the United States Senate.

Twenty-five present Senators once were governors of their States. Not one former Senator has sought a governor's office. The ex-governors now in Senate service include such famous names as BYRD, of Virginia; AIKEN, of Vermont; BRICKER, of Ohio; DUFF, of Pennsylvania; and LEHMAN, of New York.

"Too many frustrations around here," commented a vigorous Governor of Idaho as he filed for a congressional post in distant Washington, D. C. "Whenever some responsibility faces the State, an outdated constitution prevents us from handling it in the right way."

Numerous State constitutions contain clauses which would be fantastic as mere laws. West Virginia's constitution makes it illegal for an official of a railroad to sit in the legislature. Dating from the rule of George III, the New Hampshire Constitution set the accounts of the State in shillings and pence. The Constitution of Texas calls for five times as many courts and judges as serve the infinitely larger population of Great Britain. California's Constitution goes into endless detail regarding such matters as the length of wrestling matches and the breeding of crustaceans and mollusks.

Occasionally these clogged constitutions are merely funny. But concerted attempts to wedge special privilege into the basic charter of a great State can be sinister and dangerous.

Last November it took the vigorous efforts of California's churches, newspapers, and civic organizations to defeat a constitutional amendment which would have legalized gambling in the most audacious fashion ever proposed in this country. Written right into the amendment were the names of the five individuals who would supervise and license race tracks and slot machines in California. Had the amendment passed, these men would have become the czars of gambling in our second largest State, and the constitution would have protected them from being overruled or held in check even by Gov. Earl Warren himself.

California has had sorry experience with the writing of personal names into its State constitution. In 1948 the electorate adopted an amendment installing a redheaded woman with blue eyes and freckles named Myrtle Williams as director of social welfare at a beginning salary of $12,000. To make sure no other Myrtle Williams would mistakenly be honored, the constitution gave her exact address: 420 Avondale Street, in Monterey Park.

Because Mrs. Williams' name was rooted in the basic charter of the State, neither the governor nor the assembly at Sacramento had full control over a branch of the California government which supervises the spending of nearly $300,000,000 a year. Constitutional mandates cannot be touched or modified by the highest State officials. A costly special election finally separated Myrtle Williams from her job.

Since its adoption in 1789, the United States Constitution has been amended only 22 times. Yet some State constitutions have been amended hundreds of times, and each amendment is beyond the reach of the governor and legislature. They cannot cross a "t" or dot an "i." "Mine not to question why," said the governor of a western State, as he surveyed a constitution in which one section was longer than the entire Constitution of the United States.

Arizona entered the Union as late as 1912, but 45 amendments have already been plastered onto its constitution. California's bristles with patches, 312 of them. The constitution of Texas has been amended 104 times.

Article XIX of the 63,000-word Louisiana Constitution provides: "August 30, the birthday of Hon. Huey P. Long, now deceased, late Governor of Louisiana, shall be and forever remain a legal holiday in this State."

Not even George Washington's birthday is thus sanctified by constitutional fiat in Louisiana.

Pressure groups have discovered that it is no harder in some States to pass a constitutional amendment than a mere law. This may be why the South Carolina Constitution is poulticed with 192 amendments and that of Oregon with 113. The voter, confronting a ballot the size of a hearthrug, does not notice whether he is enacting a statute which the legislature can change or a constitutional clause which will clutch State government in an immovable vise.

Pension clubs, riding a temporary surge of popular enthusiasm, forced into the Colorado State Constitution a clause setting aside 85 percent of collections from State excise taxes for old-age assistance. A disproportionate share of the Colorado revenue dollar now goes to pensions, but neither the Government nor the legislature can do anything about it. They are bound by their oaths of office to follow the constitution to the letter.

Other State functions have been starved while old-age groups, protected by the constitution, take the first big bite out of the Colorado treasury.

"We know it's wrong," explained a senator at Denver, "but we in the legislature are helpless. This kind of special-interest subsidy has no place in the constitution."

Although ore-rich Colorado ranks first nationally in grants of old-age assistance, it is twenty-third in aid to needy children, twenty-third in general relief for hungry families, and a low thirtieth in average salaries for school teachers. The constitutional bounty enjoyed by pensioners is at the expense of education, for Colorado teachers languish near the botton of all the States of the far West in their rate of pay.

In fact, the highest elective officials of the State of Colorado have comparatively scant authority over their own departments. This is because bureaucrats in the domed capitol below Pikes Peak succeeded in adding to the State constitution a clause which makes them accountable only to an appointed civil-service commission.

The result has been to thwart the will of the people as expressed at the polls. A candidate for governor or secretary of state may be triumphantly elected in Colorado because of popular indignation over a certain public policy, yet he will find himself lacking power to remove the department head responsible for that policy. The Denver Post calls this constitutional autocracy. Even now the Post blames the ironclad Colorado Constitution for preventing Republican Gov. Dan Thornton, a young rancher newly elected in November of 1950, from carrying out pledged reforms in the blundering management of certain State institutions.

Some constitutional provisions actually force reckless and irresponsible government on a State. The Governor of Tennessee is forbidden to sign or veto a bill after the legislature adjourns. Bills automatically die when the assembly goes home. In the closing days of a session they flutter into the Governor's office like snowflakes. There are not enough hours around the clock for the Governor and his staff to read all the measures which he must sign into laws affecting 3,292,000 people. More than one Governor of Tennessee has admitted approving an important bill he had no chance to study or analyze.

"A State constitution that may have been excellent in 1870 is certainly not necessarily excellent in 1950," observes Charles McD. Puckette, general manager of the Chattanooga Times.

Changing conditions create new problems, but many State constitutions seem immobile. The charter of Washington forbids the use of public funds for religious exercises. Inasmuch as public funds heat classrooms and pay teachers, this provision has been held to bar even the reading of the Bible in the common schools of the State. Minnesota cannot use voting machines, because the constitution compels all elections to be "by ballot," although this clause was written before voting machines were ever invented.

I remember sitting at my desk in Oregon's senate, listening to legislators representing less than one-third of the people as they voted down machinery for providing needed school levies in our State's only large city. Under a constitution written before Oregon had one paved sidewalk or electric-light bulb, the city had no authority to govern itself.

In wide-open New Orleans a young reform mayor, deLesseps (Chep) Morrison, tried to clean up the city. He made some progress, but Louisiana's State constitution, longer than most detective novels and just as fanciful, gave the legislature dominated by the Long machine authority to take over the municipal courts and thus balk Mayor Morrison with restraining orders. The New Orleans Bureau of Governmental Research claimed the city was the victim of "botched-up State constitutional provisions."

Is there no hope? Must government in our States continue to decline in prestige and in the quality of its personnel? Must cities dawdle along without real power to provide services for an ever-increasing number of residents?

New Jersey has shown there is hope, plenty of it. In 1942 New Jersey's energetic Governor, Charles Edison, a son of the great inventor, told the people that "State government is the most antiquated, incompetent part of our whole American system."

Edison asked the voters of New Jersey: "Why don't we change our State constitution to make State government conform to the facts of urban life in the twentieth century?"

Edison had found it was impossible for the Governor to administer the vast government he was supposed to head. There were 92 separate State departments, many not responsible to the executive. Some of these officials reported directly to the legislature. They never went near the Governor, who was kept in the dark concerning their budgets and programs. In addition, the legislature was in a constant political dither, for the New Jersey constitution of 1844 compelled the 60 assembly members to run for election every year. On top of all this, the State's highest tribunal, the court of errors and appeals, was composed of 16 judges, making it the largest appellate court in the world.

"Justice by mob," wrote one New Jersey newspaper.

In 1944 the voters turned down a new constitution drafted by some of the State's most eminent leaders. The margin of rejection was 126,521 votes. Mayor Frank (I am the law) Hague, of Jersey City, played a decisive part in the defeat of the new charter. Hague was satisfied with the status quo which prevailed under the constitution of a century before. He got help from some farm and labor spokesmen, who feared their organizations might lose certain advantages if State government were made more robust and responsible.

But Edison kept hammering away at the fact that except for the bill of rights, there is hardly a part of the present State constitution that is not grievously frayed, ripped, or misshapen.

A Democrat, Edison was joined in support of a new constitution by an ex-Republican governor, Walter E. Edge. Taxpayers' groups and the League of Women Voters insisted that economy, like charity, should begin at home. If New Jersey people wanted to save money on local taxes, they should adopt a constitution which would make efficient government possible.

A new governor entered the capitol at Trenton, Alfred E. Driscoll, and carried on the crusade for a State charter that would work. The movement gathered force like water surging through a penstock. Hague's baleful influence was waning. On January 1, 1948, a streamlined State constitution began to govern the affairs of New Jersey's people. They had enacted it at the polls by an overwhelming margin of 470,828 votes.

One of the most important innovations in the modern New Jersey constitution gives the Governor power to appoint the secretary of state and other officials. This follows the United States Constitution, which allows a President to pick his Cabinet. Under anachronistic constitutions in many States, all officials are elected. While fine in theory, this leads to desperate political Donnybrooks which often paralyze government. One need only imagine what might happen in Washington, D. C., if all heads of major Federal departments were chosen at the polls. Could President Truman plan diplomatic negotiations with Secretary of State JOE MCCARTHY?

Gov. Earl Warren was saddled for years with an elected attorney general whom the Governor openly accused of blocking the program of the California Crime Commission. The State of Washington is run by a Republican governor and a Democratic secretary of state, who probably will be the governor's adversary at the next election. This does not make for amity under the marble dome. For 2 years Oregon had a governor and an elected State treasurer, the fiscal directors of the Commonwealth, who were not on speaking terms.

It is not without significance that 48-year-old Governor Driscoll, who has taken the lead in ending this hydraheaded operation in at least one State, now ranks as a potential nominee of the Republican Party for President or Vice President in 1952. A committee for a new constitution in Ohio has recommended following the New Jersey practice of allowing a governor to commission the heads of all major agencies. In 1952 Ohio's votes will decide at the ballot box on the question of calling a convention to draft a new constitution.

The National Municipal League, which has been crusading for better government since 1894, recently drafted a model constitution that could apply to any of the 48 States. The officials of the league, who include ex-Governor Edison, fresh from the battle front in New Jersey, have reluctantly arrived at the conclusion that the bulk of State constitutions are too far gone to be amended successfully. They advocate a fresh start, warning that most State constitutions are serious obstacles to responsible and effective State and local government.

Tennessee's Constitution, to cite one extreme, has never been amended at all. It still prohibits duelists from holding office and names the bygone farm of long-dead Ben Posey as forming the Grundy County line. At the opposite pole, the California Constitution bristles with 312 amendments, some of which set forth rules for the slaughter of steers or the management of the Escondido Water Co.

California's Legislature, well aware of the documentary colossus which sits like the Old Man of the Sea on the shoulders of State government, has created a constitutional revision committee. Tennessee has gone further. In November of 1949 a proposal for a convention to draft a new State constitution was submitted to the electorate. It carried in the cities but lost in the cautious countryside. The result was a slim rejection—62,483 votes for the constitutional convention, 65,417 in opposition. This was far closer than New Jersey came on the first attempt, and Gov. Gordon Browning's forces are expected to try again in Tennessee, which even has a constitutional provision barring ministers of the Gospel from serving in the legislature.

Agitation for new State constitutions is becoming Nation-wide. In 1945 Missouri and Georgia adopted charters which had been greatly modernized, although neither was as streamlined as experts urged. Leading professors at the University of Texas Law School have made a critical study of a constitution adopted during buckskin days when Dallas was too small even to be included in the census. A Texas editor has thus described his State's constitution, in language which can be understood by Texans: "The harness is too small, the strap drawn too tight, the checkrein pulled up to the last buckle-hole."

Kentucky has just done away with a constitutional salary maximum of $5,000, which prevented the employment of outstanding educators and scientists. Florida, Minnesota, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, South Carolina, Mississippi, and Washington are among other States in which efforts continue to knock off the constitutional handcuffs. Oregon at last has erased a clause, dating from the frontier prejudices of the gold-rush era, which prevented people of Chinese ancestry from owning land or working a mining claim.

But in most States the constitutional strait-jacket remains. If the laces are fraying, it is because voters are demanding that the government closest to them live up to its responsibilities in the atomic age. States' rights will survive in America only if State governments are free to exercise those rights.

World Federal Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, during an audience with the delegates to the fourth congress of the World Movement for World Federal Government, April 6, 1951, at the Vatican, His Holiness, Pope Pius XII, stated the position of the Catholic Church on world federal government, declaring that such government is in conformity with the traditional doctrine of the church, striving for peace among nations and peoples of the world, and in harmony with the principles of social and political life founded and sustained by the church.

Mr. Speaker, I am deeply moved and heartened by the fact that the Pope has expressed this support of the movement aimed at the attainment of a federal world government, to which movement I have been rendering my full cooperation. Faced with the realization of the limitations of a single nation, or even a group of nations, in the field which embraces the entire globe, and during an era in which the basic power of the universe has been harnessed to a bomb containing within itself the seed of potential world destruction, I have maintained, and still do, that only through the cooperation of all nations can we avert the terrors of global conflicts, and effectively strive for world order, justice, and peace. For that reason, I had lent my support to House Concurrent Resolution 64, proposing the development of the United Nations Organization into an efficient body capable of coping with the problems of international aggression, and of maintaining peace.

The discourse of His Holiness, Pope Pius XII, was delivered in the French language, and its English translation, made for the Catholic Mind, which I commend to the attention of this august body, is as follows:

POPE PIUS XII ON WORLD FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

We are very appreciative of the deference you have displayed by this visit and we take pleasure in addressing you members of the World Movement for World Federal Government. We give you cordial greetings of welcome. Our lively interest in the cause of peace in the midst of a humanity so grievously tormented is well known to you. We have given frequent proofs of this interest. That interest, moreover, is inherent in our mission. The maintenance or the reestablishment of peace has always been and increasingly will be the object of our constant solicitude. And if, too often, the results have fallen far short of what our efforts and our acts aimed at, lack of success will never discourage us, so long as peace does not reign in the world. Faithful to the spirit of Christ, the church is striving and working for peace with all her strength; she does this by her precepts and her exhortations, by her incessant activities and by her ceaseless prayers.

THE CHURCH DESIRES PEACE

The church is indeed a power for peace, at least wherever are respected and appreciated at their true value the independence and the mission which the church holds from God, wherever men do not seek to make her the docile servant of a political egoism, wherever she is not treated as an enemy. The church longs for peace, she strives incessantly for peace, and her heart is ever with those who, like her, desire peace and devote themselves to it. She knows also, and this is her duty, how to distinguish between the true and the false friends of peace.

The church desires peace, and therefore applies herself to the promotion of everything which, within the framework of the divine order, both natural and supernatural, contributes to the assurance of peace. Your movement dedicates itself to realizing an effective political organization of the world. Nothing is more in conformity with the traditional doctrine of the church, nor better adapted to her teaching concerning legitimate and illegitimate war, especially in the present circumstances.

It is necessary, therefore, to arrive at an organization of this kind, if for no other reason than to put a stop to the armament race in which, for decades past, the peoples have been ruining themselves and draining their resources to no effect. You are of the opinion that this world political organization, in order to be effective, must be federal in form. If by this you understand that it should not be enmeshed in a mechanical unitarism, again you are in harmony with the principles of social and political life so firmly founded and sustained by the church. Indeed, no organization of the world could live if it were not harmonized with the whole complex of natural relations, with that normal organic order which rules the particular relations between men and men and between different peoples. If it does not do that, then, no matter what its structure may be, it will not be able to stand up and endure.

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES

For this reason we are convinced that your first concern should be to establish solidly or to restore these fundamental principles in every field: national and constitutional; economic and social; cultural and moral.

In the national and constitutional fields at the present time, the life of nations is everywhere disintegrated by the blind worship of numerical strength. The citizen is the voter. But, as such, he is in reality nothing but one of the units, the total of which constitutes a majority or a minority, which the shifting of a few votes or even of a single one would suffice to reverse. As far as parties are concerned, he is of importance only for his voting value. No concern is shown for his position and role in his family and his profession.

In the economic and social fields there can be no natural organic unity among those engaged in production so long as quantitative utilitarianism, the consideration of maximum profitability, is the sole norm which determines the location of plants and the distribution of work, so long as the concept of "class" artificially divides men in society and there no longer exists a spirit of cooperation within occupational groups.

In the cultural and moral fields individual liberty, freed from all bonds and all laws, all objective and social values, is in reality only a death-dealing anarchy, especially in the education of the young.

Unless the universal political organization rests upon these indispensable foundations, there is risk of its being infected with the deadly germs of mechanical unitarism. We would like to invite those to reflect on this point, precisely from the federalist viewpoint, who dream of setting up a world parliament. Otherwise they would subject themselves to the play of those disintegrating forces from which our political and social order has already suffered too much. They would only finish by adding one more legal automaton to the many others which threaten to stifle the nations and to reduce men to the condition of inert instruments.

MORAL FEDERALISM

Just as, therefore, if it is to be true to the spirit of federalism, the future world political organization cannot under any pretext allow itself to be caught up in the play of mechanical unitarism, so also it will enjoy effective authority only insofar as it safeguards and encourages everywhere the life that is proper to a healthy human community, to a society in which all the members cooperate together for the good of the whole of humanity.

What a fund of moral steadfastness, intelligent foresight and capacity for adjustment this world authority will have to possess, qualities more than ever necessary in those critical moments when, in the face of malevolence, people of good will must resort to its authority. After all the proofs of the past and present, would anyone dare to say that the current resources of Government and politics are adequate? In truth, it is impossible to solve the problem of a world political organization without being willing to leave the beaten path from time to time, without appealing to the witness of history, to a sane social philosophy, and even to a certain divining of the creative imagination.

Therein lies a vast field of work, study, and action. You have understood this and looked it squarely in the face. You have the courage to spend yourselves for this cause. We congratulate you. We express to you our wishes for your good success, and with all our heart we pray to God to grant you His light and help in the performance of your task.

Northwest Iowa Leads in Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, it is a rare privilege and an honor for me to represent the Eighth Congressional District of Iowa in the Congress of the United States. The farming area comprising the Eighth Congressional District is one of the richest agricultural areas in the United States today. Personally, I do not know of another area in the country which can present such a flattering picture for so large an area.

Mr. Frank R. Wilson, information assistant to the Director of the Bureau of the Census, has recently prepared a most remarkable statistical picture of this great agricultural area, and the same is included herewith as a part of my remarks.

It should be pointed out that in preparing his statistics, Mr. Wilson included Monona County which no longer is a part of the Eighth Congressional District of Iowa. Aside from the figures relating to Monona County, the 12 remaining counties mentioned comprise the Eighth Congressional District of Iowa.

The statement follows:

The 26,143 farms in 13 Iowa counties of northwest Iowa, of which 12 are in the Eighth Congressional District, have a land and building value of nearly $1,000,000,000, according to computations from the 1950 census. The actual figure on valuations as returned by census enumerators was $979,188,780. Thus, the average value of land and building, per farm, approximated $37,500. Figured in connection with the 4,869,962 acres in these farms, the value was approximately $200 per acre.

Sales of farm products from these 26,143 farms in 1949, the full year prior to the census, amounted to $285,797,318. Thus, the average sales of farm products per farm approximated $11,000 and the sales of farm products per acre were at the rate of nearly $60 per acre.

Of the 26,143 farms, electricity reached 24,222, and facilities for modern living, such as telephones, electric washers, corn pickers, automobiles, and trucks were almost universally available. These 26,143 farms had an average monthly electric bill of $11.73.

This northwest Iowa district contains the champion county of Iowa in land and building values. It is Sioux County whose 2,971 farms were valued at $117,559,499. The second county of highest farm values in Iowa was Kossuth, with over $114,000,000 (with much greater area), and Plymouth County, Iowa, was third with $107,341,785.

Of the $285,797,318 sales of farm products in 1949, Sioux County, with $35,906,956, was second in the State to Pottawattamie with over $37,000,000 of gross farm revenue.

Northwest Iowa farmers market most of their crops through livestock. Of the $285,797,318 gross revenue, $97,123,480 was obtained from the sale of cattle. Hog sales amounted to $92,598,932, and calves brought $5,676,040. Among the 13 counties, Sioux County was first in cattle sales of $14,910,043, but Plymouth County was first in hog sales at $11,649,942. Plymouth County was second in cattle sales, and Cherokee County was third, with Woodbury fourth.

These 13 counties had 1,768 farms whose farm products sales exceeded $25,000, and they had 7,744 farms whose sales ranged from $10,000 to $25,000.

The valuations of land and buildings do not include other equipment on the farms, nor does it include the tremendous volume of livestock. The livestock inventory of the 13 counties included 665,742 cattle and 1,656,319 hogs.

Plymouth County was first with number of cattle with 82,920, and Sioux was second with 78,260. Woodbury had 65,971 and Cherokee 58,249. In numbers of hogs Sioux County was first with 215,450; Plymouth was second with 210,791; Cherokee third with 152,471, and Woodbury fourth with 145,329.

Northwest Iowa farms have high yields and values

St. Lawrence Seaway Inspection Tour

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, once again—for the third time—the advocates of the St. Lawrence seaway are trying to sell their pet project to Members of Congress through a junket to the area that will be packed full of hospitality.

The Mobile (Ala.) Register in an editorial dated May 5, 1951, calls this air junket unjustifiable and states that if it were submitted to a taxpayer referendum it would be ruled out by a landslide:

The editorial follows:

AIR JUNKET BY CONGRESSMEN

Speaking of last straws, or something of the kind, the congressional committee which has been conducting hearings on the proposed white elephant so-called St. Lawrence seaway has decided to travel by air over the route of the hocus-pocus project.

This sight-seeing aerial junket is planned by the House Public Works Committee as a preliminary to voting on the seaway bill.

"After an hour's discussion at a closed committee session," Chairman CHARLES A. BUCKLEY, Democrat, of New York, told reporters no objections were raised to taking the trip," the AP relates.

Congressman BUCKLEY meant, of course, that none of the committee members present at the closed meeting objected to the junket. He could not have meant that none of the Nation's taxpayers objected, because the taxpayers were not consulted.

But our guess is that if this contemplated congressional junket and others similarly unjustifiable were submitted to a taxpayer referendum, they would be ruled out by landsides approximately of the size that may hit some of the Nation's junketing congressmen one of these days.

Statement of Clarence B. Randall to the Stockholders of Inland Steel Co.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under permission previously granted me, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD the following statement by Clarence B. Randall, president of Inland Steel Co., to the annual meeting of the stockholders on April 25, 1951:

It has been a matter of deep satisfaction to the officers of the company, as I am sure it has been to each employee, that Inland is making such a great contribution to America's rearmament program. Since the outbreak of the war in Korea last June we have had the happy experience of breaking production records month after month. Never have so many new records been made and old ones shattered in such a short space of time. Often a new figure set in one month has itself been exceeded in the next following, and many of the all-time highs reached in March, which were so numerous they cannot be listed here, are already in danger as April draws to a close. Fine teamwork in the company's plants inspired by the vigorous and intelligent leadership of our operating officials has brought this about.

Yet side by side with this magnificent day-to-day production achievement this same operating staff has been driving ahead with the largest expansion program in the company's history, not only at our principal plant, but in those of our subsidiary companies as well. What this means in terms of long hours and devotion to the company's interest must be seen at first hand to be appreciated. We have no reserve of able men who have leisure for new duties. Busy men whose energies were already fully taxed in pressing for added production from our present facilities, have had to take on the added responsibilities of planning and carrying forward the expansion program. Nor should I fail to mention those good citizens from our sales and other departments who have voluntarily left their jobs here and their homes to serve temporarily in various defense assignments at Washington. Inland is proud of this immediate and effective response to the challenge of the national need. We know that no such sacrifice can equal that of the fine young men who have left us to enter directly into the defense forces.

Yet when a thoughtful American reflects that what is going on at Inland is going on everywhere throughout the country, he cannot help but wonder where it will all lead. No one doubts for a moment that communism must be stopped; our doubts arise when we ask whether we are doing it in the right way. And today the right answer to that question far transcends in importance to our company any question of internal administration. No amount of foresight and sound planning could bring prosperity to the employees and stockholders of the Inland Co. if the planning for the Nation is bad.

We sadly need a reappraisal of our national aims, a clear statement of our objectives. We need to know what we are trying to do, then how we shall do it, and in what period of time.

Take foreign aid, for example. Obviously there is a limit to what our economy can bear in the way of support to that of the whole world. The job we set out to do in Europe is done, and ahead of time. If now a new obligation is arising for the economic support of European rearmament, we in American business are entitled to know the measure of it. Our military advisers must make known the proposed limits of the program, both as to money and as to time, and then Congress, and Congress only, must make the commitment.

Or take our own rearmament program. We in American business are entitled to a clear picture of its magnitude, and again this should be expressed both in dollars and in time. Is what we are doing well conceived and well executed, or are we going about it hit or miss, with uncoordinated agencies buying too much and asking for delivery before it is really needed? The armed services today hold in trust the almost unbelievable capacity of Americans to make sacrifices, and it seems fair to ask that they proceed in an orderly way, with a minimum of waste, toward a clearly understood goal.

Or take the current dilemma of whether our economy can remain free or whether we must start down the tragic path of controls from which no nation has ever yet fully returned. Unfortunately we debate that problem in the dark. Because we do not understand our national aims and because we do not know the measure of our future world commitments, we cannot determine the degree of sacrifice required from each company and each citizen. Instinctively we resist planners who plan solely for the sake of planning. We would resent deeply any attempt to exaggerate a crisis for the sake of imposing controls that would not be accepted otherwise. We react badly to vague emotional appeals, but magnificently to an honest statement of facts, whether they be pleasant or unpleasant.

Or consider the problem of capital accumulation for the expansion of production. The steel industry has been under great pressure from the Government to enlarge its capacity. Yet the same Government proposes to cut off the funds required for that expansion by increasing corporation taxes. They obviously can't have it both ways. Earnings are the principal source of capital for industrial companies, and what is withdrawn as taxes is actually withdrawn from plant expansion.

This document seems a far cry from the customary report of a president to the stockholders of his company, but it reflects the sort of world in which the affairs of the company must be carried on. I believe that judged by normal standards the company is in strong shape, and that its problems are being met with intelligence and fortitude. But I hold the deep conviction that the welfare of the company and its stockholders will in the ensuing year be determined by forces lying entirely outside of the power of your officers to control, and that what Inland and every other industrial company needs most is a reappraisal and restatement of our national aims.

"Without Fanfare, and With a Storage Capacity Equal to 10 Railroad Boxcars, the United States Air Force Giant C–99 Plane Carries 42½ Tons of Cargo 2,600 Miles Nonstop"—United Press

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, how well I remember as a young man the "lighter than air" airship arguments then advanced—and by noted men—that nothing heavier than air could fly through the air. Certainly, since that day, man has not alone, learned how to travel far but he has also learned how to travel fast.

Mr. Speaker, it is a feat that challenges, if it does not stagger, one's imagination, to take a great mass of iron, steel, lead, copper, aluminum, zinc, tin, and other inorganic and organic substances and energize them so that they fly through the air. It is as equally great a feat to fabricate these materials into a shape that encompasses the cubical content of 10 standard railroad boxcars, load them down with 85,000 pounds of freight and then cause them to fly through the air at prodigious speeds.

I have intended for some time past to address this body and tell of the marvelous contribution that Brookley Field in Mobile is making to national defense and also to tell you all how I have sat in my home and watched the huge C–54's rise off that field and start on their scheduled flights to the continent of Europe.

I shall look forward to the arrival at Mobile of this new giant of the air, the C–99, with its tail five stories high and with the same wingspread but with a 20-foot greater length than a B–36.

Mr. Speaker, the announcement of the flight of this new plane tells of its ability to carry 400 fully equipped troops and the possibility for the development of the use of this plane in war as well as in peace opens up a whole new concept, not alone of military tactics but of economics and transportation.

All hail to the United States Air Force for its latest feat in developing this great giant of the skies.

Mr. Speaker, in order that all may read the United Press report with respect to the United States Air Force C–99, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein that story as clipped from the Washington Post of May 14.

That article is as follows:

HOLD EQUALS 10 FREIGHT CARS—GIANT C–99 CARRIES 42½ TONS OF CARGO 2,600 MILES NONSTOP

Without fanfare, the largest land plane in the world has been performing remarkable feats of weight lifting for several months, it was learned yesterday.

The plane is the United States Air Force's almost forgotten giant C–99 transport, which steadily has been carrying cargo loads three times those of commercial air freight planes.

Most outstanding of the flights was a 2,600-mile, nonstop trip from Sacramento, Calif., to Savannah, Ga., on which the colossal ship carried 85,000 pounds—42½ tons of cargo. No other airplane has approached that record. On short flights the C–99 has carried more, perhaps 100,000 pounds.

The C–99 is a sister ship of the B–36 superbomber. Only one of the six-engine transports has been built. It was so large that before completion it had to be moved into a huge yard because Consolidated Vultee Aircraft Corp. had no building at San Diego, Calif., that would hold it.

Having the same wing span as a B–36, 230 feet, the C–99 is 182 feet long, 20 feet longer than the bomber. Its tail is 57½ feet high. The fuselage has a volume of 30,000 cubic feet, equivalent to that of 10 railroad freight cars.

On its two decks, the C–99 could carry 400 equipped troops or 300 litter patients.

The Fallacy of the Middle Way

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an article by Frank Chodorov entitled "The Fallacy of the Middle Way."

This article proves that there can be no meeting of socialism and capitalism and that the world is not big enough for them to live in in peace.

The time has come to choose between the two. England's example is there for us to study and avoid. The article follows:

THE FALLACY OF THE MIDDLE WAY
(By Frank Chodorov)

I

The resignation of Aneurin Bevan from the British Government poses a question for so-called intellectuals who glibly advocate a mixed economy—partly socialistic, partly free. Can it work? Bevan is convinced it cannot. He and his group blame austerity on the mixture. The Attlee regime, they maintain, has failed because it has been too timid, too reluctant to wipe out what is left of capitalism in England.

Bevan is logically sound as a nut. Capitalism and socialism are so antagonistic in texture that there is no way to make them mix. The one is a way of life grounded in the axiom of private property; the other denies the axiom out of hand. How can you have harmony in a social order that accepts the axiom in some areas, rejects it in others?

When you reject private property, as an axiom, you have government intervention and control. But, a social economy—as distinguished from a Robinson Crusoe economy—is so meshed that it cannot be partly controlled, partly free. When the government undertakes to fix prices it is compelled to fix wages. Intervention in the meat business at the butcher-shop level leads to intervention at the slaughterhouse, then on the farm, and when you follow through you come to the tannery and the shoe business. Each control calls for control of contiguous areas in order to make the previous control work.

Experience has shown that once socialism pokes its foot into the door, capitalism is on its way out. A mixed economy is a temporary concession to capitalistic habits and traditions. Bevan's position is this: since capitalism is doomed, why not be done with concessions and hurry the inevitable along? He is logical.

II

Now, if socialism and capitalism cannot be housed within a given country without causing friction, can there be harmony in a world of sovereign states, some socialistic, some capitalistic? Karl Marx said it is impossible, and the unmixed Socialists have always stuck by their prophet. They sometimes disagree among themselves as to whether evolution or revolution will ultimately wipe out world-capitalism and replace it with world-socialism, but they are unanimous in the opinion that a half-and-half arrangement is untenable. Only American intellectuals profress belief in the possibility.

Again logic is on the side of the Lenins, Trotskys, and Stalins. The world is so thoroughly integrated—economically and physically—that no part can hermetically seal itself off from the rest. For one thing, the natural distribution of raw materials over the face of the globe works against economic isolationism; without iron, the tropics would be hard put, while coffee improves breakfast in the temperate zone. Ideas, too, have a way of vaulting borders, and ideas germinate desires and action.

Socialism is convinced that capitalism—private property—is an evil idea, the worst man has ever thought up; before the ideal society can be realized this idea must be eradicated from the human mind. Within a given country, when the Socialists have got control of its political machinery, the task of eradication is possible of accomplishment; one way or another, the fiction of private property is removed from man's consciousness, and he ceases to think that way. But if the idea rides high in the outside world, it is a constant threat to this process of eradication. That is to say, a casus belli always is present in a world partly socialistic, partly free.

Bevan is reported to have expressed resentment toward America. Were he to entertain any other sentiment toward a capitalistic neighbor he would be ideologically inconsistent. His particular grievance against America is of no importance; so long as capitalism has a toehold here, just so long will English socialism find America an irritant and a danger. There will always be Bevans and issues.

That suggests an unthinkable thought: is it possible that an Anglo-American conflict could arise from the antagonistic social systems? No Socialist would be consistent if he thought otherwise. To be sure, clashes between nations arise from a multiplicity of causes, and their advent is subject to military and political exigencies. In the present world situation, England needs us and we need England, and the pressing interdependence overshadows the friction of conflicting ideologies. The point is that the friction does exist and will continue to exist because socialism cannot tolerate capitalism.

Realistic Russia seems to be pressing for a vindication of this Marxist tenet on the battlefield. England is on our side. Whether she likes it or not, her existence as a sovereign nation, socialistic or otherwise, is dependent on the military and economic help given her by a capitalistic nation. On which side would she be if that help were withdrawn? Ideologically, it would be Russia, but that choice would mean her national liquidation—and that brings up another question.

III

Is international socialism a durable modus vivendi? To repeat, an internal mixed economy is at best a troublesome transition from capitalism to socialism. An international mixed economy is likewise fraught with difficulties. Well then, if all the nations in the world were to embrace socialism could they (a) continue to exist as sovereign nations, and (b) live in harmony with one another?

Socialists have always insisted that war is a product of capitalism, and that when private property is done away with, the political establishments based on private property would wither away, and so would nationalistic loyalties and ambitions. The U. S. S. R. has made that theory look so foolish that the doctrinaires resort to denying its claim to being a socialistic nation. Nevertheless, most simon-pures admit the necessity of introducing socialism on a national basis; first things first.

That simply means that, in the beginning anyway, all socialism must be national socialism—resembling in substance the Hitlerian scheme. When one considers the job of reconditioning people to the new order one realizes why this must be so. To rip out of men's minds the traditions of capitalism, backed by centuries of practice, requires a lot of doing—reeducation, purging, and outright liquidation. It is a task that is proportioned to the size of the nation. It is perforce a local job.

This reconditioning is made difficult by contamination from the outside world. Even if the next-door neighbor also professes socialism, a differential in wages might arise from a difference in natural advantages, and news about it could start a migration of workers. That would upset the controls, just as the free importation of goods must make the regulation of prices a farce. In short, to institute socialism in any one country requires its immunization against all foreign contacts. The iron curtain is a necessary property in a socialistic performance.

But, there is always the problem of the maldistribution of natural resources; in that respect, nature is oblivious of the glories of socialism. Under capitalism, the disequilibrium is righted, though imperfectly, by its intricate system of exchanges. When all the nations of the world have abolished this capitalistic system, how will the coffee of Brazil get to Italy, the turpentine of North Carolina to Tokyo? Doctrinaire socialism has no answer, not one that makes sense anyway. Russian socialism has an answer, and it resembles what the doctrinaires used to sneeringly refer to as imperialism.

Yes, the boys in the Kremlin are the most logical of all Socialists. They know that socialism hasn't a chance if capitalism exists anywhere in the world. They know that separate socialistic nations will be at one another's throats. The only way, then, is to wipe out both capitalism and nationalism at one fell swoop, and to inaugurate global socialism controlled by a single central intelligence.

IV

England's situation, which Bevan's resignation dramatized, is precarious. She hardly gets going on national socialism when her national existence is threatened by the intransigents of the East, bent on fulfilling the destiny bequeathed to them by the Prophet Marx. If they succeed, England will be relegated to a subdivision of world socialism.

On the other hand, what will be her fate if the western capitalistic colossus prevails? The impending struggle promises to leave the world a shambles, making it incumbent on the victor to manage and police it. England will necessarily be one of the policed nations.

In the circumstances, Bevan's proposal that England cut herself adrift from both menaces, so that she can pursue her way toward complete national socialism, is born of despair. Is there no way out for her? Only one escape suggests itself, and that is to go back to the capitalism that, in the nineteenth century, enriched her and gave her strength.

For all the faults of nineteenth century capitalism, its record of achievement compares most favorably with the socialistic and mixed economies of the last 50 years. Production piled on production, taxes were low and the individual was less harrassed. Even its depressions were overcome without austerity, hand-outs, and controls.

In the matter of wars, it is noteworthy that the nineteenth century had no major war comparable to either of the two we have had since 1914. Whatever causes war, it is a certainty that socialism does not bring peace; the evidence is all for the proposition that imbedded in socialism is a prime cause for war.

Perhaps, then, a full measure of capitalism, without mixture, would restore England to vigor and independence. Her productive capacity would certainly improve to the point where she would no longer be a mendicant nation, and the well-being of her people would give pause to the realistic Kremlin. One does not pick on a strong fellow.

That, of course, is what America should do, before the slow poison of a mixed economy brings her to England's plight.

Not Much of an Answer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me previously, I should like to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following editorial which appeared in the Cleveland Press on Tuesday, May 8, 1951:

NOT MUCH OF AN ANSWER

The President last night, in what obviously was intended as a reply to General MacArthur, stressed "the awesome and terrible possibility" of an atomic war.

"No matter how good our air defense may be, or how big an Air Force we build, a determined air attack by the Soviet Union could drop bombs upon this country," Truman said.

The best defense against such an attack, he added, "is to prevent the outbreak of another world war and achieve a real peace."

Few Americans will disagree with either statement. But it is possible to accept both without sharing the President's assurance that his present policies will prevent another world war, achieve real peace or win the war we are already fighting.

Defense Secretary Marshall's testimony before the Senate committee yesterday also failed to satisfy on the same count.

That testimony included an apparent contradiction of one of Truman's own assertions.

The President said he had refused to extend the area of conflict in Korea on "the best collective military advice in this country."

Yet General Marshall said he had "urgently recommended" adoption of a proposal by the Joint Chiefs of Staff to permit "hot pursuit" of enemy planes for a stated distance beyond the Yalu River into Manchuria, but we were forced to abandon that plan because the 13 nations allied with us in fighting voted solidly against it.

That seems to indicate that, though the United States is bearing 95 percent of the war burden, vital strategy is being dictated by 13 nations represented in Korea by mere token forces.

These same nations are dragging their feet on the American proposal for economic sanctions against Red China.

"We cannot go it alone in Asia and go it in company in Europe," Truman contended.

Would it be more hazardous to go it alone than to continue to let ourselves be hamstrung, against our better judgment, by so-called allies who insist on working both sides of the street? Can we depend on them in Europe if we can't in Asia?

Some time, some place, we shall have to insist that our friends stand up and be counted. We are losing most of the blood and we have, at least, the right to expect our Allies to stop trading with the enemy, as some of them are doing right now.

If this is the "system of collective security" which the President says we are helping to set up, we should demand that it be replaced by a one-for-all-and-all-for-one arrangement.

Any hitch-hikers who might leave us on such a showdown would be no loss.

Money we are wasting on them could be spent to far better purpose if divided among the nations, including Nationalist China, which are willing to fight.

About all that can be gathered from those portions of Secretary Marshall's testimony made public is that he favors our present course because he believes it less likely than the course advocated by General MacArthur to involve us in war with Russia.

That is conjecture. What is more probable is that we encourage Soviet aggression by official utterances which would lead the Russians to believe that we so fear them and their atom bombs we dare not risk offending them by exerting enough force to end the war in Korea.

If there is a "best way" to prevent a third world war it is to be prepared to win one if it is forced on us—so well prepared to deliver our big bombs on the other fellow's doorstep that he will be as anxious to avoid breaching the peace as we are eager to preserve it.

Our safety depends on swift and adequate preparedness. Let's get going faster.

Meanwhile, Secretary Marshall's self-censorship didn't pass much to refute General MacArthur's opinion that the Chinese Reds can be forced out of Korea by cutting off their supplies.

Praying for Peace With Expectancy of Success

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include the following excerpt from a recent edition of the Capitol Gist:

ON PRAYING FOR PEACE WITH EXPECTANCY OF SUCCESS

If one visualizes the millions of men, women, and little children who pray daily for world peace on bended knee or with bowed head, one cannot refrain from joining in praying and working for "on earth peace, good will toward men."

And all may pray—and with expectancy of success, or faith that as a result of the terrible sacrifices, sufferings, and destruction in the U. N. police action in Korea that the world will have learned its lesson and global peace attained.

Then the loss of part of the flower of America's young manhood on the far away hills and mountains and ravines of Korea will not have been in vain and this war-weary world can enter a new era of peace, progress, and plenty for all people on this troubled planet.

Now is the time to put into practice the Christian principles which we profess, and abide by: "Thy will be done."

The Continued Threat to American Glass

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. T. MILLET HAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, over a period of years I have repeatedly warned of the threat to the American glass industry which is poised by imports from foreign countries, including countries behind the iron curtain. It is obviously impossible for our local industries, maintaining good wages and high working standards, to compete, for example, with Czechoslovakia which does not have comparable wage scales, and is quite indifferent to working standards. Moreover, their production costs are not especially significant since the economy of the country is controlled by the Government, and they frequently export without any real reference to the cost of production, but simply to obtain needed American dollars.

All of this is well illustrated in a recent editorial in the Vineland (N. J.) Times-Journal which is herewith included:

CLOSE TO HOME

In direct contradiction to an occasionally voiced opinion that the average workingman has little stake in national elections decided on international issues, is the distressing situation in the American glassware industry. And in Greater Vineland when the glassware industry is threatened, the circumstances are of vital importance not only to the glassworker whose livelihood is directly affected but to most of the rest of us in the community.

That is why we were interested in a letter passed along to us by our friend Jim Mitchell, international representative of the American Flint Glass Workers Union of North America. The letter was written by Harry H. Cook, international president of the union, quoting a recent Inside Labor column by Victor Reisel in the New York Daily Mirror.

Writing from Cincinnati, Reisel said: "It's here in Ohio that one sees the effect of the Soviet slave apparatus in microcosm. Here the glass struggle is on. And the shrewd Marxist Russians appear to be winning. They're hurting our own glass industry badly. Before war work seeped into the Pennsylvania-Ohio-West Virginia-Indiana glass area some 2,000 of our skilled glass technicians were thrown out of work by Soviet slave competition. * * *

"For some years now, Communist Czechoslovakia had led all the rest of the iron-curtain tribes. In 1949, this land of the Skoda Munitions Works (now grinding out guns for the Chinese Soviet armies) dumped most of the 12,071,991 dozen pieces of hand-made glass that came into the United States. Last year this jumped to 23,668,324 dozen pieces, worth millions of dollars—as the Soviet secret police (MVD) moved in to exploit that land of once free people.

"Add to this the heavy cut glass from Poland, once again popular in this country, and you find that the union's fears are justified. Our own artisans are being forced to abandon a trade for which they trained for years.

"Here is evidence that this trade is a glass-for-guns business for the Russian overseers of Czechoslovakia. Recently a member of the Czech Communist ministry controlling industry called some of his people together and briefed them on the importance of this trade. He was comrade F. Markovic, who said:

" 'Export prices here are not based on production costs but upon the Czechoslovakian need for currency of the country to which the merchandise is being exported.'

"He meant us and the good old United States dollar. Here's what happened. There is an item, for example, which cost American employers $2.12 a dozen just for labor, but the Soviet slave marketeers sell that same glassware for $1.73—complete.

"So cheap is this stuff that it flooded the country and endangered the jobs of 50,000 American workers, some 16,000 of whom are skilled. Just as cheap are the slave glass imports from Poland, Hungary, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Bulgaria, Romania, Russia itself, and Red Manchuria from which the Soviet Chinese armies get much of their steel, coal, and other heavy equipment and fuel.

"The Treasury Department can cripple this trade with just a simple single sentence regulation. But nothing's happening. And won't happen until we make as much noise as we did about the slave crabmeat."

In its issue of last month, the official magazine of the glassworkers noted that 20 percent of hand-made glass sold in the United States in 1950 was imported from abroad—and again the same reason was given; cheap labor.

The issue of a protective tariff or destruction by foreign competition is one that faces not only the men and women who make glassware but many other American industries. War production creates full employment and so the problem is not pressing at the moment; yet the flow of dollars to iron curtain countries cannot be overlooked.

Paralyzed Vet Weeps as 2,500 Cheer His Music

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Times-Herald for today:

PARALYZED VET WEEPS AS 2,500 CHEER HIS MUSIC

BOSTON, May 17.—A paralyzed Navy veteran sat in a wheel chair at Symphony Hall last night with tear-filled eyes as 2,500 persons stood and cheered when the Boston "pop" orchestra finished playing an original composition he picked out with one finger while a hospital patient.

"This is the greatest night of my life," said Robert Grant, Jr., a victim of multiple sclerosis. "This happening to me is out of this world. It just can't be."

CHEERS BRING ENCORE

But it was. The audience cheered his Evening Prayer so long and hard, Conductor Arthur Fiedler had the orchestra play it twice. Again the audience went wild and many swarmed around Grant, who couldn't rise from his wheel chair at a table near the door.

The first time through the music, the 26-year-old veteran sat clutching a sacred heart medal and beaming proudly.

But when the audience gave the religious song its first ovation, Grant became choked with emotion and as the tears flowed, he found it hard to speak.

"The orchestra was tremendous," he said. "This is the kind of thing that just doesn't happen to anybody."

HE JUST PECKED AWAY

Sitting on Grant's left was Mrs. Charles Davidson, the Red Cross Gray Lady at the Cushing Veterans' Hospital in Framingham who encouraged him to try and put his poem to music. The veteran loved music, but never thought of composing.

However, he had plenty of time and pecked away at the hospital piano until he had a melody to fit the words. Fiedler heard about the song, visited Grant and listened to his music. Then he ordered his own arranger to make a full orchestration which was played last night.

Mrs. Davidson and her daughter, Jane, who first sang the song for Grant, both wept as they sat listening to tenor Gene Cox of Boston sing the words that thanked God for all the things he has given mankind.

HIS FATHER ATTENDS

Also present was Grant's father, but his invalid mother could not attend. A recording of the performance was made, but the veteran had to return immediately to the hospital and could not take it with his father to their Cambridge home.

A Dartmouth graduate in the class of 1947 and a former Navy boxer, Grant was surrounded by former classmates and some 250 other veterans and hospital personnel from Cushing. Twenty-five of the patients also were in wheel chairs.

AMVETS Speak Up About United Nations and General Wedemeyer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and resolutions:

AMERICAN VETERANS OF WORLD WAR II,
DEPARTMENT OF IOWA,
Atlantic, Iowa, May 10, 1951.

Hon. BEN F. JENSEN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN JENSEN: First we want to congratulate you on your recent victories in Washington in starting the economy drive and in cutting down on nondefense and unnecessary spending in Government.

Also, just in case you may be interested we are enclosing a copy of the resolution passed by the representatives of the veterans of World War II in this southwestern Iowa community. Apparently the men here are becoming quite disgusted with the nonproductive debating work going on in this United Nations assembly, and with complete disregard, apparently, of our men dying daily in Korea. It is time for positive action and a positive foreign policy.

We do thank you for your untiring efforts, though, for honest and efficient Government.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE H. FRIES,
Commander, Walnut, Iowa.
R. G. ROBERTS,
Atlantic, Iowa.

RESOLUTIONS OF AMERICAN VETERANS OF WORLD WAR II, ATLANTIC, IOWA, MAY 10, 1951

Whereas the Korean police action is still see-sawing back and forth across the peninsula, costing 1,000 and more casualties weekly (mostly American blood), it is now time to look to the future and study the road ahead. It is noted that the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations, meeting in Geneva, Switzerland, is expected to finish drafting the bill of rights for all the peoples of the earth; and

Whereas this bill, described as a guaranty to free speech and a free press is simply an exercise in applied hypocrisy. The bill begins by saying: "Everyone shall have the right to freedom of expression * * * freedom to seek, receive, and impart information and ideas * * * orally, in writing, or in print * * * or through any other media." The next section of the covenant cancels out the promise. It says "The right to seek, receive, and impart information and ideas carries with it special duties and responsibilities and may, therefore, be subject to certain penalties, liabilities, and restrictions"; and

Whereas the covenant on human rights, if accepted by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, would become a treaty, and treaties, under the provisions of the United States Constitution, become the supreme law of the land. "The American Bar Association, at its midwinter meeting in Chicago, expressed grave anxiety that United Nations treaties might thus undermine our bill of rights and transform the Nation into a Socialist despotism. As a safeguard against this, it has been proposed that the United States Constitution be amended to prevent treaties from superseding Federal and State laws." To continue this quotation; "But a simpler and better safeguard would be to get out of the United Nations. The United Nations will never have anything but Socialist ideas to offer because it is dominated by socialism—except when it is dominated by communism": Be it hereby Resolved by the members of this AMVETS organization, the American Veterans of World War II, meeting this 10th day of May 1951 in a special meeting in Atlantic, Iowa, That in view of the inherent dangers to freedom of speech, freedom of the press and the radio, and even danger to our freedom in religion and worship, and loss of life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness, we do protest strongly the adoption of these Socialist doctrines, and do urge the United States to get out of the United Nations. It is believed by the members of this organization that we cannot only save our country from the despotism of socialism but also could then offer real assistance to our brave men now fighting in Korea or maybe later all over the world.

Whereas Lt. Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer is now separating from active duty in the armed services, and since he has written his report on far-eastern affairs that has proven 100-percent correct, and most likely would have avoided the Korean affair, thus saving some 62,000 American casualties, it is hereby Resolved by the members of this AMVETS organization, That General Wedemeyer should be called before the United States Senate and before Congress to give this body of our representatives his valuable findings and his opinions on important matters in the Far East, and that this call should be made at once.

GEORGE H. FRIES,
AMVETS Commander,
Walnut, Iowa.
R. G. ROBERTS,
Atlantic, Iowa.

Hon. Eugene Worley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER THORNBERRY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, in the April 1951 issue of the Texas Bar Journal, the official publication of the State bar of Texas, there is a very interesting article about our former colleague and friend, Judge Eugene Worley, of the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals. On the front cover of this magazine appears a very fine portrait of Judge Worley.

I know that the members of the House will enjoy reading this article because it tells of Judge Worley's career as a lawyer, legislator, and a member of the judiciary of this country. Of particular interest will be the story of his successful campaign for election to the Seventy-seventh Congress.

It is a privilege for me to recall that I have had a long and pleasant personal association with Gene Worley. Gene and I were classmates at the University of Texas, both of us having received our legal education at the law school at that university. It was there that I also came to know his fine wife, Ann, prior to the time that Gene was fortunate enough to persuade her to marry him.

Later on it was my privilege to join him in the Texas Legislature when he had already completed one term in the house of representatives of that legislature. The two of us had the opportunity of serving together two terms in that body, at the end of which he was chosen by his neighbors and friends to represent them further here. Both of us served in the Navy during World War II. It was, of course, a high privilege for me to join him again here during the Eighty-first Congress.

The article follows:

EUGENE WORLEY: A FORMER CONGRESSMAN, TEXAS LAWYER, IS NOW JUDGE ON UNITED STATES COURT OF CUSTOMS AND PATENT APPEALS, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Eugene Worley, 42-year-old lawyer from Shamrock, Wheeler County, is one of the five judges on the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, Washington, D. C.

President Harry S. Truman appointed him to the court in the spring of 1950.

No stranger in the national capital, Judge Worley first went to Washington in December of 1940 as a Texas Congressman. He began serving in the Seventy-seventh Congress, continued serving as a Congressman until the President's appointment.

There's an interesting story about Congressman Worley's first election. A group of high-school boys and girls helped elect him as Democratic nominee to the House of Representatives in Washington from the Eighteenth District of Texas. Panhandle newspapers in the fall of 1940 said the "Mr. Worley Goes to Washington" Club organized by the young people did more than anybody else in the Panhandle to elect him to Congress.

In April some Pampa high-school students and one 13-year-old junior-high boy organized the club, functioned desultorily for a few months, then realized that their candidate, Gene Worley, might not get into the run-off election in the first primary, July 27.

The "Mr. Worley Goes to Washington" Club went into action. With the president of the student council and players on the football team as speakers, the club members went all over the Panhandle making speeches. A pep squad leader led the cheering every once in a while. Members of the high-school band did their part.

No one was more surprised than the candidate himself. He did not know about the club's plans until the first time his supporters went out to speak for him. They learned he was to speak on the main street in Borger. They went over there, rode a fire truck down the street with the band playing, soon attracted the biggest crowd Mr. Worley had drawn up to that time.

The "Mr. Worley Goes to Washington" Club did their job so well they offset Mr. Worley's disadvantages—no billboards, no radio time. In the first primary campaign the club held 30 campaign rallies in 18 of the 28 counties.

There were 12 other candidates besides Mr. Worley, and he barely got into the runoff.

His opponents failed to realize the importance of "the high-school stuff." They overlooked the fact that the youngsters had 2,000 parents who could vote, even though they themselves were too young to vote.

By runoff time there was a different story. Gene Worley was elected by 7,000 votes and carried 24 of the 28 counties.

And that's the story of how Mr. Worley went to Washington.

Judge Worley sits on a five-man appellate court that gets appeals from the United States Customs Court and from the United States Patent Office. There is only one customs court, seated in New York, but it conducts hearings in all parts of the country.

Decisions of the Customs and Patent Appeals Court can be carried to the United States Supreme Court for review.

Chambers of the Customs and Patent Appeals Court are on the seventh floor of the Bureau of Internal Revenue Building in Washington.

Eugene Worley was born at Lone Wolf, Okla., October 10, 1908, the son of John B. and Idelle (Johnson) Worley.

He was a student at Texas A. & M. College for 2 years, 1927–29, before entering the University of Texas, where he earned his academic and legal degrees.

He was already a member of the Texas House of Representatives when he was admitted to the bar in 1936, and he was reelected twice, serving in the forty-fourth, forty-fifth, and forty-sixth legislatures.

Judge Worley was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention in 1936.

He is a member of the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Delta Phi Delta, Phi Delta Theta, Methodist Church, Masonic Lodge (thirty-second degree), Odd Fellows, and State bar of Texas.

We Americans Don't Like Aristocracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include this timely editorial from the Auburn Parker of Chicago, Ill., issue of April 25, 1951:

WE AMERICANS DON'T LIKE ARISTOCRACY

(By Earl B. Fox, president of Fox College)

We don't like aristocracy of wealth, of blood, or of education. We know that the opportunity of education only for those endowed with a high I. Q. is definitely un-American.

It was Plato who said: "That the purpose of education is to develop in the mind and in the soul and in the body all the perfection and all the beauty of which they are capable." Others have defined education as "an adjustment to environment." To deny this opportunity to all on an equal basis is cruelly wrong. While it is understandable that university presidents and professors are much concerned over the prospective lessening enrollment, poorer athletic teams, etc., we violently take issue with their present solution of this problem.

Since the source of every socialistic scheme that now burdens our industry and clouds our thinking was hatched on our university campuses—it is ridiculous to see these same universities propound such an unsocial idea as draft exemption for those with a high I. Q. It is so out of character.

It was Will Rogers who said, "I have three children, and thank God not one of them is a genius." One's I. Q. is not very important. What he does with it is most important. Give me in addition to one's I. Q. his P. Q., that is, his personality quotient plus his ambition quotient—then and only then—can I give you his coefficient of success. Without an agreement with the Pentagon the universities would have been hard hit. It would have been so bad that some of the professors would have to take jobs in war plants. Maybe that would have been justice. After all, it was the original Brain Trust (composed of college professors and their protégés) that brought about the recognition of Russia. It was this same group that propounded the idea of killing pigs, plowing under young corn and tender wheat. It was this group of Brain Trusters who scuttled the Atlantic Charter and made Russia strong. This proposed plan of I. Q. tests for draft exemption classifies every GI as a moron—poor thanks to those who are giving and will give so much—maybe their all. What effect will this have upon the sincere university student? Will not his educational aims be seriously affected when socially he is blackballed as a slacker, goaded with the guilty conscience of dodging his duty? Can those of us who so highly respect the universities and their glorious traditions of the past stand idly by and see these glories traded for a mess of pottage?

There is no valid excuse for any young man to be excused from the draft. If it's important enough for one to serve, it is important enough for all to serve of that respective age bracket. No young man should be denied the privilege of serving his country in uniform to the maximum of his ability. If he be a IV–F or even subnormal, isn't that sufficient punishment? Must we heap coals of fire upon his head by denying him the privilege of wearing the uniform? We don't dare to deny anyone that right when we will let him vote now or later. The privilege of voting implies definite responsibilities.

True, all can't serve in top capacity, but with proper ingenuity and sufficient effort a job can be located somehow, somewhere, for every man who has the American right of wearing the uniform. We all know it takes nine men to support one in the field. Those who can't serve in the field can, most assuredly, serve behind the men behind the gun. Then if all men go in uniform, does that mean all our universities must close? Where will we get our future scientists, engineers, those for research, teachers, etc.? The answer is very simple. For now we have ample proof that there isn't a single job that our young men are doing that can't be done just as well by the modern American girl.

Unfortunately, we have far too many families that feel that giving a girl an education is not important. (It is interesting to note that no widow ever feels that way.) Since the universities have served their alumni so well, since these college graduates are so financially successful, since they will be happy to express their loyalty to their alma mater, why not appeal to our alumni? Let each alumnus select the right girl from his neighborhood and pay her tuition as a candidate to his alma mater. If that is too big an obligation—and I doubt it—why not the alumni form themselves into groups of 10 as a sponsoring group for only 1 candidate and equally sharing the cost of this scholarship. That not only would take care of all our future needs for well-trained scientists and those of the professions, but also it would fill all our colleges to capacity.

We have ample proof of the loyalty of the alumni. Look at the number of athletes that are well set up in the universities by the alumni. If our services to our former students haven't been great enough to deserve and achieve this cooperation, may God give us courage to say, "We deserve to have our doors closed."

Acheson Trapped by Own Double Talk

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, of all the qualities that are necessary in a member of the Cabinet, none are more important than integrity and adherence to truth. I raise this question today because of an important statement made yesterday by the Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, at a press conference. Mr. Acheson was being questioned about his attitude toward letting Communist China into the United Nations. He replied heatedly that he is opposed to admitting Red China. Then, according to this morning's Washington Post, he added:

So far the United States has been successful in convincing the vast majority of countries that it was right in opposing the seating of Communist China.

Other papers quote him similarly.

Now let me recall what Mr. Acheson told a press conference on June 7, 1950—New York Times, June 8—in discussing admission of Red China to the U. N. He said:

We believe each nation must decide for itself how it is going to vote on the question, and we are not going to try to influence them.

When a matter of truth is involved the facts speak for themselves. Mr. Acheson's own double talk has finally trapped him.

Some More Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, an excellent summary of the reasons for MacArthur's dismissal is contained in the following article which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune on Sunday, May 13, 1951. It is precise and to the point, so that even he who runs may read:

REASONS FOR DISMISSAL

Why was General MacArthur dismissed?

Secretary Marshall said there was nothing new about a theater commander getting so wrapped up in his own aims that he was dissatisfied with his orders from above. "What is new," said Marshall, "and what has brought about the necessity for General MacArthur's removal is the wholly unprecedented situation of a local theater commander publicly expressing his displeasure at and his disagreement with the foreign and military policy of the United States."

MacArthur had issued a series of public statements about the heavy American defeat of late November. He was critical of Government policy. On December 6 an order was sent to him from Washington, phrased in general terms to avoid making it too personal, forbidding him to issue further statements without having them approved in Washington.

On March 20 the Joint Chiefs of Staff told MacArthur that the President was preparing an announcement, in conjunction with the United Nations, to the effect that we were ready to discuss a Korean settlement. Four days later MacArthur issued a statement of his own along similar lines, without U. N. approval. This disrupted the delicate talks that Truman was having with our allies, said Marshall, and it became necessary to abandon the projected U. N. declaration "thus losing whatever chance there may have been at that time to negotiate a settlement of the Korean conflict."

Finally and climactically came MacArthur's letter to Representative JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Jr., urging that we bomb China.

"It became apparent," said Marshall, "that General MacArthur had grown so far out of sympathy with the established policies of the United States that there was grave doubt as to whether he could any longer be permitted to exercise the authority in making decisions that normal command functions would assign to a theater commander. In this situation there was no other recourse but to relieve him."

Mr. Speaker, at the same time it would be well for those who are constantly asking, and not expecting an answer, as to what our Formosa policy is, to read the following summary which appeared in the same newspaper the same day:

POLICY AS TO FORMOSA

On the topic of Formosa, Secretary Marshall dealt with two points brought up by General MacArthur.

The established policy of the United States, said Marshall, is to deny Formosa to Communist China and to oppose the seating of Red China in the United Nations. We would not bargain about these points in any talks about a cease fire, said Marshall. However, when negotiations for a final Korean settlement take place, these points will be brought up in the U. N., whether we like it or not. He thought the United States would oppose any settlement which would reward the aggressor in any manner whatever.

On the subject of the use in Korea of the Chinese Nationalist troops now on Formosa, Marshall said MacArthur himself advised against it last July. He thought the 33,000 troops offered by Chiang Kai-shek would be ineffective and lack logistic support. During the alarming period of defeat in late November, MacArthur changed his mind and asked for fifty or sixty thousand Formosa troops, which number he believed were sufficiently well trained and equipped to go into combat. The Joint Chiefs of Staff rejected his suggestion, feeling that past performances of these same troops on the Chinese mainland and current reports on their fitness did not indicate that they would be effective in Korea.

Besides, the Joint Chiefs thought Chiang Kai-shek's troops on Formosa were needed there to protect the island against Communist invasion, and that they would have their hands full if an invasion were launched.

The Postal Deficit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 9, 1951.

Hon. GORDON CANFIELD,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CANFIELD: Knowing of your deep and continuing interest in Post Office Department operations, I am taking the liberty to point out an inaccurate statement made to you by Postmaster General Donaldson some months ago. Only recently have I been informed that he cast aspersions upon the Citizens Committee's estimates of potential reductions in the postal deficit.

In response to your questioning at the House Appropriations Subcommittee's hearings on the Treasury Department-Post Office Appropriations bill for 1952, Postmaster General Donaldson made the following statement—and others of like character—to the subcommittee:

"It has been rather well circulated throughout the country by the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Commission * * * that if we had a modernized and streamlined accounting system $250,000,000 could be saved" (p. 54 of printed hearings).

The Citizens Committee has made an official estimate as to the potential savings which could accrue to the installation of a modernized and streamlined postal accounting system. This was placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 96, part 17, page A6806, by the Honorable CLARENCE J. BROWN:

"The measure (the Post Office Financial Control Act, Public Law 712, 81st Cong.), in itself, will not save great sums of money. One million dollars annually is the estimate of the Citizens Committee."

Mr. Donaldson appears to have added $249,000,000 to our estimate of $1,000,000 for potential savings from better accounting in his department.

The Citizens Committee, using specific dollar figures presented by the Hoover Commission and accounting information in official Post Office Department publications, estimated that the current annual postal deficit of $555,000,000 can be greatly reduced as is set forth below.

I. THE HOOVER COMMISSION

The Hoover Commission's estimates were that the postal deficit could be cut by $256,000,000 annually as follows:

Present deficit	Reductions
1. Increases in rates for special services	$64,000,000
2. Increases in rates for penny post cards	50,000,000
3. Managerial economies (post offices with receipts over $1,000,000)	90,000,000
4. Economies through modernization of methods and equipment	60,000,000
Deduct annual cost of economy program plus new equipment to effect (3) above	−8,000,000
Current revenue and expenditure estimates indicate a further increase in reduction of $6,000,000 through items (1) and (2) above	6,000,000
Total reduction accruing to Hoover Commission recommendation	262,000,000
Annual deficit	555,000,000
Net deficit after installation of Hoover Commission program	293,000,000

II. SEGREGATION OF SUBSIDIES

Postmaster General Donaldson stated in a letter of February 21, 1949, to Speaker RAYBURN that a deficit of around $150,000,000 represents the cost of official penalty mailing, franked mailing, airline subsidies, and other costs not properly chargeable to the users of postal service.

Total subsidies payment not properly chargeable to operations of the Post Office Department	$150,000,000
Net postal deficit after installation of Hoover Commission recommendations and proper segregation of subsidies (regardless of rate increase on first-, second-, third-, or fourth-class mail)	143,000,000

Following the facts and reasoning above, the Citizens Committee states that, if the Hoover Commission recommendations were fully installed and administered with skill and if the subsidies were properly segregated, the true postal deficit would approximate $143,000,000 annually, not $555,000,000.

At least a portion of this remaining deficit of $143,000,000 might then be met by some increase in rates to special commercial users, as stated by Mr. Hoover in his speech of June 30, 1949.

The estimated annual loss of $435,000,000 on second-, third-, and fourth-class mail and foreign-surface mail might more properly be studied against the $143,000,000 over-all postal deficit which would remain after reorganization and segregation of subsidies.

You are free to make such use of this letter as you may wish.

Faithfully yours,

ROBERT L. L. MCCORMICK,
Research Director, Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report.

The Story of the Origin of the Milk Bowl in 1949

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER THORNBERRY
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. THORNBERRY. Mr. Speaker, down in the Tenth District in Texas, at Gause, I have a friend, Mr. E. C. Weafer, who has furnished the inspiration for a program to encourage the youth of our country.

He and the members of his family are responsible for the Milk Bowl, which provides an opportunity for the "small fry" to engage in junior football in Texas. I think it is a program worthy of the attention of the Members of the House, and therefore call your attention to a reprint from the American Farm Youth magazine concerning pee-wee football in Texas:

THE MILK BOWL, INC.

(By E. C. Weafer, secretary, Gause, Tex.)

Listeners to the broadcasts of radio station WFAA, Dallas, recently heard Ralph Widman, sports director of the station say, "A city is not measured by the size of its buildings, but by the quality of its people. In my books, the biggest city in the world is Gause, Tex., United States of America." Gause, an almost forgotten hamlet in central Texas and almost untouched by the prosperity of recent industrialization, thus reached a point in fame that had been undreamed of as several generations of Gause folks watched first their bank then other businesses disappear.

What was the cause of the revival of the community? It was the Milk Bowl, which was described by Jinx Tucker, sports editor of the Waco News-Tribune as just about the most important sports event in Texas for many years. The Milk Bowl was the first annual bowl game for small-fry players, played at Cameron, Tex., on December 10. All players were required to be under 100 pounds and not over 14 years of age. Two teams of rural youth played, one from Gause, Tex., and the other from San Saba; the final score 20–7 in favor of San Saba. All the features of a big-time bowl were present: play-by-play broadcast over a major station, half-time activities, and other colorful features. Significantly a national manufacturer paid for the radio time, and bidding now goes on for radio rights. NBC tie-ups is in prospect.

The game has resulted in a wave of enthusiasm for junior football in Texas. More than that, it has caused Texas farm folks to take an interest in the extracurricular activities of the schools, and has brought about a study of the recreational and community needs of rural communities. It may soon cause a State-wide, official study and a series of conferences on what may be done in rural Texas to develop community-centered activities for persons of all ages. By beginning with the interest in football, the promoters of the bowl have done more for farm youth than has been accomplished, thus far, by consideration of blueprints for community unification and recreation.

The famous Milk Bowl began in a small way but with a big purpose. The local school had been without men teachers for over a decade. There were no athletics. The passing of the Gilmer-Aikin bill and subsequent raising of salaries brought in men teachers. Soon the cow-pasture campus was cleared and football practice was begun. When the community saw its boys playing in overalls and sweatshirts (many of the people and most of the boys had never seen a football game), a collection was taken for uniforms. Even though several lads were inclined to run the wrong way with the ball and one of them actually did, the country boys played a schedule with city teams, and won smashing victories. Then, Mrs. Weafer, 24-year-old housewife and mother of five children, suggested a bowl game for peewees to Ralph Widman, sports director of WFAA; with the support of that station, the Dallas Morning News, the Waco News-Tribune, and other agencies in Texas, the bowl was promoted and won enthusiastic acclaim throughout the State.

Two significant developments have taken place recently. Several Southwestern Conference athletic directors have indicated willingness to have peewee games played as preliminaries to the regular games of the conference, thus opening the way to the promotion of junior football and rural recreation on an unprecedented scale. Then, word has come from Chicago that the city championship peewee football team of Chicago, coached by the immortal Red Grange and a staff from the Chicago Bears and Cardinals might possibly be available for the 1950 Milk Bowl, so that the best team in Texas would have outside competition.

The Milk Bowl, Inc., a nonprofit Texas corporation is made up of the following people: Joe Moore, for 10 years lead-off man for the New York Giants; Gene Walker, former Texas leaguer; Terry Moore, one-time Arizona leaguer; Gerland Varner, Gause businessman; Ralph Widman, sports director, radio station WFAA, Dallas; Mrs. Myrtle Varner, superintendent of schools, Gause; Eugene C. Weafer, athletic director of the Gause Public Schools.

This all proves to farm youth everywhere that people do not have to live in big places to do big things. Opportunity starts at a young person's front door.

And maybe that Gause has now learned to believe in itself, it can also learn to believe in its land, which can be put to greater productive use following the appropriate kind of studies and the suitable plan of land use.

We farm folks can think "big" and we are people, too.

Evidence, Not Emotions, Prove the Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, May 9, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the evidence continues to pile up that President Truman was right and General MacArthur was wrong. I am pleased to incorporate in the RECORD editorials from the New York Herald Tribune of May 11, May 13, and May 17, 1951, as follows:

A MAJOR VICTORY

Secretary Marshall was well justified in pointing out to the Senators one of the most serious consequences of General MacArthur's emotion-charged campaign. It has entangled MacArthur in a position in which, in order to defend his case, he must shout to the world that the Eighth Army is being committed to futile battle in a "vacuum" of policy; that the administration is "buying time at the expense of American blood"; that it is abetting a "dreadful slaughter" of our men without "definite end" and without hope of anything save indecisive stalemate. The effect which these inaccurate, plainly exaggerated but moving phrases might have had upon the morale of the Eighth Army is appallingly apparent. It is even more apparent that this estimate of the situation coming from the late top United Nations commander at a moment when the enemy is counting his losses and debating his next moves, could tend only to incite Peking to one more bloody effort, which our forces might otherwise be spared.

It is difficult to imagine a worse disservice to the devoted men of the Eighth Army. Fortunately, that army has disregarded the self-justifications of its former commander; its morale reportedly stands at a higher peak than ever before, and while MacArthur at home has in effect been encouraging the Chinese Reds to try again, the men in the field have been supplying the Peking dictators with compelling counterarguments that may yet prove convincing.

It is simply not true that the Korean war has been fought in a "vacuum" of policy; or that the policy, very clearly defined, which has been followed can offer nothing save an endless continuation of "dreadful slaughter." In the last 3 weeks the Eighth Army and its associated air and sea elements have won a victory of remarkable, conceivably of decisive, proportions with a minimum of losses. It is not simply that the lines were substantially held. By maneuvering the Chinese into an offensive, the Eighth Army shattered a major effort, built up on a scale which Peking will certainly find it increasingly difficult to repeat. It wrecked many of the best Communist units so thoroughly that the enemy was forced not merely to halt but to break off the action. He has now retreated beyond range of the terrible United Nations artillery; his supply system is in a shambles which leads General Almond to suspect that he may already be "wilting on the vine," while intimations of efforts to bring up armor and air forces in support carry some hint that even a Chinese conscript army cannot indefinitely survive the brutal expenditure of light-armed infantry masses.

The U. N. field commanders warn against another effort, but they are more confident now than at any time in the past. Many wars have been decided by great defensive victories. The strategic consequences of this one cannot yet be estimated, but to assume that they are nothing and bring us no nearer to a conclusion is to fly in the face of military history. The battle in Korea, tragic as it still may be, is of far greater significance than the battle in the hearing rooms of Washington.

THE CENTRAL POINT

The course of the examination of General Marshall last week took in a great deal of territory, from Washington to Yalta. This was inevitable under the forms of congressional committee procedure and the intense interest of the public in all aspects of far-eastern policy. But it would be extremely unfortunate if, in the meanwhile, the central point of the investigation were lost to sight. That is, of course, the policy to be pursued now in Korea.

In this connection, one of the most significant documents produced by the inquiry to date has been President Truman's message of January 13 to General MacArthur. This was not a directive. But the paraphrase released to the public indicates that it was a clear and comprehensive survey of the political objectives of the Korean war—under the circumstances which prevailed after Red China's intervention—as well as the limitations which both political and military considerations imposed upon American policy in Korea. The advantages of continued United Nations resistance in the peninsula, including a fighting retreat from Korea, if that became necessary, were given forceful expression. Equally pointed were the references to the need for safeguarding and strengthening relations with America's allies and building up the strength of the United States, which acted as a brake upon extending the area of conflict or sending large reinforcements.

It would be impossible, in the light of this note, to allege that the United States does not have a policy in Korea. Many of the objectives stated by the President in those dark January days have already been achieved. The free peoples of Asia have had time to organize—Indochina, for example, has been saved from imminent destruction. Red China's military prestige has been amply deflated. The defense of the West has been stimulated, its unity reinforced. The combination of vigor and restraint foreshadowed in Mr. Truman's message has been of inestimable advantage to America and its associates.

The charge that can be justly leveled against the administration is that it did not make its policy clear and comprehensible to the public. Even with the reservations which diplomacy and the danger of providing too much information to the enemy might require, the fundamental conditions outlined on January 13 might have been told to the American people as plainly and persuasively as they were given to General MacArthur. Had this been done, had there been more candid and effective leadership at home, many of the doubts and confusions which cloud the Korean war need never have arisen.

THE BATTLE IS THE TEST

General Bradley's testimony, so far as it has been allowed to go, has been concise, clear, and distinct with the soldierly qualities of judgment and responsibility which have distinguished this high officer. It has contributed the best brief statement of the case against the MacArthur program—that it would tend toward getting the Nation into "the wrong war, at the wrong place, at the wrong time and with the wrong enemy"—so far offered. And it has confirmed the growing evidence that the facts were in certain important respects other than General MacArthur represented them and certainly very different from what his supporters and enthusiasts have too rashly assumed them to be.

As this became more and more apparent the solemn senatorial search for the "facts" degenerated into an irrelevant partisan and legal wrangle which, after occuping half of Tuesday's session and all of yesterday's (with the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff kept sitting idly in his witness chair most of the time) is still unresolved. But while the Senators in Washington are thus bringing their inquiry down perilously close to the ridiculous, the Eighth Army in Korea and its associated air and naval forces are again writing the real answers to the real issues of our times in blood rather than in words.

It is still a little unclear as to whether the Communists have actually unleashed their second great effort, or are only stepping up the probing attacks which have plainly foreshadowed it. None of the actions of the last day or two seems to have gone beyond the preliminary give-and-take across what amounts to a no man's land; but no one doubts that another major shock is at most a matter of hours. The American commanders are awaiting it with greater confidence, and in seemingly much more strongly prepared positions, than they enjoyed when the first wave was delivered on April 22. But whatever the outcome, it will be far more significant for all questions of future policy and strategy than anything which can possibly be produced in Washington committee rooms. Valid answers for all the problems being bandied among the Senators—what tactics offer best promise of success, what is the relative strength of U. N. mechanized firepower and Chinese infantry masses, which side is being hurt the most, above all, how the war can best be won—can be read only on the ground by the lurid light of actual battle. As the test again impends, it is not only our hopes that concentrate on Korea and its defenders; it is there also that our best thought and soberest powers of analysis must be directed.

Mr. Speaker, I am also glad to incorporate in these remarks the following statement adopted by the executive board of the New York State CIO Council:

STATEMENT ON PRESIDENT'S ACTION RE MACARTHUR

The executive board of the New York State CIO Council fully endorses President Truman's action in removing General MacArthur from his commands.

In reaffirming civilian control over the military, the President has strengthened a vital democratic principle. In making clear the determination of our country to use its fighting strength most effectively to advance the cause of peace and freedom, he has strengthened our leadership in the world.

The President's action was in the best interests of the Nation and its purposes in this time of world crisis. The artificial storms which are being whipped up by reactionary newspapers and politicians for selfish and unpatriotic purposes cannot obscure that fact.

We are certain that the overwhelming majority of the American people join with us in approval of the President's stand.

Urges Amendments to Railroad Retirement Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include a statement concerning amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act prepared for the record of the hearings which are now being held by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee:

STATEMENT OF HON. PAUL W. SHAFER, OF MICHIGAN, BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE, MAY 17, 1951

Mr. Chairman, I am delighted that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce now finds its possible to consider amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act. Along with all other Members of Congress, I am deeply interested in making whatever changes can be made in this act within reasonable bounds of safety.

Since coming to Congress, I have always been interested in the Railroad Retirement Act for two reasons: First of all, inasmuch as the district that I represent contains substantial railroad installations, the welfare of a number of my people is involved. Secondly, I have been keenly interested in the determination on the part of the railroad workers themselves that their retirement system not be a form of socialistic subsidy.

No doubt all of the members of your committee are fully aware of the facts warranting amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act. Except to say that my mail indicates that there is a substantial feeling that benefits for widows and children especially should be improved, I will not go too much into detail as to what I think should be done in the way of amending this act; but rather, if you will permit me, I should like to discuss for a moment the independence of the railroad-retirement system, which I have mentioned above.

Railroad employees and railroad management in combination are now contributing 12 percent of their total payroll to the maintenance of their retirement system. Other workers covered by social security, of course, pay much less. There have been complaints that one system costs too much and the other system costs too little. I am not an actuary and, of course, cannot discuss the merits or demerits of these complaints. I seek only to pay tribute to the railroad employees who have historically insisted that they must pay their own way in the field of retirement. No group has resisted the inroads of socialism in a more determined fashion than these railroad employees.

Any of you who are familiar with my record in matters of labor relations will agree that I have acted in an independent manner. There are times when I agree with the labor unions and times when I do not. I am pleased to say to you today that I am in full agreement with the Railway Labor Executives' Association and their sponsorship of H. R. 3669, a bill whose author is the distinguished chairman of this committee. I have, in the past, found the advice of the Railway Labor Executives' Association in matters affecting the administration of the Railroad Retirement Act to be dependable and honest. They are now proposing a bill which will afford relief to widows and children as well as all other classes of beneficiaries under this act. I therefore am pleased to advise this committee of my support of this bill and I hope that it will be reported expeditiously in order that we may jointly move for passage on the floor of the House.

Delaware's One Hundred and Seventy-fifth Birthday

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. CALEB BOGGS
OF DELAWARE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I am including a newspaper article calling attention to the State of Delaware's one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary. This article appeared in the Wilmington (Del.) Morning News on Tuesday, May 15, 1951. It was written by that well-known Delaware columnist, Bill Frank.

All Delawareans are proud of the glorious history and traditions of the people of the State of Delaware. This article serves as a reminder of the great courage and self-reliance characteristic of our ancestors. Our forefathers were inspired with a vision of keenest foresight and quickly perceived the advantages offered and made Delaware the first State in the Union.

Inspired by great traditions, Delaware continues in the forefront in all fields of endeavor in the great struggle for freedom and human progress under God.

The article follows:

FRANKLY SPEAKING

(By Bill Frank)

Delaware as a State has a birthday anniversary coming up real soon—175 candles, each one burning brightly and proudly through the years.

For it was 175 years ago on June 15 Delaware—through her representatives assembled in New Castle—declared she was no longer a colony under the domination of Great Britain.

And those representatives also further declared that thenceforth our State was to be a part of the United States of America.

We were no longer to be merely three counties on the Delaware but a sovereign State with its own government.

And, actually, our first chief executive was Caesar Rodney, who was then speaker of the assembly, and he replaced Gov. John Penn of Pennsylvania.

In our State histories and in our various studies of the annals of Delaware, we always point to the date of the landing of the Swedes and the founding of New Castle, etc.

All very important—but this beginning of Delaware as an independent State of its own, with a constitution of its own, isn't discussed as much as it should be.

It was on June 15, 1776, that our Delaware Assembly adopted a Declaration of Rights—before the Declaration of Independence became a fact in Philadelphia.

And later on September 20—175 years ago—a convention of Delawareans adopted our first State constitution.

It was not a long-lived constitution. In many ways it was cumbersome and soon had to be replaced—but the fact is that this first constitution plus the Declaration of Rights breathed the very life of independence and freedom.

And it would do all of us good some day to reread this Declaration of Rights and the first constitution of our State—and realize that it took lots of courage and fortitude for our early leading citizens to subscribe to the principles of those documents.

And, coincidentally, it is interesting to note that the New Castle tercentenary comes on June 16 of this year—the day after the anniversary of our State birthday—and also interesting to note that those momentous events of 1776 took place in New Castle.

The Declaration of Rights of 1776 was quite a document. It started off by saying that all government of right originates from the people, and is founded in compact only and instituted solely for the good of the whole.

It continued to declare the rights of the freedom of worship and free elections, the importance of trial by jury, the importance of a well regulated militia, the freedom of the conscience, and that at all times, the military ought to be under the strict subordination to and governed by the civil power.

The Delaware Declaration of Rights also proclaimed that the liberty of the press ought to be inviolably preserved.

This was no perfunctory declaration. It was not a grandstand show of mere grandiose words. We were at war in 1776—and the affairs of the war were not going too well for the American cause.

Here in Delaware, not all our citizens were in favor of independence; not all our residents were in favor of the War for Independence.

Then, in August of that year, began the drafting and later the adoption of our first constitution.

Prof. John A. Munroe, of the University of Delaware, has written that this constitution was the first to be written by any State through a device now generally considered correct—the election of a special convention for that purpose.

In addition to the articles that provided for the mechanics of operating the State government, there were a number of articles based on broad principles of freedom.

For example, article 25 gave the right of lawmaking to the legislature except that no laws could be enacted that were repugnant to the declaration of rights and the State constitution.

Article 26 in very plain and in simple terms declared that "no person hereafter imported into this State from Africa ought to be held in slavery under any pretense whatever and no Negro, Indian, or mulatto slave ought to be brought into this State for sale from any part of the world."

The first State constitution's provision for free and nondominated elections is interesting.

It declared that no persons should go to elections armed and that no muster of the militia shall be made on election day.

And what was more—the constitution declared that no company of armed men, in the pay of the "continent or of this or any other State, be suffered to remain at the time and place of holding said elections, nor within 1 mile of the said (election) places."

No one religious group was to be given preference over another in this State and no clergyman was permitted to hold any civil office.

And the first State constitution concluded with the statement that certain principles of freedom and rights already enunciated should not be "violated on any pretense whatever."

This certainly was very broad and so worded as to prevent any subterfuge of action.

The historians tell us this was not a perfect constitution, though helping in its drafting were distinguished Delawareans—5 later to become governors; 11 to become judges; 3 to become chief justices, and 2 United States Senators.

Maybe it wasn't a perfect constitution but it did establish and guarantee rights to be secured by the action of Delawareans, determined to abide by them.

This then is the year to be remembered in our State.

Statement of Louis P. Tonoli

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to include the statement of my friend and constituent, Louis P. Tonoli, of Clinton, Mass., president-treasurer of the New England Associated Businessmen, at a hearing of the House Small Business Committee at Worcester on April 25. The statement follows:

Mr. Chairman and members, as the head of a business association which numbers most of its members in the small business class, in business myself until a few years ago, and presently connected with the Van Brode Milling Co. of Clinton, Mass., as a contract negotiator in charge of subcontracting for this firm, I believe I am in a position to offer possible suggestions to this committee.

Van Brode Milling Co. is engaged on Government contracts for the Army, Navy and Quartermaster Corps. Cereals, plastics and packaging of rations are among its activities. Recently we have bid on survival kits of large size, most of which we intend to subcontract. At present we intend to bid on a large contract for life-raft accessory kits. If we gain this contract I shall subcontract metal, plastic and cloth items to about 20 subcontractors.

Having operated a small business and done work for the Government myself, I can appreciate how difficult it is for most small firms to do business with the Government. The owner of a small firm in many cases is manager, workman, and even down to floor sweeper in some cases. It is almost impossible for the small-business man to go to the various purchasing agencies as he should each day if he wishes to know the various items the Government has out for bid. Taking a prime contract is out of the question; in most cases he must subcontract certain items which he cannot produce and he has neither the time nor the knowledge to do this work. They are more than pleased when someone like myself comes to their door with an opportunity for them to bid on certain items of which they have an acquaintance. It is of great help to them when, as in many cases, I have the visible item that can be seen besides the blueprint of the article. No matter how acquainted anyone is with prints, looking over what is to be made is of great help.

The procurement agencies state that it is not necessary for any employment to be made and no agents need be employed to secure a contract. They make mention that a daily synopsis sheet is sent out by the United States Department of Commerce to chambers of commerce and accredited business groups.

This is a step in the right direction and does have a great deal of value. However, unknown to some people, there are many small firms who do not belong to chambers of commerce and associations and even now have no idea of this service. To those who take advantage of this information it is helpful, but in the majority of cases by the time they receive bid sheets the bid opening date is most times a week, sometimes less. It is not possible to then write for the necessary specifications and then check for materials because the time is too short. As a result, even the firms who get the synopsis sheets do not pay much attention to them.

The United States Department of Commerce also issues weekly the awards of contracts of over $25,000. This was a great help to small firms until a short time ago. A firm who was interested in getting subcontract work could check as to who got an award and then could contact the firm who got the contract. I know of some firms who got work this way. However, whether for security reasons or otherwise, the award sheets now make no mention of quantity or dollar value as was announced until a while ago. Most certainly the majority of small-business men of my acquaintance would like the sheet brought out as it was previously. This would be helpful to them they feel.

Speaking for an association and as a businessman, I am interested in seeing that New England gets its fair share of procurement work given out by the Government. Present results to date by individuals and groups have been disappointing.

This condition is comparable to the situation in 1940 through 1942, when for these 2 years the small-business man was forgotten. During this period, nearly 16 percent of the small businesses of the United States closed their doors. We do not wish to see such a condition occur again.

As Chairman of the Board of Selectmen of Clinton, I appeared before the Senate Small-Business Committee in Washington in 1941. Some of my suggestions had merit, I believe, and in 1942 the Smaller War Plants Corporation was formed and did much useful work. This group assisted small firms in obtaining nearly a billion dollars in subcontracts and more than $5,500,000,000 in prime contracts. It loaned more than $550,000,000 to small business with insignificant losses. Over 5,000 of New England smaller plants registered with Smaller War Plants Corporation and received contracts for about $000,-000,000 of war materials.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Either a corporation of the Smaller War Plants Corporation type should be set up or a group of a similar type contained within the National Production Authority under the Department of Commerce to handle procurement opportunities for small business.

2. Adoption of the Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN and Congressman RICHARD WIGGLESWORTH bills. These were introduced in the Eighty-first Congress by the respective Congressmen. House Resolution 941 has been reintroduced in the Eighty-second Congress by Congressman PHILIP J. PHILBIN. It is a bill to amend the Armed Services Procurement Act of 1947, with respect to the procurement of supplies from small business concerns and consists of the following:

"That section 3 of the Armed Services Procurement Act of 1947 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (b) of this section if the agency head determines that such action is advisable in the interest of the national defense in order to make or keep suppliers available for furnishing supplies in the event of a national emergency, or that the interest either of industrial mobilization in case of such an emergency, or of the national defense through maintenance of active research and development, will be served by such action, supplies may be procured on the basis of, and in accordance with, an invitation for bids containing provisions which specify—

"'(1) that a part, not exceeding 20 percent of the total procurement involved, when practicable may be withheld from the successor bidder or bidders for distribution among the small-business concerns, not exceeding five, which submit, as to all or such part of the procurement involved as may be specified in the invitation, the lowest bids submitted by small-business concerns; and—

"'(2) that the part of the total procurement so withheld when practicable may be distributed among such small-business concerns (either by acceptance of the bids made by them or by negotiated purchase or contract) on a basis involving payment to each of a price not in excess of 15 percent above the lowest price paid to a successful bidder.'

"SEC. 2. Section 4 of such act is amended by inserting after '2 (c)', wherever appearing therein, the following: 'or 3 (c).'

"SEC. 3. Section 7 (b) of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence: The power of the agency head to make the determinations or decisions necessary under section 3 (c) shall be delegable only to a chief officer responsible for procurement."

3. Revision of Public Law 413 to authorize procurement officers to negotiate or to award contracts on a sliding-scale basis so that the small manufacturers may fairly compete with the larger ones whose advantage in large-scale purchasing and multiple-manufacturing processes virtually eliminates competition.

4. Small plants want defense work but many owners realize that they cannot handle big contracts and as a suggestion some system might be set up so that contracts would be awarded to companies agreeing to subcontract the greatest part of the work. Or a contractor securing a large contract would be required to let out certain percentages of a prime contract.

CONCLUSION

The smaller plants of the country showed their worth in the last war. Some immediate effort should be made so that their facilities could be utilized. In the event of an emergency all the manufacturing plants and the manpower of the country is needed.

I appreciate the opportunity of appearing before this able committee and assure you that both the businessmen and the workers of central Massachusetts as well as of New England thank you for including Worcester in your itinerary.

In Asia We Are Reaping as We Have Sown

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it is an eternal verity that we reap as we have sown. This truth is clearly demonstrated in Asia where we are involved in the Korean war and where the Truman-Acheson policies sold free China down the river. If President Truman, his State Department, and military advisers had not been blind to the truth and facts of a report furnished to the President by Lt. Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer the tragedy now going on would not have happened, and thousands of American boys would not be in their graves in Korea. General Marshall, who was then Secretary of State, consistently refused to permit the Wedemeyer report to be made public. His conduct resulted in tragedy, and by it he has demonstrated his incapacity to hold public office. He should resign.

Mr. Speaker, the United States News and World Report of May 11 contains an excellent article on the Wedemeyer report, and I shall include certain excerpts from it so that Members of this body and the American people generally may fully understand the importance of that report. General Wedemeyer was sent to China on two missions—in 1945 and in 1947. The first one was as commander of the United States forces with those of free China. At that time he reported the Chinese Communists as real Reds and not agrarian farmers.

In 1947 he went to survey general conditions in China and Korea. Upon his return he made a personal report to the President. This report was suppressed until 2 weeks ago, prior to the appearance of General Marshall before a joint Senate committee investigating the MacArthur case. This unconscionable act has cost thousands of American lives and billions of dollars.

The United States News and World Report has this to say:

The real story (1945) of General Wedemeyer's recommendations on China is far more important than the simple account of his 1947 mission and the suppressed report that now is creating such a stir. The 1947 report was only an echo of his earlier efforts to shift the course of United States diplomacy in China.

In 1945, when in command of United States Army forces in China and also chief of staff to Chiang Kai-shek, General Wedemeyer had reported that the Chinese Communists, against whom Chiang was fighting, were not democratic agrarians, but real Communists. He predicted that it would be impossible to work out a coalition of Nationalist and Communist forces and that real civil war would follow.

At that time General Wedemeyer described the weaknesses of the Chiang government and said that Chiang could not gain control of China without American aid. But he said that, with the right kind of American help, Chiang could get and hold all of China up to the Manchurian border.

The general did not think that Chiang could win Manchuria. And for that area he proposed a three-power trusteeship, handled by the United States, Russia, and Great Britain.

That kind of help that General Wedemeyer proposed for Chiang called for temporary American cooperation in the civil and military fields of the same sort that the general himself had been conducting for a year on the military level. With Chiang's agreement, there would be reforms in the army and the government. There was no thought of sending United States troops to fight on Chinese soil.

When his old chief, General of the Army George C. Marshall, went to China a few months after the 1945 report to try his hand at conciliating the Nationalist and Communist forces and bringing them together into a coalition government, General Wedemeyer repeated his warning that this would not work and urged that the United States throw its weight back of Chiang.

But by this time the administration in Washington had given up hope of achieving any sort of cooperation from the Chiang regime. The scathing reports of Lt. Gen. Joseph W. Stilwell, Wedemeyer's predecessor in the China command, still were fresh in mind. There had been too many well-documented reports of corruption in the Chiang government. And in Washington there was still the thought that the Chinese Communists were more reformers than Communists, that they were not tied to Russia.

General Marshall, sick, tired of war, trying to conciliate, cut off help to the Nationalist Government to convince the Communists that he was acting in good faith in his negotiations. Month after month, General Marshall worked patiently. Finally he gave up, went back to Washington and washed his hands of both sides in the dispute.

Mr. Speaker, the above has to do with the 1945 Wedemeyer report and in 1947 General Wedemeyer returned for his last mission being acknowledged as one of the very great authorities on the Far East. I quote again an excerpt from the United States News and World Report:

The Wedemeyer mission in 1947 was one final gesture by General Marshall. He then was Secretary of State, ready to fix a lasting Chinese policy. He sent General Wedemeyer back for a resurvey.

The 1947 report was largely a reiteration of General Wedemeyer's views of 2 years before. He still thought that all of China except Manchuria could be saved from the Communists by giving the right kind of help and advice to Chiang. He still thought of Manchuria as ripe for a trusteeship.

General Wedemeyer proposed a similar government for all of Korea. He found Russia training an army in North Korea, creating a government that was dominated by Communists. He warned that the North Korean army would strike at South Korea after American troops were withdrawn unless a force, officered and controlled by Americans, was developed there strong enough to beat off attacks from the North Koreans.

In Washington, General Marshall ordered the Wedemeyer report suppressed. The decision against Chiang was set. Plans were being made to bring American troops out of Korea. The State Department said it figured that a proposal to take away part of China and put it under a trusteeship in which Russia had a part would not be helpful at that time.

And the distrust of Chiang, with his corruption-ridden administration, ran deep. Thus, China went to the Communists, Chiang fled to Formosa. And the stage was set for Korea. And General Wedemeyer, his ideas running contrary to top strategy, was shunted to an Army sidetrack.

General Wedemeyer had full confidence that the kind of cooperation with Chiang that he had proposed could be carried out. He has seen how it could work.

General Wedemeyer had replaced General Stilwell after the long and bitter feud between General Stilwell and Chiang had reached such a point that neither of them could endure further contact with the other. General Wedemeyer, the youngest lieutenant general in the Army and the youngest theater commander in the war, was plumped into that irritated situation in 1944.

After the acrimonious disputes of the Stilwell regime, General Wedemeyer was a soothing balm to the Chinese situation. But he found the problem aching and acute. The corrupt officials around Chiang were a constant irritant.

General Stilwell had been convinced that the Chiang regime was corrupt from top to bottom and any swap would be for the better. To a large degree, this view came to prevail in Washington. The assumption was that Chinese soldiers would not fight except under American leadership and that reform by persuasion was not possible under Chiang.

Working carefully, General Wedemeyer brought a change. He announced that lack of friendliness to the Chinese would not be tolerated in his command. As a result of this order, he had to send out of the area two major generals, four brigadier generals, and twelve colonels.

The general broke down the tradition that white men do no manual work in the Orient. American officers greased trucks and slid in the mud to teach Chinese officers how to care for equipment and to take cover. Wedemeyer's liaison team slept on plank beds with Chinese soldiers, rode with them on flat cars.

General Wedemeyer found Chinese troops literally starving. He picked 39 divisions to be American sponsored. These got helmets, canteens, leather shoes, modern training and weapons, vitamin pills, inoculations against disease.

Relations improved. Chinese homes were opened to Americans. Chinese saved hundreds of American lives. Once, 60,000 Chinese farmers left their fields to build an emergency airport. And the Wedemeyer-trained troops (Chinese) began to take on the Japanese and win.

Inspired by the Wedemeyer brand of cooperation, Chiang Kai-shek offered to let the United States undertake a complete reorganization of the Chinese Government. The war was still going on and the State Department shied away from accepting such broad responsibility. In Washington, there still lingered the view that Chiang was not to be trusted. But General Wedemeyer, on the ground in China, said Chiang never once failed to carry out an agreement made with him.

This was the background of relations with the Chiang government upon which General Wedemeyer made his proposal for aid to Chiang against the Communists, with the United States to do a clean-up job on the Chiang regime.

Mr. Speaker, ungrateful politicians, incompetent military leaders who refused to face the facts as contained in the Wedemeyer reports not only ignored the recommendations made in them but they actually sabotaged General Wedemeyer and railroaded him to an insignificant military post in the West; all because he had the courage to report his convictions and to tell the truth as he saw it for the good of his country. The New Deal is today paying its price for the perfidity of its conduct toward General Wedemeyer, a great American, a great general and a military statesman.

Mr. Speaker, summarizing the Wedemeyer report of 1947, the United States News and World Report record the situation as follows in crystal-clear fashion:

WHAT GENERAL WEDEMEYER WANTED DONE IN 1947

In China: United States to bolster non-Communists with arms, military missions, technical aid, but no United States troops to stop Communists.

In Manchuria? A United Nations trusteeship.

In Korea: U. N. to create a government for the whole country; United States to build strong South Korean military forces before withdrawing.

WHAT WAS DONE AFTER 1947

In China: United States withdrew major aid to non-Communists, gradually ended technical and other assistance.

In Manchuria: Communists were permitted to take over without opposition.

In Korea: American troops were withdrawn except for a few training units for a Korean constabulary. No provision for strong South Korean military force.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED

In China: Communists took over the whole vast nation, after taking Manchuria. Non-Communist Chinese Government fled to Formosa, which Communists then demanded.

In Korea: Communists built strong military forces, attacked in 1950, started a war in which United States intervened. War has cost 60,000 United States casualties.

Mr. Speaker, here is the record of events which led to the loss of 400,000,000 people—our friends, in China and Korea. Here is the record of failure on the part of the Chief Executive, the President of the United States. In view of this record can there be unity? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the American people will not unite behind leadership which has led from one failure to another, and then into an undeclared war.

Defense Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I am placing in the RECORD as part of my remarks a letter received by me from our colleague, JOHN J. RILEY, together with the letter he refers to, from the secretary of the Western Carolina Council, addressed to the members of the Banking and Currency Committee.

I hope those who voted against the rule, thus prohibiting consideration of the defense housing bill on the floor of Congress, will take note of the tremendous injustice they have worked.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 11, 1951.

Hon. ABRAHAM J. MULTER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: The various towns in South Carolina located around the perimeter of the Savannah River project being built by the Atomic Energy Commission have organized themselves into a western Carolina council for the purpose of assisting the Atomic Energy Commission and the du Pont Co. in the many problems arising out of this project. Membership is voluntary and the representatives have no other thought in mind other than to help the Atomic Energy Commission meet the problems involved.

As I explained to the Banking and Currency Committee when I testified in behalf of H. R. 1272 (H. R. 2988) there is sufficient private capital to construct the necessary homes with the aid of Government-insured mortgages, but there is presently no way to finance the necessary expansion of water, sewage, schools, and hospitals which are necessary. The school districts and municipalities are already bonded to the constitutional limit.

I want to urge that you give every possible consideration to reporting out favorably a housing and facilities bill which will remedy this situation and like problems in other defense areas.

I beg to enclose a copy of a letter which I have just received from the Western Carolina Council sent to me with the request that I transmit it to you.

With kindest regards and best wishes, I am,
Yours sincerely,

JOHN J. RILEY,
Member of Congress.

MAY 9, 1951.

To the Members of the Banking and Currency Committee, House of Representatives, United States Congress, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: The Western Carolina Council, composed of representatives from cities and towns in Edgefield, Aiken, Lexington, Barnwell, Bamberg, Allendale, Orangeburg, and Hampton Counties in South Carolina, desires to call to your attention the following facts:

Due to the location of the Savannah River project of the Atomic Energy Commission in our section, we are faced with many problems. Our communities are unable to handle these problems without the assistance of the Federal Government. Senators MAYBANK, CAPEHART, FREAR, and BENNETT have visited our area and we believe they will support our plea for help. These Senators know that we are doing all that we can to cooperate with the Atomic Energy Commission and the du Pont Co. in the solving of the many problems confronting this area.

Our schools are overcrowded at the present time. Without some assistance we do not see how we can take care of additional children at the beginning of the fall term and estimates from AEC and du Pont officials indicate that we may expect approximately 3,000 additional children in Aiken County alone for the next school year. Now is the time for securing teachers for the next school term. More busses will be needed for transportation as well as additions to buildings. County and State funds are not available.

Our community facilities, especially water and sewerage systems need expansions to take care of the new houses being built and contemplated. The housing situation in each community is critical. Houses are being built by private enterprise, but water and sewerage is essential.

Our hospitals, health, recreation, and welfare agencies are taxed to capacities and are unable to cope with the influx of people without aid from Federal funds.

We have no desire to make money or to speculate on this project. Each community realizes that it has a responsibility to the thousands of good citizens who are coming here to live with us. We want to welcome them with decent homes, good schools for their children, protect their health and welfare and to give them an opportunity to lead normal American lives. Won't you help us to do this? We pledge our full cooperation.

We hope that the delay in the passage of the Defense Housing and Community Facilities and Services Act of 1951 has not been due to politics. These new citizens for whom we seek aid to provide necessary facilities are neither Democrats nor Republicans as far as we know—we consider them simply American citizens who desire to live as Americans should live. We believe that you gentlemen will agree and will do all in your power to secure passage of the necessary legislation.

We deeply appreciate your efforts in our behalf.

Respectfully yours,

SARAH H. BUSCH,
Secretary of Western Carolina Council.

Southern California Faces Severe Water Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, anyone who is familiar with the great Southwest of the United States knows that paramount in the minds of the citizens of the States in that area is always the supply of water. For upon water depends all development and expansion. And upon water ultimately depends the lives of those who live within this area.

The bitter struggle which has developed between Arizona and California over the distribution of the water from the Colorado River is but another chapter in the fight for water in the West. From earliest history the West has seen water as a center for violent controversy. Miners and prospectors hoarded it in their search for gold. Cattlemen fought bloody range wars for control of water rights. And today even with all the modern developments to save, salvage, and store water and to utilize every water source, there is not enough water to supply the needs of the people.

In southern California, the water shortage has reached serious proportions due to the enormous expansion in that area in the last few years. Population in southern California has soared. Industry has grown until the Los Angeles area has passed Pittsburgh as a producer of the Nation's steel supply. The Los Angeles area is the largest production center for aircraft in the Nation, and many other industries are now operated in southern California on a large scale.

But the water table has been going down steadily in the State decreasing the supply for the enormous population concentrated in southern California. Droughts have further depleted the normal water supply, and the present supply from the Colorado River is inadequate to meet industrial, agricultural, and domestic needs. New sources of water must be found and California must now receive all of the Colorado River water to which it is entitled or face serious, even catastrophic, water shortages in the foreseeable future which will curb development and endanger the whole population.

The following is a recent excellent editorial from the Los Angeles Daily News relative to the serious water problem in southern California:

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA MUST FIND NEW WATER SOURCES

As a foreword to a great deal more that will be said later on the subject, your attention today is called to the water situation in California.

To put it bluntly, California is faced with a serious water shortage. It is more serious in some places than in others. In San Diego, for instance, it is against a city ordinance to wash your car with city water.

Los Angeles gets its water mainly from three sources: the Owens Valley, the Colorado River, and wells. These supplies will be inadequate for our anticipated and potential development in the foreseeable future.

Many persons believe that the controversy between California and Arizona over water is academic—a sort of political exercise to such face. Such is not the case. Arizona wants more water to serve the central Arizona project. In Arizona it is believed widely that the water for this is vital. In California the project is regarded as more of a series of dude ranches than anything else and the demand for water for it is denounced as excessive and unreasonable.

NEED ALL WE CAN GET

Leaving aside the question of whether the water supply in the Colorado is dwindling we can be certain of one thing: If the population and industry and farming of southern California are to grow they will need every drop of Colorado River water we can get under the basin States compact. If we don't get it, population will cease to increase by immigration and if the birth rate continues it will mean that many persons will have to leave the area in another generation.

As for the wells as a source of supply every one familiar with them knows the water table is going down. In many places where the table seems to remain static the water is being rendered useless, or worse, by the infiltration of salt.

California must face up to its need for water. Even if we survive war, inflation, and natural disasters the future of civilization here is ultimately doomed if we do not find other sources of water than we now have.

There is some talk about converting sea water to fresh water. It is possible, and even feasible, if we could find fuel cheap enough to operate the necessary machinery. But it is not to this source we must turn immediately. We have got to look for other streams to tap. They exist and we will tell you about them later.

STATE ACTION IS NECESSARY

That is not all. Knowledge without action is futile. We must find the means of acquiring the water after we find its source and that is another matter which we propose to discuss over a period of time.

For the immediate present, suffice it to say that we must act. We must act promptly, forthrightly, and seriously. Also, we must act organizationally. The Colorado River Association has done a superb job in its field. The need now goes beyond the scope of that organization. It is an undertaking which must be met on a State-wide basis. The fact that northern California usually has adequate rainfall while the south doesn't is no excuse for being regional.

Failure to act in the near future will mean that water will be the paramount issue within a decade and it could be that lack of water will mean for us what it already means for large areas in China and India.

More Meat and How To Get It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a pamphlet entitled "More Meat and How To Get It, With a Common Sense Meat Program." It is sponsored by the American Farm Bureau Federation, the American Meat Institute, and other organizations. I ask that it be printed in full in the Appendix of the RECORD. I understand that the printing will cost about $150 more than the cost of printing the two pages allowed under the rule.

There being no objection, the pamphlet was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORE MEAT AND HOW TO GET IT WITH A COMMON-SENSE MEAT PROGRAM—HELP STOP INFLATION, GET MORE MEAT TO CONSUMERS, HELP MEET THE NATIONAL EMERGENCY, BALANCE AND STABILIZE THE ECONOMY, NOW AND AFTER THE EMERGENCY

(A program for a sound three-way attack by (1) farmers and ranchers, (2) consumers, and (3) Congress, that will halt inflation and help restore sound dollars, sponsored by farm organizations, livestock associations, meat-industry groups, and allied businesses)

SUMMARY

There is no shortage of meat. There is inflated demand. A common sense, constructive 3-way attack is proposed—with directions set forth in 20 pamphlets as numbered below:

I. Farmers and ranchers have eight production goals:

Goal 1. More corn and other feed-grain production.

Goal 2. Stretch feed, produce more meat per pound.

Goal 3. Grassland improvement, for more cattle and sheep.

Goal 4. Hogs, a quick and efficient way to more meat.

Goal 5. Beef cattle; more beef is on the way.

Goal 6. Sheep; produce more of critically short wool and lamb.

Goal 7. Poultry; rapid broiler and turkey expansion continues.

Goal 8. Dairy cattle; provide 42 percent of beef and veal.

II. Consumers must help; the way is shown in goal 9, thrifty meat buying and use.

III. Congress and the Federal administration have responsibility to exercise leadership.

Goal 10. Restore sound money.

To get action and to achieve the 10 goals, there are 10 task forces proposed. The following pamphlets suggest how each of the task forces can strike at the causes of inflation.

11. Task force, farm organizations.
12. Task force, livestock associations.
13. Task force, meat industry.
14. Task force, bankers and other financial leaders.
15. Task force, feed manufacturers and dealers.
16. Task force, crop; fertilizer, seed, insecticide, implement, and other dealers.
17. Task force, transportation companies.
18. Task force, service organizations, leaders and managers.

19. Task force, agencies, United States Department of Agriculture and colleges of agriculture.

20. Task force, press and radio.

The common-sense meat program can be an example of what all parts of our economy can do to help stop inflation and restore sound dollars.

It is a direct, positive attack on this problem, not wasteful and negative.

FOREWORD

Inflation grips the United States. Money is rapidly losing its value. In an effort to check this economic catastrophe, price controls have been imposed.

This is an attack on the symptoms of inflation—not on the causes. Such controls conceal the effects of inflation—and divert attention from what must be done to halt inflation.

Price controls on livestock and livestock products and the economy as a whole are not necessary, practicable, or feasible.

This common-sense meat program is a sound and positive solution to control inflation. It is the way in which farmers, ranchers, and allied industries propose to help. But more production, efficient processing, and marketing cannot alone stop inflation.

Congress and the Federal administration must strike at the causes of inflation and unsound dollars.

Consumers must do their part with thrifty meat buying and use.

It is good common sense to cure the reasons for inflation.

Inflation and meat

There is no shortage of meat, according to past rates of consumption. The average consumption per person in the United States will be 148 pounds during 1951—up 3 pounds from last year.

This amount has been exceeded in only 3 of the last 30 years. More meat is on the way.

Cattle on farms increased 5 percent during 1950; beef cows are up 10 percent to a new record high; calves are up 11 percent.

Hog numbers are up 7 percent—and hogs under 6 months of age on January 1 were up 11 percent from 1950.

Sheep numbers increased 4 percent during 1950.

Feed supplies are large, but production must be further increased to care for the rapid livestock expansion.

Prices of meat are at present levels—not because of a lag in production—but because of record high incomes and free spending of consumers. Wages paid to industrial workers went up 17 percent in less than 9 months following the outbreak of war in Korea.

The population increase is almost 2,500,000 each year.

Expansion of the Armed Forces will require about 1,200,000,000 pounds more meat—1 out of each 20 pounds of meat produced.

Farmers and ranchers will boost meat output rapidly—in the production race to outrun the increased need—and in an effort to meet the inflated demand. Only lack of confidence in future markets, due to man-made regulations, can cause them to cut back.

Obviously, producers must take into consideration the various and numerous business risks inherent in a program of this nature. Such risks may be even greater than they are in normal times.

This production program stresses increased efficiency by the producer. It is equally essential, however, that all of the other members of the meat team, livestock-marketing groups, packers, and retailers, along with allied industries, constantly strive to do an even more efficient job of processing and marketing. All must help.

This program is a common-sense attack on inflation—to restore free prices and markets and sound dollars.

COMMON SENSE MEAT PROGRAM—A SOUND THREE-WAY ATTACK

I. Farmers and ranchers must do an outstanding meat-production job.

Livestock men must assume some extra risks. No one can predict the weather, the trend toward war or peace, the price at market time, or political actions in Washington.

Nevertheless, they must push forward to produce more meat. There must be a genuine effort to meet the larger demand with more and more production.

This does not mean that individuals should risk their financial security—or the future welfare of their families.

It does mean that risk of less profits is justified in the effort to help meet the emergency—on a positive, constructive basis.

This will be accomplished by the full cooperation and help of all their allied businesses and industries. Meat processors, marketing agencies, retailers, bankers, feed manufacturers and dealers, fertilizer companies, implement manufacturers and dealers, transportation organizations and companies, and all others that help produce, process, or sell livestock and meat must help.

The assistance of the press and radio will be indispensable.

The United States Department of Agriculture, agricultural colleges, and all agricultural agencies should concentrate on giving assistance in more meat production.

II. Consumers must be thrifty meat buyers. They should buy the meat that is most available—guidance by seasons will be suggested.

Consumers can buy more of the less expensive—but equally nutritious—cuts, to get more for the meat dollar.

Home storage and lockers may be used to help carry meat from peak production to scarcity seasons. Buying canned and other meats when supplies are plentiful, to be used in higher price periods, is not hoarding but is an aid in maintaining more even prices and meat supplies all year.

Home economists, the press and radio, consumer groups and all stores selling meat must help promote thrifty meat buying and use.

III. Congress and the Federal Administration must strike at the cause of inflation and unsound dollars by—(1) restrictions on expansion of money supply; (2) strict economy by Government, thereby setting an example for business and individuals; (3) pay-as-you-go taxation; (4) limitations on consumer credit; (5) encouragement of individual savings.

This three-way attack by farmers and ranchers, consumers, and Congress will stabilize the economy—now and after the emergency.

SECTION I

More meat must be produced with efficient methods. Farmers and ranchers should grasp this opportunity to supply consumers more of what they want.

Each organization, business, or agency participating in this program will receive suggestions on what to do, how to proceed, and proper timing of actions. Write for instruction pamphlets and suggestions if you want to help.

Every business has a huge stake in stabilizing the economy. Unless inflation is brought under control, the "free choice" system that has made America great may be permanently destroyed.

The action programs are built around the following:

Goal 1. More corn and other feed grain production

Feed must be produced to maintain and expand the meat output. The amount of feed grains produced tends to set upper limits on the amount of meat produced.

Where equipment is available, the use of anhydrous ammonia, or other nitrogenous fertilizers, should be encouraged to boost yields.

Agricultural college authorities state, "The amount of meat we can produce depends primarily upon two things: First, the quantity of feed we produce; and, second, the efficiency with which we feed it."

The critical planting season has already started.

March 1 planting intentions of farmers show only a 1.6 percent increase in the corn acreage over last year—a total of 85,694,000 acres. It will not be enough—far short of real needs.

The United States Department of Agriculture is asking for 90,000,000 acres. Secretary of Agriculture Brannan is urging increased feed production to support increased livestock production for national defense.

Keep established rotations and sound crop programs for the long pull but work in more corn now, where practical.

Grain sorghum acreage should be as large as last year.

This is the corn crop of the West—and more grain will be urgently needed in the West.

Farmers intend to plant less grain sorghum than last year—the indicated slash in grain sorghum production is one-half.

This would be a grave mistake.

Strive for as large a grain sorghum acreage as last year. It is production needed to bolster the national defense.

All feed grains will be urgently needed. Corn reserves are being pulled down fast—already higher feed prices are causing some farmers to cut back on hogs and poultry. The major effort on this crop production campaign must be made immediately—and up to July 15.

Goal 2. Stretch feed

(a) This is a basic and continuing program to produce more meat per pound of feed. It will—get more meat to consumers, increase farm production, step up the volume of all businesses, stretching feed is one of the most urgent needs of the Nation.

(b) Making the same amount of feed produce more pounds of meat is even more effective than merely growing more grain.

(c) Look at the various livestock programs for stretch-feed ideas, such as—save every pig; vaccinate and get rid of worms; use pasture to the limit—this is the least expensive feed; balance rations—let county agents, agricultural teachers and feed dealers help; avoid bruising and crippling of livestock, to protect feed investment; feed salt and other minerals; don't waste feed-producing excess fat; kill rats—this is now easy to do with warfarin; each will eat or waste 2 to 3 bushels of feed; cull constantly—get high production per animal; use all feed—byproducts, damaged grains and all of the plants; keep livestock healthy; keep livestock gaining.

(d) The urgency of the "stretch feed" campaign will build up with livestock numbers—and will be extremely acute should drought strike.

Efficient use of feed can add at least 20 percent more meat for consumers and reduce the production costs of farmers and ranchers.

The methods of efficient feed use are well known. The most able producers get high meat output per feed used. Many feed companies and dealers are doing a good job of promoting better feeding.

Stretch feed to the limit for national defense and stability.

Goal 3. Grassland improvement

Every business, farm, and livestock organization should throw its full influence back of pasture and range land improvement—and wise management.

H. E. Babcock, the great agricultural statesman, until his recent death, "beat the drums" for a strong animal agriculture.

A strong animal agriculture builds a strong Nation: (1) Animal agriculture builds the soil; (2) animal agriculture is our best food reserve; (3) animal agriculture is the backbone of the family farm; (4) animal agriculture provides the nutritious foods we need most and like best; (5) animal agriculture is one of our best guarantees for continued prosperity and stability.

Fortunately, the United States Department of Agriculture and land-grant colleges and universities in November 1950 jointly announced such a program and pledged:

"The colleges and the Department will work together with all their resources to gain the widespread improvement of the Nations billion acres of pasture, hay land, and range.

"Better grasslands will provide a solid base for the expansion of the production of meat and other livestock products.

"Grasslands improvements will produce benefits in which the participating farmers, the people and the Nation as a whole will share in the near future as well as in the years which lie further ahead."

A 10-point program was announced. These included the following suggestions:

(a) Pasture is cheap feed.

(b) Apply more lime and fertilizers.

(c) Mow weeds and get rid of brush, cactus and other damaging vegetation.

(d) Do more seeding—and use the best grasses and legumes.

(e) Spread runoff waters on the range.

(f) Irrigate more pastures.

(g) Grassland improvement is the effective way to insure carrying the increased cattle and sheep numbers—and to be sure that they will carry heavy weights when sold off of grass.

(h) Even 5 to 10 acres improved pasture per farm will be a tremendous help. Do not seed down productive land needed for feed grain production.

(i) Every rancher should step up grassland improvement and use the grazing management that will produce more beef and lamb for the years ahead.

(j) Farmers should see their county agent and PMA office for details on the grassland improvement program.

Goal 4. Hogs

Hogs are highly efficient and are profitable converters of grain into meat.

Through two litters per year pork production can be rapidly expanded.

Pork output can be expanded quickly with hogs now on farms by feeding to heavier weights as a temporary measure—but don't waste feed by going above 260 pounds.

After September, save grain by selling at lighter weights—about 225 pounds.

All farmers producing hogs should be reached through seasonal information vital to maintaining an adequate and profitable output of pork. In this they must have the assistance of all allied industries and agencies. Here are examples of actions that will pay off in more meat for consumers and increased income to farmers:

April and May is the time to insure a large fall pig crop. More sows and gilts should be bred.

There is currently plenty of corn and with this program there should be no acute future shortages. Hogs raised largely on grass and byproducts should sell well and help bolster the food supply.

"For fattening pigs, all the good pasture they will eat will save 15 percent on corn and 35 percent on protein. For sows, good pasture will save half the feed during gestation for fall pigs." (University of Missouri.)

A succession of catch crops should be planted to stretch-feed grains by providing continuous succulent grazing.

Full feed early spring pigs to sell at high prices when pork is scarce during the July-September period.

Feed balanced rations. Self feeding cuts labor and saves feed.

"Feeding worms in hogs is expensive—when three ears of corn are tossed to wormy pigs, one ear goes to the worm and the other two to the pigs." (Alabama Polytechnic Institute.)

A south Georgia farmer last year produced over 1,000 pounds of pork an acre, hogging off early hybrid corn. The hogs were sold on the high September market. More pork can and should be produced in the South and West.

Farmers, especially those with less than 5 or 10 sows, should, where practical, add more gilts. When enough hogs are produced to make a larger enterprise, the hogs receive more attention—and profits go up on all the hogs. Purchase of any additional feed that may be needed will be profitable—if used efficiently.

Pork is the quick and profitable way to get more meat to consumers to the limit of feed-grain supplies.

Goal 5. Beef cattle

Breeding herds are being rapidly increased—cows up 10 percent over last year. More beef is on the way.

About 85 percent of United States beef is produced without corn. Good quality beef can be sold off grass—it must be accomplished on more farms and ranches.

The major problem will be to outrun the uptrend in cattle numbers with the grasslands improvement program.

"In time of need, two bushels of corn can be stretched to do the work ordinarily done by three in some kinds of cattle feeding." (Iowa State College.)

A big tonnage of beef—rather than wasteful high finish, must be the goal. Feed cattle with a minimum of grain.

Make full use of silage, by-products, corncobs, beet pulp, and other such feeds for putting more weight on cattle.

Supplemental feeding on grass to get larger gains on market cattle this summer is recommended where practical.

Texas A. & M. authorities urge, "Control parasites with special attention to fly control. Use bulls tested for rate of gain. Overcome mineral deficiencies by direct feeding of bone meal or by fertilizing pastures."

Don't hold cows that are too old or uncertain breeders. "Range cows produce their best calves during their fourth to eighth years." (Montana Experiment Station.)

"Expand the production of fall calves. This will reduce death losses and speed up production." (University of Nebraska.)

Expand cow herds in farming areas—especially in the South.

Better feeding in the South is largely dependent on producing better pastures—fertilizing and seeding.

Georgia State College authorities stress the importance of making cattle heavier before selling. Better grade calves especially should be carried to near 1,000 pounds which will more than double the beef from the same animal.

Full use must be made of all practical methods of producing more beef—and at lower costs.

Grow cattle to older ages to get heavier weights, before fattening, where pasture and roughage can be produced to carry more cattle.

Goal 6. Sheep

Sheep numbers, after being cut almost one-half, are now being increased—up 4 percent in 1950.

Such additions to the meat supply will be small for several years. Ewes held off the market for breeding will largely offset extra lambs for market.

More ewe lambs must be retained by both ranchers and farmers. More small farms should have sheep flocks. Flocks of 40 or more ewes should be on more farms.

Sheep fit in with glassland improvement, goal 3, as they help control weeds and need little but pasture and hay as feed.

Consumer discrimination against heavy lambs should be minimized.

Desperately short wool supplies as well as scarce lamb gives a double reason for rapid increase of sheep.

Goal 7. Poultry

For 16 years broiler production has gone up very rapidly. This increase will continue during 1951.

Broilers furnish a quick supply of meat. Large-scale and low-cost production per bird has encouraged expansion.

Turkey production will set a new all-time high in 1951.

Thrifty consumers should recognize that "A large tom turkey gives 15 to 20 percent more cooked meat for your money than a small bird—whether you buy a whole, large bird or half of one." (Washington State College.)

Goal 8. Dairy cattle

Dairy cows give a two-way income—milk and beef.

Dairy cattle make up 42 percent of the total beef and veal supply. This is nutritious and wholesome meat.

The supply of beef can be materially increased by putting more weight on dairy animals before they are sold for beef.

Profitable dairying is practical without major use of feed grains, since 85 percent of the milk production capacity of milk cows can be obtained from good quality pasture and roughage.

Keep all the dairy heifers from high-producing cows. Grow them into big cows. They will produce more milk—and bring more as beef when sold out of the milking herd.

Some low-producing milk cows, especially of the heavier breeds, can be bred to beef bulls—to produce more veal and beef. Artificial breeding associations now have beef bulls put in at the request of milk cow owners. For example all dairymen in Ohio can get the use of beef bulls for their dairy cows.

Cows having been culled from the milking herd should be allowed to fatten on pasture and fed roughage and supplements when profitable to do so before selling. Low-producing milk cows should be culled more promptly and turned into beef to save feed and labor.

Dairy steers, especially from heavy breeds, usually can be grown and profitably fattened on grass—for more beef.

The sale of lightweight young dairy cattle for slaughter should be discouraged. Farmers with extra grass and forage should buy such animals and put on for additional gains—thus increasing the tonnage of beef.

Vealers should be grown to heavier weights before being sold where practical. In areas of low-priced milk this is especially profitable.

Ohio State University dairy specialists recommend, "Feed veal calves to market weights of 180 to 200 pounds. Dairy farmers can profit in beef sideline."

The quick and easy method of selling "bobbie" calves should be discouraged. By growing them into heavy veal calves the meat output is more than doubled and profits are often increased.

More use should be made of calf meals—they can replace practically all of the milk for even young calves.

Dairymen need not give up milk production to market more beef. By management adjustments they can continue in milk production and sell one-third more beef and veal.

SECTION II

Thrifty meat buying and use by consumers will enable them to buy more meat.

This means higher diet levels—better nutrition for more people—and more stability for farmers and ranchers.

It will help stabilize the economy—now and after the emergency.

Each organization, business, or agency participating in this program will receive suggestions on what to do, how to proceed, proper timing of action.

Write for such suggestions if you want to help stop inflation and restore sound dollars.

Goal 9. Thrifty meat buying and use

There is no shortage of meat. There is a great increase in demand for meat caused by more people who have more money and want to spend it for food.

There will be an average of about 148 pounds of meat per person during 1951—more than in any other recent year, except 1944, 1946, and 1947, when the supply was slightly larger. (Kansas State College.)

Guidance in thrifty buying of meat and planning of meals around less popular cuts will help keep prices in line. Housewives can profit by using a greater variety of meat cuts and can add more appeal to their meals.

Farmers do not set the price of meat—it is set by consumers as they bid against each other. Price control will not correct this situation but will bring hardship to both producers and consumers.

Price controls lead to rationing, black markets, disrespect for law, unsanitary practices, loss of byproducts (including insulin and other important new drugs), and less meat for consumers.

There are many sources through which consumers now obtain guidance for thrifty meat buying and use. Two examples of these are:

The National Livestock and Meat Board, which has national coverage through its homemaker's service.

American Meat Institute publicity for newspapers, magazines, radio, and retail advertisements, which regularly carry meat buying and use guidance for thrifty housewives.

We must concentrate on telling food buyers how to be thrifty in making purchases. We must also educate consumers on how to prepare and serve meat in order to obtain its full value. Over 10 percent of the nutrition of meats is lost because of poor cooking methods and poor meal planning.

Less tender cuts of meat are just as nutritious as the tender steaks. "All meat is tender if it is cooked correctly." (Purdue University.)

SECTION III

While farmers, ranchers, allied industries, agencies and consumers work at their jobs of producing more meat and thrifty buying and use of meat—

Congress and the Federal administration have the responsibility to exercise leadership to control inflation.

It is to strike at the cause of inflation and unsound dollars.

All across the Nation there is demand for such action.

Goal 10. Restore sound money

The methods of stopping inflation and the dwindling value of dollars are well known. Prompt and definite action is needed in Washington on: (1) Restrictions on expansion of money supply; (2) strict economy by Government, thereby setting an example for business and individuals; (3) pay-as-we-go taxation; (4) limitations on consumer credit; (5) encouragement of individual savings.

All citizens who have savings, life insurance, bonds, pensions, and other such property should continue to call upon Congress for action. Write your Senators and Representatives.

The University of Illinois suggests to farmers, "Our Government is responsible for inflation. The Constitution of the United States says that 'Congress shall have the power * * * to coin money (and) regulate the value thereof. * * *' But Congress usually does what it thinks the people want."

The University of Minnesota points out that "A life-insurance policy which would have provided $1,000 of purchasing power in 1946 now yields less than $600.

"An E bond purchased 10 years ago matures this year at a higher dollar value but the latter represents less buying power than the original investment.

"The citizen is under obligation to buy bonds. His Government is under obligation to do everything within its power to assure the purchaser that the value of the bonds will not evaporate through inflation."

Inflation must be stopped or much past and future savings will continue to be wiped out. The dollar is worth about 50 cents—savings are worth far less than they were 10 years ago.

Congress must act if the economy is to be stabilized. This will require an aroused public demanding action—to get action in Washington.

Let your Senators and Representatives know what you want done—they want to act according to the will of the people.

Task Forces

Farmers, ranchers, and consumers need as allies all businesses and fellow citizens. All must join the fight on inflation.

This common sense meat program can be an example of what all parts of our economy must accomplish to stop inflation and restore sound dollars.

To that end, 10 task forces are proposed.

The following list of brief pamphlets suggests how each can quickly bring tremendous forces to bear on the inflation and national stability problem.

Request any or all of these pamphlets—then launch out in a vigorous attack on the causes of inflation—not the symptoms.

This is a sound positive attack—not wasteful and negative.

11. Task force farm organizations: Production goals 1 to 8 will be the special objectives of this task force.

12. Task force livestock associations: This task force will combine the leadership of breeders, feeders, and marketing men.

13. Task force meat industry: Goal 9, thrifty meat buying and use, will be a major objective. Processing and marketing must be efficient.

14. Task force bankers and other financial leaders: Inflation is a problem of money and economics. Leadership from finance will be be especially effective.

15. Task force feed manufacturers and dealers: Goal 2, stretch feed, and sound livestock management will be the field of major service for this task force.

16. Task force crop—fertilizers, seed, insecticide, implement, and other dealers: This task force will work on goal 1, more corn and other feed production, and goal 3, grassland improvement.

17. Task force transportation companies: Railroads, truck companies, and individuals doing hauling of livestock, feeds, and supplies are a vital task force.

18. Task force service organizations, leaders, and managers: In this task force will be chambers of commerce, service clubs, farm managers, and others who will help.

19. Task force agencies, United States Department of Agriculture, and colleges: The Federal and State agricultural workers can be depended upon for aggressive help and guidance.

20. Task force press and radio: The assistance of the press and radio is indispensable. Goals 1 to 10 offer numerous service opportunities.

Organizations cooperating to put this common-sense meat program over, include the following: American Farm Bureau Federation; American Meat Institute; American National Cattlemen's Association; American Stockyards Association; Central Livestock Association, Inc.; Independent Livestock Marketing Association; Kansas Livestock Association; Missouri Livestock Association; National Committee of Livestock Order Buyers and Dealers; National Council of Farmer Cooperatives; National Grange; National Independent Meat Packers Association; National Lamb Feeders Association; National Livestock Auction Association; National Livestock Exchange; National Live Stock Producers Association; National Livestock and Meat Board; National Wool Growers Association; Producers Livestock Cooperative; Texas & Southwestern Cattle Raisers' Association; Western States Meat Packers Association, and other national, regional, and State associations.

"The Story of the Men of the United States Air Force, Daily Flying Their Jets Fully Armed Along the Boundaries of the Iron Curtain, Is One of the Least-Known Stories of the American Defense of Western Europe"—Mr. Robert McCormick

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, the echo of acclaim attesting General MacArthur's presence in the Nation's Capital had hardly died before the assistant to the President, the Honorable John R. Steelman, made still further and factual report to the American people on some newer phases of the current problems facing this country. This he did by way of the teledocumentary, Battle Report, Washington, broadcast each Sunday afternoon for 6 months past over the National Broadcasting Co.'s television network and coaxial cables.

The television program Battle Report, Washington, has long since proved itself to be one of the most popular of all weekly news telecasts emanating from the Nation's Capital. On this program, each week, Dr. John R. Steelman presents top-flight officials of the Federal Government to make report to the American people with respect to official matters that come under their immediate supervision.

The statements made by Dr. Steelman and his invited guests are altogether so illuminating that I am taking opportunity of again directing them to the attention of this House.

To make the program even more interesting, some 3 or 4 weeks ago, the National Broadcasting Co. dispatched its ace commentator, Robert McCormick, to Europe. He went to learn, first-hand, the conditions obtaining on the Continent in order that he might bring that report back for the information of the public and use on the Battle Report, Washington, program.

He returned to America some 10 days ago, and, last Sunday, Dr. Steelman presented Mr. McCormick, along with other guests, on the afternoon's program.

Mr. McCormick's presentation of his observations, especially of Air Force activities, is chock full of reader interest as he tells of American jets which—

Every daylight hour of the day, and every day of the week, fully armed, and ready for action, they patrol the entire United States zone of occupied Germany. The nearest Russian-dominated border only 6 minutes away by air.

The story of these men of the United States Air Force, who daily fly along the boundaries of the iron curtain, is one of the most dramatic and least-known stories of the American defense of Western Europe.

Authenticated by a personal statement made to Mr. McCormick by Lt. Gen. Lauris Norstad, and the short statement made by Col. John S. Chennault, commander of the Eighty-sixth Fighter-Bomber Wing, Mr. McCormick's story of the splendid work done by the German weathermen and German radio operators, and other technicians, is interestingly discussed by a German radio operator, who said:

I am only one of the typical Germans who like to do my job, and I like to work together with the Americans, and not only the Americans, but the French and English people—and you know what a war can do. And I feel that it is now a time of crisis and we have to stand all together, and I will do my part of the work here in the Air Force. (Excuse me, I have to take now a message.)

Of more than passing interest to mothers and fathers of America was the statement made by Maj. Gen. Harry G. Armstrong, USSAF, who reported as to the physical and moral conditions of the men of our Air Force in the Pacific theater, as well as in Alaska.

Accompanying General Armstrong on a recent visit in survey of these areas was Dr. Elmer Henderson, eminent surgeon and president of the American Medical Association, as well as six outstanding medical consultants.

In discussing air evacuations made in Korea to date, General Armstrong said, in part:

So far, in the Korean affair more than 121,000 persons have been evacuated by air within Korea and Japan, including many patients transported more than once. There have not been that many casualties. In the next phase, the Military Air Transport Service has transported more than 22,000 patients from Korea to the United States. Not all of them are combat casualties. All of these patients have been evacuated by air and without a single death due to mishandling or aircraft failure.

Mr. Speaker, this particular program of Battle Report, Washington is so full of human interest and contains so much that is pertinent to our fighting men in foreign lands that I particularly commend it to the reading of my every colleague in this House.

That they might have an opportunity of reading the same, I now ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein the thirty-fourth Battle Report, Washington as broadcast by Dr. John R. Steelman and his guests a week ago last Sunday.

That program was as follows:

BATTLE REPORT, WASHINGTON

Mr. MCCORMICK. As this hero's welcome Washington gave MacArthur continues to echo throughout the Nation—once again NBC Television turns its cameras on the Nation's Capital for a report on the battle that continues in Korea.

Washington, which called upon Gen. Matthew Ridgway to take command in the Far East, and Korea, where the troops he led advanced farther north against the slowly yielding Reds.

Today, Battle Report focuses on an exclusive film report of our jet bomber-patrol in Germany, then on the Surgeon General of our Air Force. But, first, a word from the assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. Ever since the dawn of history, the return of military heroes has been an occasion for rejoicing and celebration. We are no different from our ancestors in this respect. And rightly so. Men who have dedicated their lives to the defense of their homelands have earned the homage of the people.

I wish it were possible, this afternoon, to tell you that the days of struggle are ended and our celebrations of the past week marked the dawn of peace. But, this is not the case. The vicious, warmongering propaganda of the Soviet still goes on. Hundreds of millions of persons are being taught to hate the United States, and thus, are being conditioned for war. The Soviet repeatedly has blocked all efforts to reach a just and enduring peace through honorable negotiation.

And every hour of every day they hang the threat of war over our heads like the sword of Damocles. Let me give you some cold, hard facts.

Under the hammer and sickle of the Soviet Union itself there are at least 4,100,000 men, armed with the newest and most formidable weapons. Of these, at least 300,000 are in Germany and 100,000 in Manchuria, which borders Korea.

The subservient satellite nations also are armed to the teeth. According to the latest reports, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Albania now have at least 795,000 men under arms. And, in China, there is an almost inexhaustible reservoir of manpower.

These vast armies are poised to strike. They are like daggers at the heart of the free world—and their ultimate target is the United States.

Obviously, this is no time for complacency.

Obviously, our defense program must continue at an ever-increasing tempo.

Obviously, it is time for every citizen to put his shoulder to the wheel and do his part.

This afternoon we will see how one of the borders of the free world is being patroled night and day by the Eighty-sixth Fighter Bomber Wing of our Air Force. Robert McCormick saw it when he was in Europe last month and ordered it recorded on film by the NBC camera team, Charles and Eugene Jones.

With us in the studio is a distinguished officer, Maj. Gen. Harry G. Armstrong, Surgeon General of the Air Force. He is here to tell us how the lives of our airmen are being saved.

And now let us continue with this week's Battle Report, Washington.

VOICE. This is NBC Cameraman Gene Jones, all dressed up with some place to go. On assignment to document Europe with his brother Charlie, here Gene prepares to film the sixth of our exclusive teledocumentaries—eighty-sixth fighter-bomber wing in Germany—America's jet patrol along the border of the iron curtain. Stand by for another NBC first-voiced by our narrator, not long returned from Germany, Robert McCormick.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Every daylight hour of the day, every day of the week, American jets like these, fully armed and ready for action, patrol the entire United States zone of occupied Germany. The nearest Russian-dominated border—only 6 minutes away by air. The story of these men of the United States Air Force who daily fly along the boundaries of the iron curtain is one of the most dramatic and least-known stories of the American defense of Western Europe.

We invite you now to start upon this story as we did, at the home of the Eighty-sixth, the Neubiberg Air Base, once the home base of Nazi combat air units that flew on bombing missions in World War II against France and other allied countries. We ask you to begin by listening, as we did, to the commander of our Atlantic Pact air forces, Lt. Gen. Lauris Norstad.

Lieutenant General NORSTAD. I am pleased to participate in this program which has for its purpose bringing to the American people first-hand knowledge of their interests and activities overseas. This part of the program focuses attention on one element of our Armed Forces overseas, the United States Air Forces in Europe. This command has responsibilities in the United Kingdom, in Europe proper, and in north Africa. At the typical Air Force base pictured here, you will see some of our most modern aircraft and the men and facilities which support them. These forces, joined with those of the other western nations form the nucleus around which will be built the strength and alert essential to the preservation of peace.

Mr. MCCORMICK. The story of our Eighty-sixth fighter-bomber wing in Europe is first the story of efficiency. Radar, constantly screening the border, keeps our squadrons on a 24-hour ready alert. And this truck houses the base's GCA equipment that helps guide planes to a safe landing in bad weather.

While these electronic eyes are at work, careful attention is paid to every detail designed to keep our planes armed and ready. The loading of these heavy bombs, for instance.

Each plane carries two 1,000-pound bombs, or up to 32 rockets.

Belts of ammunition are prepared, too, for the jets' 50-caliber machine guns. All these installations are checked and double-checked. No plane goes on patrol without being combat-loaded.

Meanwhile, the pilots who fly these F-84-E jets prepare to take to the air for their stint on the border patrol.

Not without their mascot, of course.

Take a good look at them, America. Average age 26. Many of them are veterans of combat in World War II. One out of seven has his family with him in Europe. As these selected men—proud of their esprit de corps—get ready to board their planes, let us now take a look at some of the men behind them. You are in the base's weather station. Listen.

GERMAN WEATHERMAN. They have now cleared at 3,000 and they will hold that way, keep 3,000 to 4,000 with occasional ceiling at 3,500, but they should break up by tonight.

UNITED STATES CAPTAIN. Will that hold up to 1,800?

GERMAN WEATHERMAN. Oh, yes; the weather is very nice up there for flying.

UNITED STATES CAPTAIN. Well, Warren, that looks like a good forecast for today.

GERMAN WEATHERMAN. I think we traced that area for that bad weather very well for today.

UNITED STATES CAPTAIN. How long have you been forecasting here?

GERMAN WEATHERMAN. About 5 years.

UNITED STATES CAPTAIN. Were you with the German air force previously?

GERMAN WEATHERMAN. Yes; I was a forecaster. Quite some years ago I volunteered to have a forecaster's position here with the American Air Force, and I like it very well because the operation is about the same as it was before.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Here is a former member of the German Navy now working at the base as radio operator.

GERMAN RADIO OPERATOR. I am only one of the typical Germans who like to do my job, and I like to work together with the Americans, and not only the Americans, but the French and English people, and you know what a war can do. And I feel that it is now a time of crisis and we have to stand all together, and I will do my part of the work here in the Air Force. (Excuse me, I have to take now a message.)

Mr. MCCORMICK. Yes; we found carefully screened German civilians at work throughout the base on hundreds of jobs—from responsible weather-communications posts to building this new runway.

Back now to the pilots who have this team behind them.

Before taking off, they go over the last-minute details on the day's patrol. And now, each to his own Thunderjet.

Here comes the signal from the tower, and one by one the jets pull out of line to taxi into position. Here's the takeoff.

They buzz the radar truck on the outskirts of the field and off they go.

You are now flying along the borders of the iron curtain countries at 600 miles an hour in a plane with a cruising range of over a thousand miles.

Sometimes you fly high above the clouds. Sometimes you skim the rolling fields below. Windows open on the ground below as people scan the sky to see you roar by. Men pause in their daily tasks to mark your passing, and children playing some German folk game are suddenly excited by the sight of you.

High up in the air, you go about your business, your eyes searching the heavens for some plane that might be trying to sneak across the border. Could it be an enemy bomber? Or is it some friendly aircraft off course? You decide "let's take a look."

The bigger plane seems to stand still as you dive in upon it. It's a friendly plane unknowingly off its course, so you continue on.

Hours go by, just this way. But before returning to your base, you receive orders by radio. For a test of your marksmanship ability, you are ordered to proceed at once to the rocket range for three low-level strafing approaches. You say, "Roger" and do just that.

Suddenly, unknown to you—a tragedy. A jet fighter on routine patrol crashes several miles from the field. The field ambulance and fire-fighting truck rush to the scene of the wreckage. With the latest fire-fighting equipment, men go to work on the flames. But it is too late to do anything at all for the pilot.

Thus, even though there is not yet combat in Europe, the hazard of death constantly faces these airmen on patrol to keep the peace.

And now, to close "Border Patrol, Germany," let's join the son of the famed Flying Tigers of China. Yes; Col. John S. Chennault, commander of this Eighty-sixth Fighter-Bomber Wing since World War II.

Colonel CHENNAULT. This unit, like other Air Force units in Europe, has been assigned certain specific missions. We are all keenly aware of our responsibilities as America's first line of defense in Europe. We are prepared and ready to go.

Mr. MCCORMICK. As U. N. ground forces battle to the hills beyond the Hwachon Reservoir, from the Eighth Army's new commander comes word that the Communists' next move is anybody's guess. Says Lieutenant General Van Fleet, "There's a definite build-up. I imagine the enemy would like to take another shot at us. We're ready for him if he does." Meanwhile, the air war grows hotter. More and more, our strafing jets—shown at work here—and our bombers, too, are meeting swarms of Russian-made Migs itching for combat. Just back from a first-hand survey of the medical needs of our pilots, and other Air Force personnel in the Pacific, comes our next guest. For the first public report on his trip, the Surgeon-General of the Air Force, Maj. Gen. Harry G. Armstrong.

Major General ARMSTRONG. Our trip was extensive in that we visited most of the Air Force medical installations in the Pacific theater and Alaska. Our party included six outstanding civilian medical consultants to the United States Air Force, among whom was Dr. Elmer Henderson, an eminent surgeon and president of the American Medical Association.

One of the things that particularly impressed us is the very high morale of all Air Force personnel, both line and medical. The closer we approached the battle lines, the higher the morale. The best of all is with the advanced fighter units and the medical air evacuation squadron flying from forward airstrips in Korea.

The high morale of medical personnel can be attributed to several things. Young doctors in the service are better trained than ever before, and our present medical organization makes it possible to assign them to fields within their chosen specialties. By utilizing these men in their specialties and keeping them busy, we require fewer medical personnel in proportion to troop strength. They are doing a wonderful job, working hard, and each one is making a definite contribution to the total effort. These young doctors are gaining valuable experience, though sometimes practicing under adverse conditions.

All in all, our military personnel are now getting the best medical care in the history of military medicine. A concrete evidence of this superior medical care is the very low mortality rate among combat casualties, which is less than one-half that in World War II. There are several specific factors contributing to this achievement: better and quicker medical treatment in the front lines including the use of blood and blood plasma derivatives; the extensive use of antibiotics, and so-called miracle drugs which drastically reduce the dangers of infection; and we are exploiting the concept of air evacuation of sick and wounded. The concept of air evacuation is roughly divided into two phases. The first carries the casualty from the aid station to a forward surgical hospital and then to a fixed hospital in an area further to the rear or to Japan. Helicopters are proving invaluable in the forward areas for this work, frequently going behind enemy lines for crash casualties or wounded ground troops.

An example of the service being rendered is the case of a young ground force Negro lieutenant. We met aboard an air evacuation flight from Korea to Japan and he told me this: "Five minutes after I was wounded I was back in the battalion first-aid station where my wounds were dressed; and within 50 minutes I was on an airplane being evacuated to a hospital. When we know that such quick care is available we don't mind fighting."

Air evacuation of medical patients is one of the Air Forces' most satisfying operations and we of the Air Force Medical Service contribute to this operation by training and supplying the medical personnel, doctors, nurses, and technicians, who support and fly with every evacuation flight.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Until we turn our cameras upon the Nation again next week for another "teledocumentary," this, then, against the background of Battlefront Korea, is Robert McCormick putting a period on your Thirty-fourth Battle Report, Washington.

Britain-United States—No Agreement on China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. SMITH OF Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reports that Britain and the United States are in agreement on China policy are not true. As part of my remarks I am including an article by Ludwell Denny that appeared in the Washington News apropos this subject:

DESPITE ALL THE AMICABLE TALK, UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN ARE STILL POLES APART ON CHINA POLICY

(By Ludwell Denny)

LONDON, May 16.—Serious disagreements between Britain and America over a China policy continue despite a shift in the British position and Foreign Secretary Herbert Morrison's assurance to Parliament that there is no friction.

These disagreements cover the arms embargo recommended by the United Nations committee to the General Assembly, as well as differences over a total embargo, Formosa, diplomatic recognition of the Chinese Reds and their demand for a U. N. seat.

Though London has modified its pro-Peiping policy under American pressure, at the same time Washington policy has stiffened. So it is still a wide breach.

Frightened by the possible effects of that breach on the North Atlantic Pact and on the British-American alliance, both governments are trying to publicize points of agreement and postpone—rather than settle—their serious China disputes.

RELUCTANT "YES"

For the moment the United States is unwillingly accepting the British-imposed limits on the pending U. N. arms and strategic materials ban because the British Commonwealth, France and a large U. N. majority are on the British side. The British switch permitting this weak measure to pass in the U. N. is not as significant as advertised. Rather it is virtually automatic after Britain's own belated ban on rubber had been forced by Washington's and Winston Churchill's protests and British public opinion.

But London has no intention of extending that limited U. N. ban to a total embargo as the United States has. A provision in the pending U. N. resolution "to continue its consideration of additional measures to meet aggression in Korea and report thereon" is sop to American public opinion. But it is vetoed in advance by British refusal to consider a complete embargo much less naval blockade or political sanctions.

Another grave flaw in the U. N. resolution is the failure to ban rubber by name as it does petroleum. Though rubber obviously is a strategic material, Britain didn't include it in her strategic embargo until recently and justifies what she calls shipments for normal peaceful purposes.

Also, there's a hole in the U. N. clause to prevent evasion of the embargo by shipping and transshipments. It's limited to preventing "circumvention of control on shipments applied by other states pursuant to this resolution." If Indonesia, Burma, India or Ceylon sell rubber or other strategic materials to China, British ships can deliver those goods—unless London rules otherwise.

The biggest hole of all is that British Empire rubber shipments to Russia, which can be reshipped to China, are not banned.

So a strict economic blockade which Defense Secretary George C. Marshall as well as Gen. Douglas MacArthur, says is essential is not imposed by Britain or by the U. N. proposal even in the limited field of arms and strategic materials.

WHY THEY OBJECT

As for the American-type embargo on all goods, London objects on the following grounds:

It would be ineffective because other China traders, including Russia, wouldn't join.

It is enforceable only by a naval blockade which would invite a general war.

Britain and others would lose essential imports from China including tungsten.

It would destroy Hong Kong which is important for the Allies as well as Britain.

POSTPONE DISPUTE

On Formosa, the dispute hasn't been settled, only postponed.

Mr. Morrison's unsolicited statement on this subject to Parliament before its recess last week was double talk. Bowing to America, he said a discussion of Formosa's future would be premature so long as operations continue in Korea, and that decision should be made by the U. N. after consultation with the inhabitants. But for the benefit of the leftists particularly, he specified the policy was the same as that laid down by Prime Minister Clement Attlee last December.

The Labor government, now as then, favors giving Formosa to the Reds with some safeguards for the inhabitants as soon as Peiping ceases aggression. Neither Mr. Attlee nor Mr. Churchill agrees with General Marshall that the island never should fall into Red hands. And, of course, Britain won't support Chiang Kai-shek even to the present limited American extent—unless Hong Kong is attacked by the Reds and Chiang could fight a diversionary action.

Similarly, regarding Red China's membership in the U. N., the British-American dispute is only postponed. Since Peiping's direct participation in the Korean war, London has temporarily withheld support of Peiping's membership until the fighting stops, but only temporarily. That's still the policy here. The question of whether U. N. membership is part of a written bargain for stopping the war or an unwritten understanding is a matter of technique and expediency on which Britain has changed and may change again without willingly altering the basic policy—unless there is a general war.

Educational Responsibilities of Life Underwriters

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit herewith for insertion therein an article by Dr. Ernest H. Hahne, president of Miami University at Oxford, Ohio, and chairman of the board of the Cincinnati branch of the Cleveland Federal Reserve Bank.

Dr. Hahne is a graduate of the University of Nebraska, with a bachelor of arts degree in 1911 and a law degree in 1913. He subsequently won his master of arts degree at Harvard and a doctor of philosophy from Chicago University. He taught sociology at Chicago University, economics and sociology at Dakota Wesleyan, economics at Northwestern as professor of economics, and served as assistant dean of the liberal arts college and director of the summer session at Northwestern. An authority on special assessments and Federal taxes, he has served many governmental agencies, particularly just preceding and during World War II. As a research expert, he has served as director of research for Midwest Institute on Fair Trade Practices, United States Office of Education, Illinois State Tax Commission and School of Office Workers, and has been associated with many other important research projects.

EDUCATIONAL RESPONSIBILITIES OF LIFE UNDERWRITERS

Representatives of life-insurance companies are engaged in the great social task of education. If their work were to be departmentalized along the lines of the colleges and universities then more specifically they are engaged in the field of economic education. The place of individual and corporate saving, the relation of saving to the creation of capital, and the importance of capital in a capitalistic democracy are among the most significant lessons to be taught.

Not many years ago the life underwriters emphasized, as a part of policy selling, agruments that insurance would enable the buyer to gain a certain amount of independence; that he would gain security for his old age; that he would be buying a first-class investment; and that he would be engaged in the supremely important responsibility of family building.

Today personal independence is in danger of giving way to the state-owes-me-a-living idea. Provision for old age has been taken from the shoulders of the individual and placed in the hands of State and Federal social-security programs, which have followed the Townsend mathematical rhyme—$50–55; 60–65; 70–75, and so on up to $135 per month when Government and private pensions have been combined. The first-class investment argument has been vitiated by rampant inflation. As for family building how often nowadays do we hear about one's responsibility for his grandchildren? Family disorganization has become so common that the moral and spiritual foundations of the family as the cornerstone of democratic institutions are crumbling. Yes, indeed; these are the days when life underwriters must enlarge their scope of economic education as a matter of financial survival and national responsibility.

Whatever menaces a stabilized economy becomes a menace to life underwriting. Today many erroneous dogmas are extant. Some of them undermine national stability. Americans need to be alerted to five of the most widely announced fallacies that are gnawing at the groundsills of the structure of our economy.

First, one of the most common fallacies is that taxation will prevent inflation. I am assuming, of course, that further inflation is considered a menace to life insurance and the credit system. Too frequently, advocates of higher tax rates forget that the money taken from individuals by the force pump of the Internal Revenue Department is collected merely to be respent by those holding positions of strategic power in Government. Behind this may be found the implied assumption that if an individual spends his own income the effect is more inflationary than if the Government spends it, but only 15 years ago we heard that if the Government spends the money then deflation would be stopped and reflation would be started. The same naive persons continue to sponsor these inconsistent conclusions.

Whenever the tax enters into the cost of production, it may be shifted in the form of higher prices for consumers; thus taxes may raise prices. Or if the tax is such that it discourages production and decreases supply as a price factor, it may also raise price. It has been said that the excess-profits tax is not shifted since it falls upon profits computed after costs, but this short-sighted conclusion ignores the fact that corporate management looks to the future on the basis of past experience, and resorts to liberal allowances for advertising, bonuses, pensions, higher wages, lower prices for old customers, consolidations, and mergers that raise costs and lower taxable profits, and general relaxation of efforts toward efficiency and economy in management.

MEASURING TAX LIABILITY

Today we hear that corporate income taxes are not shifted because, like the excess-profits tax, the tax is levied on net income, supposedly the income as made taxable by law. But the fact is, of course, that net income is the measure of tax liability. It is easy to confuse the measure of tax liability and the source of a tax. An income tax may fall on capital. Not a few corporations have found it necesary to set up tax reserves taken from current income in order to pay the exorbitant tax burden that management anticipates from current operations, but because these reserves cannot impair wage agreements, customary dividends, and other drains on income, it becomes necessary to raise prices of goods sold.

One aspect of the income tax that is too frequently by tax analysts develops from increased Government spending because the income tax has proved to be very productive in raising revenue. Thus, public expenditures directly maintain support prices not because the economy needs such a fictitious price system, but because political considerations take highest rank in the minds of those disposing of income-tax revenues. It is nothing but a figment of imagination that the support prices are preponderantly recouped by the Treasury the following year by income taxes, since the primary purposes of such programs, is to raise, not lower prices.

During the depression Washington bureaucrats were vociferously advocating the pump-priming theory that the Government must spend to raise prices, contending at that time that the more the administration spent the more readily would America overcome the depression. But today these same persons not only favor heavier taxation to check inflation, but also favor greater borrowing to conduct the present war.

REDUCING GOVERNMENT SPENDING

If taxes are to become an effective check upon inflation they must be accompanied by a reduction in Government spending, because Government consumption decreases supplies and raises prices just as effectively as though those same supplies were taken from the market by individual purchases. At present I see no signs of the administration's taxing more than it spends, and therefore question the effectiveness of taxation as a means of checking inflation.

Nor will taxation to repay debt prove to be of much help since the dollars paid into the Treasury go into the hands of bondholders who in turn may respend and merely change the channel of spending. If however, the bondholder converts his payments into capital and increases that factor of production, and larger supplies of goods eventually are placed on market counters, these increased supplies may lower prices. The important fact remains that when the Treasury gains the dollars, it does not destroy them, thereby diminishing buying power, but it taxes to spend and spending raises prices.

Life underwriters by converting consumers' spending power into savings tend to check inflation. Two qualifications need to be made, however. First, if the insurance company becomes a lending institution, then little absorption of purchasing power occurs, and second, if the company uses these savings to buy Government bonds, it merely rechannels the flow of savings. Since the companies for the most part assume the duty of converting savings into capital, thereby increasing national product, their activities become anti-inflationary, and much more effective than increased rates of income taxes now being proposed. The conclusion then becomes obvious. Threats of higher income taxes menace savings, stimulates Government spending and borrowing, and impairs the future of life underwriting.

EXPLODING A FALLACY

In the second place, another common fallacy is that no tax is a good tax which is not based upon ability to pay. This fallacy needs to be exploded by life underwriters.

Historically, from the beginnings of the National Government until the Civil War, the Treasury operated upon the revenue derived from commodity taxes called customs duties, or tariffs, supplemented slightly by revenues from the sales of lands belonging to the public domain. It was a commodity-tax period. Although the Civil War caused a sharp increase in the national debt, the Federal Government continued to tax commodities, but then added what was called the internal-revenue duties on domestically produced goods to correspond with the customs duties on foreign-made goods. They were levied upon the sale of enumerated commodities. From 1862 until the coming of the income tax in 1913 America seems to have managed to muddle through by becoming the most powerful nation on earth. The commodity tax is indisputably the historical basis of American fiscal policy.

Our forefathers seemed to regard this system as equitable and sound, because they considered it the responsibility of all citizens who benefit from Government to help pay for the support of that Government. The excise system was justified before the Supreme Court, as based upon the idea that commodity taxes were a reasonable measure of benefit received.

What has become of the benefit theory of taxation? It has been displaced by the ability-to-pay theory. Today no tax is fair, say many well-intentioned citizens, unless it is founded upon ability to pay. This idea came to America by way of the school of economics, known as the French Socialists, and also through the channels of what in Germany were known as the Socialists-of-the-Chair. Adolph Wagner was the brain-truster for Bismarck, the Iron Duke of Prussia, and he set forth the idea that ability to pay was the soundest socio-politico basis for taxation—that taxes may well be used to redistribute wealth, as well as raise revenues. It was the entering wedge of socialism under the guise of taxation. It is now found in the U. S. S. R. constitution which lays down the Socialist principle that taxes must conform to alibity to pay, and that constitution announces that it is a fundamental part of Communist policy. But I do not propose to give a course in the history of tax thought, only to indicate the Socialist origins of the ability-to-pay doctrine.

Since 1913, the World Wars I and II and the Korean war have left America so much in debt that any means of raising revenue seemed to be desirable, and we have acquiesced too readily in the abandonment of the historic principle of benefit received, and accepted too readily the idea that the only good tax is the tax based upon ability to pay. Fees, special assessments, the gasoline tax when used for roads, and to some extent the license system, still retain elements of the benefit theory. Some contend that the personal income tax measures benefits since those with greater incomes receive the greater benefits from the administration. The reasonableness of which I leave to your imagination.

With the Korean war steadily and progressively imposing its burden upon all Americans the present income tax has become fiscally inadequate. This was pointed out in the report of the Senate Finance Committee on the Revenue Act of 1950 showing that the number of taxable returns would approximate 38,000,000, or only 63 percent of the 60,000,000 gainfully employed Americans. Whenever employed, a person receives a public benefit if no more than in the form of law and order, and should be expected to pay for it. According to this report the income of the 38,000,000 reached $131,000,000,000, or 58 percent of the total personal income of $225,000,000,000. In short, 63 percent of the people employed receiving 58 percent of the income pay the personal income tax.

Through tax exemptions much of the lower incomes remain tax-exempt unless reached by commodity taxes. Exemptions are a necessary element if taxes are to be based solely upon ability to pay, but when ability is combined with benefits received then exempted incomes should be reached through commodity taxes. This means a kind of tax that everybody pays. It does not mean taxing luxuries only. In this atomic age protection of life is as necessary as bread, and it is conceivable that taxes upon bread may be necessary to produce atomic bombs and maintain the benefits of a sound government.

A third fallacy widely accepted today that needs to be emphasized by life underwriters seeking to prevent inflation is that the interest rates must be kept down so that the Treasury will not require higher taxes to pay higher interest to bondholders. Insurance companies are lenders. They are in a real sense credit agencies. As credit expands prices rise, and whatever affects the totality of credit affects inflationary causes. There exists a close relation between interest rates and credit trends.

Russian writers have concluded that American capitalistic democracy can be destroyed by the use of two economic weapons. First it is contended that American capitalistic democracy cannot withstand regimentation for a decade. Second, that Americans identify capitalism with dollars, and the destruction of the dollar will lead to the overthrow eventually of American democracy by revolution.

Two ideas of price control are now popular, one that inflation can be controlled by the fixing of prices or ceilings for specific commodities, the second, that inflation can be checked by the use of devices that control the supply of credit. If we use the type of controls formerly employed by the Office of Price Administration, and attempt to regiment American capital, management, and labor, we seem to accept the first Russian objective, that of regimentation for a decade. If we use credit controls, however, we protect the dollar and upset the aims of Russian plotters and planners. Therefore, we need to be cautious in the extent, type, and duration of specific price controls, and courageous in the use of credit controls. Specific price controls do not reach the causes of inflation. For this reason the Office of Price Stabilization has been assigned an exceptionally obnoxious task.

Recently we witnessed within the administration a struggle over the use of these inflationary controls. About 6 months ago the Federal Reserve System announced that it would use the powers at its disposal to check abnormal credit expansion. Regulation W relates to the extension of consumer credit, installment loans, down payments, exempt credits for business and agricultural loans, loans to pay fire and casualty insurance premiums, and in general limits overextended business credit. Regulation X relates to residential real estate credit and applies to banks, insurance companies, mortgage, loan, finance, and real-estate companies. The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System began tightening these types of credit last year, and there is not much doubt but that these credit controls have proved somewhat helpful.

Late in the fall the New York Federal Reserve bank announced that it would use the powers at its disposal to check abnormal credit expansion, and imposed an increase in the rediscount rate. But that very day the Treasury announced a refunding issue priced above the existing market, which was designed to force the Federal Reserve bank to renounce its action or be held responsible for impairing the flotation of the refunding issue. By this action the Treasury seems to have taken the position that the Federal Reserve System shall not use its power to tighten credit and raise interest rates, as a general policy checking inflation. More than a dramatic struggle has occurred because the Treasury seems to have taken the position that makes it necessary for the administration to favor specific price controls, concomitantly requiring all the regimentation of American enterprise that perpetuates some of the bitter memories of the last war.

A BANKERS' BANKING SYSTEM

Nevertheless, the Federal Reserve System is still a bankers' banking system. It is not owned by the Federal Government. It is not a tool of any administration. In my opinion, its powers must never be so emasculated that member or nonmember banks cannot test objectively the quality of the national credit. The ominous growth in bond holdings of the Federal Reserve System, plus the tendency of member banks for deposits to exceed loans and bond absorption to increase, accentuates the importance of interest rate control. Whenever the quantity of national credit becomes overexpanded that fact must be reflected in the quality of that credit, and that in turn should be reflected in interest rates, national emergency or not. The excellent report of the Douglas committee also concluded that the responsibility of regulating the supply and cost of credit belonged not to the Treasury but to the Federal Reserve System.

Being lending agencies, insurance companies are intimately affected by movements in the interest rates. As a rank outsider in the business of life insurance, I have heard that certain actuaries have found that a one-fourth of 1 percent drop in interest rates offsets about a 15-percent gain in mortality. If this be true then from the viewpoint of life underwriters it will take very substantial further medical progress to compensate for a change of 1 percent in the interest rates. Twenty years ago life underwriters were getting an investment return of 5 percent; today it has dropped to about 2.7 percent, according to some estimates. Recently some companies have discovered that it takes a return of 3.2 percent to cover cost of losses. In short, this control of interest rates is an essential matter to life underwriters.

The general controls that lie within the power of the Federal Reserve System, such as change in reserve requirements, in rediscount rates, open-market operations, and credit regulations, still remain powerful economic weapons with which to fight dangerous inflationary trends. It is my opinion that the time has come when they should be used, despite the fact that the American people need to be informed by their so-called leaders in Washington about what is behind all this frantic preparation for war on a world-wide front. The American people are beginning to find out that what they need is stable dollars, and not cheap dollars.

Another aspect of this problem looms on the horizon of fiscal thinking. Some advocate the establishment of a department of fiscal affairs that would absorb the Treasury, the home-loan bank, the farm-credit system, and the savings and loan system, as well as the Federal Reserve System. Nothing could be more dangerous than such concentration of monetary power that might be placed at the disposal of ruthless and incompetent office holders. If such action were taken, then I would predict that it would take only one more step to absorb life-insurance companies as well. Life underwriter leaders need to be alert now to the potentialities of this plot.

ANOTHER FALLACY

A fourth fallacy that leaders in life underwriting should closely study is that Government seizure is the solution for the operating difficulties confronted by public utilities and industries essential to the public interest. Recently we observed Government seizure of the railroads, and heard about threats to seize coal mines, steel mills, telephone companies, and power companies. No limitations worthy of American intelligence have been placed upon either the duration, or wage adjustments, or type of controls imposed by Government seizures. Here again political policy comes dangerously near the ultimate

American regimentation envisioned in Russian circles. Americans have paid more attention to the technical weapons of warfare than they have to the economic weapons our enemies may use. We all need to follow the ancient admonition: "Know your enemy."

A PALLIATIVE BUT NOT A SOLUTION

Government seizure has become an accepted national policy as a palliative but not a solution for some of our economic troubles. If the time comes when life underwriters are considered as competitors with the social security program of the national Government the ground work for Government seizure of life insurance companies will have been already laid. This policy needs critical watching, especially by the life underwriters, but also by all thoroughgoing Americans.

In the fifth place, another fallacy that looms in the background is the idea previously called the compensatory economy, whereby the Government will borrow during depressions and during the following period of prosperity will tax and repay the depression loans. Today we hear much from Washington about the heights which the American standards of living have reached, and this must be understood to constitute prosperity. Figures of national income are very attractive in terms of dollars, as well as output, but we do not hear much about using taxes during this period to repay depression loans. The fact is that the spenders of the depression period still are spenders in a period of prosperity, and that they have either intentionally misled us into accepting a vicious fallacy or they are planning to take us into the dangerous inflation that our Russian enemies have planned for us.

As we now enter a garrison state with universal military training for all citizens over 18, it is said that further borrowing is necessary unless we pay as we go. But who is there today sufficiently cognizant of military planning that he is competent to exercise a sound judgment concerning the extent to which future borrowing becomes necessary? The compensatory economy of the Kenesian period in fiscal policy has become a delusion and snare. We borrow in prosperity, just as we borrowed during the depression, and hence must find some answer to those who seek to dominate America by the threats of a constant emergency or state of fear. Again, we need freedom from fear.

A credit system is founded upon man's faith in men. We have been told that through sufficient faith we could move mountains, but that kind of a faith is founded upon truth and not fallacies. Life underwriters attempt to instill faith of buyers in their companies, and to a large extent, therefore, become bulwarks of the credit economy. But there is also a moral obligation on the part of the leaders in life insurance to see to it that the values which policyholders are told that they purchase are realized in fact, and it is clear that by taking dollars that are worth a dollar, and paying back in dollars worth 50 cents, the moral obligation of the company, as well as the agent, is eluded or shirked; man's faith in man is impaired, and the credit economy endangered. There is an inevitable and close relationship between moral obligations and the strength of the credit economy.

IMPORTANCE OF THE ECONOMIC STRUGGLE

The time has arrived when colleges and universities must enlist not only the life underwriters, but bankers, professional and businessmen, as well as labor leaders, in the cause of adult education. We are engaged in an active military and economic warfare, and there is danger that the importance of the economic struggle be overlooked because of the dramatic aspects of the military battles and the overwhelming confusion growing out of what seems now to be a drastic changeover toward a garrison state for perhaps the next decade. The social responsibilities of the leaders in life insurance include this necessity of aiding in adult education. I have not completed the discussion of the more common or widely held fallacies, nor do I imply this list to be complete. But life agency leaders with their faith in the future are obligated to help shape that future by destroying contemporary economic fallacies and building foundations of truth upon which a sound future will be constructed for Americans.

Hysteria? Ah, No, Mr. Murrow

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PATRICK J. HILLINGS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. HILLINGS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. T. A. Stevenson, editor and publisher of the Rosemead Review, of Rosemead, Calif., has written an excellent editorial analyzing the tremendous public reaction in favor of Gen. Douglas MacArthur. The editorial appeared in the May 3, 1951, issue of the Review.

In the course of his remarks, Mr. Stevenson, a distinguished journalist of wide experience, answers one of the various charges made by a prominent radio commentator who calls the MacArthur popularity "mere hysteria." It is unfortunate that so many of our radio and television commentators constantly support the left-wing line of political philosophy and are ever ready to defend the Truman administration. By their acts, such commentators are preventing the American people from obtaining the truth through our radio and television facilities.

I hope that all of the Members of the Congress will have an opportunity to read Mr. Stevenson's editorial:

HYSTERIA? AH, NO, MR. MURROW

We think the columnists and commentators missed the salient point in trying to find the answer to the MacArthur reception which has passed anything in history.

These chaps spend most of their time in big cities and face their typewriters a long, long way from the quiet firesides of the Nation where public opinion is formed. They tend to grow away from the people and, in a situation like this, have to grope for the answer. It is not to be found in the cocktail lounge of the Statler.

Edward R. Murrow spoke as if he wanted to weep at our emotion and loss of perspective. He called it hysteria. What Murrow needs is to go back to the Palouse Hills of eastern Washington, from whence he came, and talk to the folks he once knew. There he would find himself.

The people stormed the great cities to see General MacArthur because they saw in him the antithesis of what they have been feeding upon for too long. They are sick at heart reading so much of O'Dwyer, Dawson, Vaughn, Maragon, Remington, Lattimore, Pressman and of Hiss, Costello, Cohen, Coplan, Fuchs, Gold, Greenglass, Gusick, and Wadleigh.

General MacArthur richly deserves the applause he has received. His address to Congress was the work of 52 years in the field and worth every minute of it. But the millions who saw him, read his speech and filed it away for rereading, were saying, without being conscious of it; here is a great general, a great leader, a man of genuine integrity and intelligence, a devoted husband, an ideal father, a man of sympathy and understanding, a man who knows where he is going and how to get there. The crowd was cheering both a man and a type—a type they would like to see in many important posts in Washington.

No, Mr. Murrow, this was no idle hysteria, and you need not weep because the people cheered. They were speaking a language all their own and folks along Pennsylvania Avenue would do well to listen.

Scientific Research Fills Jobs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 17, 1951

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an excellent article by my friend, Miss Florence Birmingham, celebrated Massachusetts civic and political leader, author, and lecturer, which recently appeared in the Boston Traveler under the caption "United States Seeks Best Administrators." It is an admirable analysis and treatment by the distinguished Miss Birmingham of some of the current problems and work of the United States Civil Service Commission. It follows:

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH FILLS JOBS—UNITED STATES SEEKS BEST ADMINISTRATORS—NEW TECHNIQUES USED TO DISCOVER BEST TALENT FOR DEFENSE PROGRAM

(By Florence Birmingham)

In this atomic energy era, with scientific research and development being carried on in many different directions, such as astronomical, industrial, underwater, aeronautical, the pressure of manpower in today's emergency is a distinct challenge to the United States Civil Service Commission.

This is met, according to William A. Foley, New England Regional Director of Civil Service, by resorting to modern, high-speed techniques that today's emergency demands.

In his office in the Federal Building, in Boston, Mr. Foley explained:

"One of the great needs of the Government is for top level administrators to direct and coordinate the numerous intricate programs of mobilizing manpower, materials, and industrial skills in the defense effort, simultaneously attempting to maintain as stable a civilian economy as possible.

I am often asked where and how we can find administrative and technical talent for these vast tasks of the civilian government at the very time the military services and private industry are calling for identical proficiency and skill.

"One of the most interesting and novel answers to this question is the current executive placement program of the United States Civil Service Commission, designed to bring to light within the Government itself the exceptionally qualified experts being sought in the present emergency."

All Federal agencies, Mr. Foley pointed out, are designated by the Bureau of the Budget as either defense agencies or non-defense agencies, depending on how closely their activities are related to defense work.

Therefore, the problem, in part, is to discover the best administrative talent in the nondefense group in order to make available and fully utilize their skills in more vital defense work. And also to uncover in like manner the same, perhaps only partially utilized, abilities of persons within the defense agencies.

The executive placement program is aimed at providing the solution to this problem through giving Federal employees throughout the country, who have served at least a year in grade GS–12, carrying a salary of $6,400 a year, an opportunity to compete in an examination of unusual character, the first of its kind in the history of the civil service.

"For a 3-week period," said Mr. Foley, "beginning March 20, applications are being received by the Commission in Washington, D. C., from such Federal employees. Later in April written tests covering administrative problems and public affairs will be given to the employees filing under this program.

"Federal workers residing in New England who wish to take the test right in this area will be given the opportunity to do so, at whatever examination point is most convenient to them.

"It is noteworthy that the administrative judgment tests, as developed by the Commission, have been successfully used by several agencies in the past 5 years for the upgrading of personnel to administrative positions. These tests have also been used by the Commission in open competitive examinations for administrative positions up through grade GS–13.

"In short, this type of written examination, as a measure of top administrative abilities, has already been proven, but its application on this large scale, is something new.

"As a result of the written examinations, the names of these Federal employees demonstrating the highest aptitudes as top-level administrators and technical directors will be placed on lists which will be made available to agency heads in filling key defense positions ranging from grades GS–13, with a salary of $7,600 a year, to GS–18, the highest grade in the Federal service.

"An employee whose name is on these lists may be referred for key positions only in Washington, D. C., only in a regional area, if he so chooses, or in both. The names of any employees already in defense agencies will be referred to their own agencies.

"The whole program is an entirely voluntary one which has the backing of the agencies themselves through the Federal Personnel Council in Washington, D. C., which worked closely with the Commission in developing the plan."

The executive-placement program, Mr. Foley pointed out, is intended merely to supplement other intensive efforts of the Government to locate and recruit highly qualified administrative and technical personnel for the urgent needs of the defense program.

For example, the Civil Service Commission in Washington, D. C., has a continuously open recruiting circular under which applications are at all times invited and accepted from persons interested in working for the Government as administrative or executive officers, grades GS–13, with $7,600 a year salary, through GS–15 with a $10,500 yearly salary.

These are top-level administrative positions chiefly in the Capital, and involve the direction and coordination of many phases of the Government's activity, from staff administrative positions on through procurement, communications, price regulation, international information activities, and others.

"Similarly in the first region," Mr. Foley stated, "intensive efforts are being made to recruit highly qualified persons from the outside for administrative, technical, and scientific positions representing a wide range of staffing needs for the Government's work in the New England area.

"For instance, there is open continuously at the present time an announcement under which applications are being sought from persons with strong industrial or business backgrounds who can qualify as industrial specialists, business or commodity analysts, contract negotiators, and the like.

"These positions are located in such agencies as the Office of Price Stabilization, the National Production Authority, the ordnance procurement agencies of the Department of Defense, and others.

"While the majority of positions are in the salary levels $4,600 to $6,400 a year, the announcement includes grades up to GS–14, $8,800 a year, and the higher-grade positions involving top-level administrative duties.

"Likewise, in the scientific field announcements are open in the first region for accepting applications as professional engineers of almost every type, physicists, chemists, meteorologists, electronic scientists, and other scientific and technical positions.

"Professionally trained or experienced people appointed to these positions are engaged in a wide range of activities concerned with scientific research or development in such Federal laboratories as the United States Naval Underwater Sound Laboratory in New London, Conn., and the Air Force Cambridge Research Laboratories; or in Federal industrial establishments, such as Portsmouth Naval Shipyard, Boston Naval Shipyard, Watertown Arsenal, or Springfield Armory.

"The positions begin at the entrance professional level of GS–5, $3,100 annually. Some are as high as GS–15, $10,500 a year as top research directors."

In all of these efforts, Mr. Foley emphasized, whether through the executive placement program or the recruiting programs to secure personnel not already in the service, the common denominator is the earnest desire to place in key Government positions the very best personnel available to help carry out the Nation's defense measures.

Backing up the administrative and technical personnel directing and coordinating the work of Federal establishments, it is necessary, of course, to have a substantial force of employees performing more routine, but, nevertheless, essential tasks—draftsmen, office-machine operators, stenographers, typists, and many others.

In fact, the current need for stenographers and typists is so urgent that special recruiting methods are now being resorted to.

Mr. Foley explained that the central office of the United States Civil Service Commission is constantly accepting applications for these positions and holds written tests at frequent intervals throughout the region for persons interested in working in the Capital.

Agency recruiting teams constantly visit New England cities for the purpose of hiring stenographers and typists to work in Washington, D. C.

Because of the great demand for stenographers and typists in Federal agencies in New England, the first regional office and its boards of examiners have continuously open examinations in the Boston area and many other areas such as Portsmouth, N. H., and Springfield, Mass., where there are concentrations of Federal workers.

A streamlined method of qualifying for these positions in New England makes it possible for a person to apply directly to the local civil-service secretary at the post office where the applicant desires to take the test, appear for the examination within a few days and, if eligible, find that his or her name is certified to an agency within a short time after applying.

Problems and Needs of the American Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend and revise my remarks, I present the speech of Col. Joseph K. Carson, Jr., executive vice president of the Propeller Club of the United States, made before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., on May 11, 1951. The speech is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I am grateful for this opportunity to appear before you and to lay before you some vital truths about our oldest major industry, the American merchant marine, and also to say a word about the need for aid to our rivers and harbors.

I shall discuss briefly some reasons why American shipping is a perennial problem; why an adequate American merchant marine is indispensable to the United States in war; why it is essential to our peacetime economy; who is responsible for the muddled state of affairs in shipping; our present world status; shipping and our foreign policy; and why we must have preparedness instead of appeasement.

AMERICAN SHIPPING A PERENNIAL PROBLEM

Why is the American merchant marine, our oldest industry, a perennial problem? Why is this industry indispensable to national security, a political scapegoat.

There are many reasons for this state of affairs but before we discuss some of them, let us ask ourselves if the United States has a merchant marine policy. We do have and it is a clear one. The Merchant Marine Act of 1936 states that policy clearly but it is not being implemented. Let me give you some of the reasons why it is not being carried out.

1. There are people on the Government payroll who do not believe in the American merchant marine. Some of these fuzzy brained planners, holding fat jobs in Washington have, within the last year, proposed that American ships no longer participate in the movement of ECA cargo and that foreigners haul all of it; that we sell more of our ships to foreign buyers; that all financial aid to the American merchant marine be discontinued and that foreign flag vessels be permitted in our coastwise and intercoastal trades. Only the Korean war caused these marplots to scurry for cover. But they'll be back in sight when the shooting is over.

2. Foreign lobbies are busy day and night and are persuading some of our diplomats to urge that we stay out of the shipping business.

3. Another reason for the present condition of shipping is the lack of knowledge on the part of the general public of what the American merchant marine means to the Nation's welfare and security. The Propeller Club is working to remedy that situation. In fact, we are determined that everyone in the maritime industry, whether shipowner, shipbuilder, management or employee receives the public recognition which is justly due for the unfailing support each has given our forces in the Korean war.

I could cite many other reasons for the financial and political headaches of the American merchant marine, but I must hurry on.

INDISPENSABILITY IN WAR

We cannot fight a war away from our own shores, or indeed anywhere for that matter, and win it, without a fleet of merchant vessels sufficiently in tonnage and types to meet the logistical requirements of a modern military operation. This is axiomatic in military circles but usually forgotten by many of our national legislators and the people in peacetime.

Battle commitments in the Asiatic and Atlantic theaters were limited to the tanker, dry-cargo and troop-carrying tonnage available. To assure victory, we had to spend over 15 billion dollars to build a "bridge of ships" across two oceans.

All of our military leaders whether Army, Navy or Air Force, tell us that the merchant marine is an indispensable member of the national defense team. Indeed, the ships which supply the aircraft carriers, battle wagons and other strictly military naval vessels, are in war—actually men o'war.

What is the use of building tanks, airplanes, guns and other fighting weapons unless we can transport them to the men who use them? Why send troops to foreign lands unless we can supply them with food and other essentials? These questions answer themselves.

The American merchant marine is an indispensable member of our national defense team—ground, naval, and air forces must have the logistical support of their fellow member of that team—the merchantman.

MOST ESSENTIAL TO OUR PEACETIME ECONOMY

If we do not have an American merchant marine in peacetime, we will be without one to serve our Armed Forces in war. Ships cannot be built in a day nor can crews be trained to man them overnight. And, if we do not have a merchant marine of our own in peacetime, we would have to rent one in wartime. From whom would we get such a fleet and at what price? Nobody knows for sure and, not knowing, we are culpable if we leave national defense to guesswork.

We do not have sufficient raw materials to support our internal economy. The list of things we have to import is most impressive. Let us suppose something essential to our standard of living is in short world supply. Are we childlike enough to believe that foreign vessels would supply our needs of a particular material, if their own nations wanted delivery of the same thing? If we do not have a merchant fleet of our own, shipping cartels are certain to be formed against us. We can't begin to carry out any substantial part of the point 4 program without American flag ships of the right kind and number to insure success.

If we do not have an American merchant marine in peacetime, we will lose all of our shipbuilding skills and our merchant sailors will be without jobs. We sometimes forget that if foreigners do all of our ocean hauling, it will simply be another means by which they can export their cheap labor into the country tax free, while the foreign shipowners will be able to reap huge profits through monopoly.

Finally, our national prestige will suffer greatly if ships flying the Stars and Stripes no longer ply the great trade lanes of the world. Then, too, a merchant ship is essentially an ambassador of good will. One seldom trades with one's foes, although the reports about our allies trading with Red China are disquieting.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE MUDDLED STATE OF THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE?

If what I have said about the necessity for an adequate American merchant marine is true, why then is it a perennial problem? That is easy to answer.

A combination of foreign lobbies, misguided American diplomats, bureaucratic bunglers and hare-brained theorists are the culprits. They are not necessarily working in concert but they are as effective as if they were. Add to the damage which these mischief makers conjure up, the lack of knowledge on the part of the public and we find we really have a problem. It can and will be solved. But we must first break up this un-American combination and have a good old-fashioned house cleaning.

OUR PRESENT WORLD STATUS

World Wars I and II have caused great changes to appear on the face of our harried old world. From out of those maelstroms of human strife there emerged the giant of the West, the United States of America. We find ourselves in a position of world primacy which we never planned or consciously sought. A combination of private initiative and vast resources had wrought a miracle. We became the world's banker. We have become the world's industrial colossus. We lead the world in communications, agriculture, and in all forms of transport—except shipping. In the field of shipping, we are faced with block obsolescence, and nothing much is being done about it. There is no plan for replacement of our fleet. We plan for this and we plan for that but hysteria, prejudice and ignorance pervade the atmosphere of merchant shipping.

Yes, we are the world's greatest Nation and we must recognize the fact that we have left our cocoon of isolation and have responsibilities coequal with our inherent power. One of our responsibilities is to become and remain strong in every phase of national defense.

SHIPPING AND OUR FOREIGN POLICY

We are far from realistic in our foreign policy. A foreign policy, if it works, is a military policy. When diplomacy falls on its face, the military has to take over. An effective military policy is one which insures execution of a foreign policy. The military must be prepared in all respects if it is to accomplish its mission. It is unprepared unless it has a merchant marine sufficient to furnish logistical support in every theater of operations.

In spite of this, some of our diplomats want us to scuttle our merchant marine and allow foreigners to reap all the profits in world shipping. Some of these fellows advocate that if the present war spreads that we rent foreign ships to supply our battle lines.

Certainly the foreign shipowners want all the shipping business. We can't blame them for that. But it ill behooves people on Uncle Sam's payroll to help them get it. I care not what others may call this sort of business—I call it appeasement of a blushing red variety.

This trying to please the other fellow reminds me of the story of the young lieutenant just out of West Point who reported to a tough old commander of a remote western post. The old man received the young man very cordially, which greatly assured the lieutenant. Upon leaving the young man said, "Colonel, I am sure we'll get along fine." The colonel said, "Mr. Smith, we will, that is providing you do all of the getting along."

I believe in getting along but I am not the least bit ashamed of being an American and I don't propose that we shall be the world's good provider and a knightly protector only to receive as our reward the derisive title of Uncle Sap.

As most of you know, one of the principal objectives of the Propeller Club is: "To aid worthy and economically justifiable river, inland waterway, and harbor improvements."

At our last national convention we mentioned by name specific river, inland waterway, and harbor improvements and promised to do all possible to bring about their speedy completion. Since the convention we have written to our national vice presidents to assure them of our interest in the problems faced by those engaged in transportation on our rivers and inland waterways and have requested their views and comments.

It is not our purpose to try to tell you how to go about solving problems with which you have labored for years. Quite on the contrary, we want you to tell us what you believe we should do to help you and suggest to us the ways to do it.

During the last few years we have been sending billions to nations abroad, while worthy river and harbor projects for which you have been fighting for decades, have never been started—or remain incomplete.

What is the reason for this? Have the meager appropriations for river and harbor improvement and maintenance work been the result of governmental economy?

Let us take a look at the record. How much money has Congress appropriated for river and harbor improvement and maintenance work? The first appropriation for this purpose was made in 1802. Since that time a total of $3,951,000,000 has been appropriated.

How does that figure compare with lend-lease? Well, lend-lease has cost over $50,000,000,000. Russia got $11,000,000,000 of it but now refuses to return several hundred ships we loaned her. What about ECA? Through June 1950 we had dished out $9,254,000,000 for ECA, or more than twice the amount expended for the improvement and maintenance of our own rivers and harbors in 148 years. Army relief in occupied areas has already cost over $3,700,000,000. UNRRA appropriations amount to almost $3,000,000,000. Who said "pork barrel?"

Unfortunately, while we have been ladling out billions to help nations across the seas, some of those who were engaged in that costly business were trying to scuttle our merchant marine. As this was going on, others were putting our rivers, inland waterways and harbors on a starvation diet.

It is our intention to do all we can to make sure that our river, inland waterway and harbor facilities receive the support and financial backing their importance demands.

CONCLUSION

We of the Propeller Club respectfully submit that an adequate American merchant marine is indispensable to national security and essential to our peacetime economy. We are in a battle for survival. In this conflict we welcome the cooperation of other nations which embrace the same philosophy of life as do we. But self preservation is our goal and we must be sure we have all the means at hand for attaining it. A strong American merchant marine is one of those means. Development of our rivers, inland waterways and harbors is another. As long as we can prevent it, we don't intend that either become an expendable item.

We do not propose that appeasement and neglect shall become a substitute for preparedness and prudence.

Windsors' Brooklyn Visit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1951

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to direct my colleagues' attention to the following editorial which appeared in the Brooklyn Eagle of April 16, 1951, and which reflects credit upon the Brooklyn Jewish Hospital and its director of public relations, Max Abelman:

WINDSORS' BROOKLYN VISIT

Two more notable world figures—the Duke and Duchess of Windsor—have come to Brooklyn to affix their signatures to the famous mural which grace the wall of the children's ward in Brooklyn Jewish Hospital. Escorting the man who renounced the British throne and his American duchess were a number of high officials of the hospital headed by its president, Supreme Court Justice Emil N. Baar.

Brooklyn may well take pride in this great institution whose strikingly decorated children's ward has attracted such notables as Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Gen. George Marshall, Gen. Omar Bradley, Lord Halifax, former British Ambassador to the United States, General Romulo of the Philippines, the late Wendell Willkie, and Gov. Thomas E. Dewey.

The Duke and Duchess were obviously thrilled by their experience and were most gracious in all their contacts during their visit. A word of praise is also due the well-known Brooklynite who is responsible for bringing these famous people here—Max Abelman, director of public relations at the hospital.

Our Purpose Is Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. STENNIS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, May 21, 1951

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, on Saturday, May 19, at the annual encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of Oklahoma, an eloquent and important address was delivered by the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR]. I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My fellow Oklahomans, certain facts stand out bold and clear before the American people and before the Government of the United States:

First. We are in the midst of the most critical period in our history.

Second. Our purpose is peace.

Third. Our primary and principal enemy is Red Russia.

Fourth. We must keep all the friends and allies we now have and make every effort to secure new ones.

Fifth. We must continue to mobilize our manpower, physical resources, and productive capacity.

Sixth. We must continue to work through the United Nations to stop aggression, prevent its spread if we are able to, and keep it as far removed from our own shores as is humanly possible.

In all these things we must work at home and with our allies for that abiding peace which is the ultimate goal of all our aims and all our efforts.

I am opposed to any political, diplomatic, or military policy on the part of my Government which assumes fatalistically that an all-out war with either Soviet Russia or Red China is inevitable; and I am opposed to any act on the part of any responsible Government official calculated to permit or provoke such an all-out struggle.

We are not in Korea today to start a world war; we are there to prevent such a war.

General Bradley made this very clear in his opening statement to the joint committees of the Senate last Tuesday. He said:

"As long as we keep the conflict within its present scope, we are holding to a minimum the forces we must commit and tie down.

"Enlargement of the war in Korea to include Red China, would probably delight the Kremlin more than anything else we could do. It would necessarily tie down additional forces, especially our sea power and our Air Force, while the Soviet Union would not be obliged to put a single man into the conflict.

"Red China is not the powerful nation seeking to dominate the world. Frankly, in the opinion of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, this strategy would involve us in the wrong war, at the wrong place, at the wrong time, and with the wrong enemy.

"Statements have been made that the President, as Commander in Chief, and the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense have a policy all their own, and that the Joint Chiefs of Staff have been overridden.

"This is just not so.

"There are also those who deplore the present military situation in Korea and urge us to engage Red China in a larger war to solve this problem. Taking on Red China is not a decisive move, does not guarantee the end of the war in Korea, and may not bring China to her knees. We have only to look back to the five long years when the Japanese, one of the greatest military powers of that time, moved into China and had almost full control of a large part of China, and yet were never able to conclude that war successfully. I would say that from past history one would only jump from a smaller conflict to a larger deadlock at greater expense."

My friends, General Bradley in these brief quotes makes a complete but simple answer to MacArthur's proposals and charges. I knew Bradley was the GI's general but I never knew how clear a talker he was.

Now, we all know that Oklahoma has about as high a percentage of her sons in Korea as any State. We have suffered about as high a rate of casualties. No words of mine are adequate to pay the tribute deserved by those brave men and their families. They are fighting for the security of their country. They are fighting for American freedom. Some will not come back. Most of them will return to help build a greater America.

And while they and their comrades are holding the hordes of aggression at bay, there is a great effort being made here at home to mobilize our manpower and our industrial and productive capacities—to insure that this Nation and her allies will be in a position of impregnable security.

My part in the MacArthur controversy came without warning. There are those who seek to discredit me—who charge that I was acting for others when I spoke out against the general. That charge is entirely false. There was no suggestion either from the White House or the State Department that I do what I did. As a matter of fact, I was the first official that I know of who publicly expressed a lack of confidence in General MacArthur and his effort to expand the war.

I was the first to make a public issue of the possibility that what he recommended would do more harm than good. I was the first to warn the American people that what he was saying and proposing could get us deeper into war instead of successfully ending the one we are already in. It was my deep concern for the immediate safety and welfare of Oklahoma's Forty-fifth Division which prompted my first outspoken opposition to MacArthur and his policies. This concern was shared by practically every member of the Oklahoma delegation in Congress. We knew the Forty-fifth had been ordered to Japan.

We went to the Department of the Army to find out the purpose for which Oklahoma's National Guard Division was being sent to Japan. We knew they were in the Armed Forces, we knew they were available for their country's call. We also knew the grave concern in the hearts of the fathers and mothers, the wives and the children of those men when that magnificent division started the long trek yonder across the Pacific to Japan.

We were advised by the Secretary of the Army that they were going to Japan for occupational duty. We inquired specifically and were advised that their training would be completed before they were assigned to any duty.

At about this time, just as we were feeling some degree of comfort from the assurances given us, we read in the paper where the War Department had worked out a well-deserved program of rotation for the fighting men in Korea, whereby certain numbers would be sent home each month and replaced with other soldiers. The thought came to me that possibly the Forty-fifth Division was to be used as replacements.

I went to the office of the Secretary of the Army and I asked him if there was such a possibility. He told me, "No." He said the rotation program would go into effect, but that replacements would come from training centers in this country direct to the units in Korea. I said, "Will the Forty-fifth Division be broken up?" He replied, "No." I then said, "Mr. Secretary, we are mighty happy to get these assurances, that the Forty-fifth Division will not be broken up, and that the men in it will not be used as replacement troops in Korea—but can we depend on this program being carried out?" The Secretary replied, "Senator KERR, this is the program and the plan and it will be carried out so far as we here in Washington are concerned." I then asked, "Is there anybody who can change this plan?" And he said, "Nobody but the theater commander."

I knew who he meant—General MacArthur, and right then I became more keenly interested than ever in General MacArthur and his policies. Of course, I was aware of the argument that had been going on between General MacArthur out yonder in Japan and the Joint Chiefs of Staff in Washington, and I had been greatly concerned about it. I knew that it was the purpose of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to stop aggression, punish the aggressor, and in doing so to limit the conflict to the narrowest possible confines and prevent its spread.

I had read with great concern the published views of the general that a second front should be opened up on the mainland of China by sending in the forces of Chiang Kai-shek, and I had been uneasy about that. I got to thinking about how he was going to get Chiang Kai-shek's army back to the mainland of China. I remembered how they had been driven off the mainland when they had 10 times as many troops as they now have in Formosa, and how they had abandoned their guns and tanks—most of which we had furnished them.

As I studied and learned more about the situation, it became apparent to me that the only way they could be placed back on the mainland of China was for the United States Navy to transport them, and this would have to be done with the protection of the United States Air Force, and the support of United States ground forces. General MacArthur himself said we would have to give logistical support, and that means transportation and the furnishing of supplies and food and military equipment wherever the fighting forces are. He further said we would have to furnish the officers and men needed as technicans and specialists.

And as I thought about that and realized that Oklahoma's Forty-fifth Division and California's Fortieth Division were on their way over there, and that they would be the only troops in Japan, I became more uneasy. Could it be that if the general had his way and was permitted to open up a second front that it would fall the lot of these two divisions to become the shock troops to open up the way to put Chiang Kai-shek's forces on to the mainland?

Then it was that I sounded off regarding MacArthur's policies. Then when it became apparent that in violation of orders, in spite of the directives of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Commander in Chief, MacArthur was threatening to force his program through, the only solution I could see was to replace him.

You know, my fellow Oklahomans, thank God we've got a democracy in which the civilian authority is in control of the military. And under no circumstances must we ever permit that to change.

Let me read you some words placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD just a few weeks ago:

"The national strategy of any war, that is, the selection of national objectives and the determination of the general means and methods to be applied in attaining them, as well as the development of the broad policies applicable to the prosecution of war, are decisions that must be made by the head of the state acting in conformity with the expressed will of Congress. No single departmental head, no matter what his particular function or title, could, or should be responsible for the formulation of such decisions. The issues involved were so far-reaching in their effect, and so vital to the life of the Nation, that this phase of coordinating Army and Navy effort could not be delegated by the Commander in Chief to any subordinate authority. Any such attempt would not constitute delegation, but rather, abdication."

That's a pretty clear declaration of the principle of the superiority of the civilian over the military, isn't it?

Who do you think made that statement? Who do you think wrote the words I just read? Was it Bradley? Was it Marshall? Was it Eisenhower? No. The man who wrote those words back in 1932 when he was Chief of Staff was none other than Douglas MacArthur.

He was right when he said this in 1932, and the Commander in Chief was right when he applied that very same principle to General MacArthur in 1951.

Let me say, my fellow Oklahomans, that no one respects more than I, the distinguished military career of the general. I glory in a country such as ours whose sons can achieve the distinction that Douglas MacArthur has gained. But I am more proud of the fact that no matter who they are, or how high they go, they still are a part of the military team, and they are still subject to the orders of the Commander in Chief who is elected by the people. And the fact is, as great as MacArthur was, he has made many, many mistakes.

John Gunther, in his recent book, The Riddle of MacArthur, said:

"General MacArthur was severely embarrassed by the destruction of his planes on Clark Field on Pearl Harbor Day. The Japanese caught him in exactly the same naked and exposed state as they caught the Americans in Hawaii, though he had ample warning since the Pearl Harbor attack had come 10 hours before."

Reading further, Gunther says, "General MacArthur has several times made serious blunders in judgment, based on faulty information. The attack on South Korea on June 25 apparently took him by complete surprise, and he thought that the Korean war was won after the landing at Inchon on September 15. He told Mr. Truman at their meeting on Wake Island a month later that the danger of Chinese intervention had passed, but the Chinese drastically fooled him. Then (though he tried to wriggle out of this by saying that the remark had only been 'jocular') he predicted flatly that the American troops would be home by Christmas—only 3 or 4 days before they were caught by surprise and hammered back. General MacArthur, having scouted the ground personally for what was to have been his final advance, crashed into a colossal trap—moreover a trap about which he was fully aware."

The United States News and World Report is probably the most pro-MacArthur publication in America. But in its issue of May 4, 1951, is the following quote:

"1939—General Douglas MacArthur:

"A successful invasion of the Philippines would take a half million men, $10,000,000,000, tremendous casualties, and 3 years' time." But the magazine goes on to say it took the Japanese only 5 months to complete the capture of the Philippines.

The New York Herald Tribune is one of America's greatest Republican newspapers. Its Pulitzer-prize-winning correspondent, Homer Bigart, in a special article in a January issue of Look magazine, made the following statement with reference to Korea:

"Unsound deployment of the United Nations forces and a momentous blunder by General MacArthur helped insure the success of the enemy's strategy. MacArthur grossly miscalculated the intentions, strength, and capabilities of the forces against him. And no nation in the spot we are in can string along with a leader whose ill-considered decision to launch the offensive of November 24 precipitated and magnified the swift disaster."

I do not recite these mistakes he has made to cast doubt upon his patriotism, or reflect upon his reputation. I do so only to remind you that he, also, is human; that he, like all of us, has made mistakes in the past and some of them have been tragic and costly.

He admits that Russia has a mutual assistance treaty to join Red China if Red China is attacked. Yet, he says we should ignore that treaty and launch an all-out attack against Red China. With a wave of the hand he tells us that Russia would not come to China's aid.

I say this to you, that if we followed him in his proposal to carry an expanded war to China and then found out that he had made another mistake, and that Russia did come in, all of the mistakes that he has made rolled into one would be as nothing compared to the tragedy that would befall us.

We must not risk the survival of this Nation upon the unsupported judgment of one man who has been so wrong so often. Instead, we must be guided by the combined and unanimous judgment of our Joint Chiefs of Staff who are set up for the specific purpose of making just such decisions.

In this critical hour we must never for one instant lose sight of the most important objective of our lifetime—achieving and keeping peace. The No. 1 enemy who threatens that peace is Russia. It is Red Russia that has loosed the tempest of evil purposes and deeds that has lashed into violent upheaval the waters of that deep ocean which we must cross to reach the harbor of the peace we seek.

My fellow Oklahomans, we alone cannot win and keep the peace. No one nation in this world can accomplish that single-handedly. And for that reason, with high ideals, and inspired vision, we helped create the United Nations.

To do this we laid aside partisan politics. Under the leadership of the ablest men in both parties we resolved that insofar as our national security and peace were concerned, politics must stop at the water's edge. In that spirit we have fashioned an alliance with most of the nations in this world whose people and whose governments want peace.

When Red Russia sent her puppet on a mission of naked aggression into South Korea last June, she threatened the peace of the entire world, and the security of every free nation. That aggression had to be stopped and the aggressor punished or the United Nations would have ceased to exist except as an empty shell. The United Nations moved into Korea to halt that aggression and restore peace. That action was approved by an overwhelming majority of the American people, regardless of political party.

It was a bitter struggle but the North Korean aggression was stopped and thrown back, and we stood at the threshold of victory and peace. Then one of the saddest events in all history took place. Red Russia moved again. She sent another, and far more dangerous, puppet into action to prevent the United Nations from winning either victory or peace. We and our allies have checked that aggression, at least for the time being.

Our forces are now locked with the hordes of Red China in a desperate battle. The first drive of this much-touted spring offensive fell back under the relentless pounding of our guns and tanks and planes. Never have American forces performed more valiantly and heroically.

Now, our heroic men and those of our allies are giving their all to stop and turn back another thrust on the part of the enemy aggressor. Our hearts are heavy at this critical hour. We hope and pray and we believe that our successes will be repeated. We hope this will be the climax. We hope that then a defeated enemy will seek an honorable peace.

But if that enemy forces us to continue the struggle we will still strive to limit it as much as possible.

We do not know how long we will be able to limit this conflict but, unless Russia herself comes in, we believe we can prevent Red China from ever being victorious on the peninsula of Korea. Meanwhile the united strength of the free world is growing by leaps and bounds.

During these past 11 months we have more than doubled our Armed Forces. We have traveled far toward the goal of an adequate mobilization of our manpower, our industrial resources and our productive capacities.

Some of our allies are weak—and I want to say right here, my fellow Oklahomans—that no one is more aware of those weaknesses than I. No one is more aware of the hesitancy of some of the nations who sit in the shadow of the iron curtain to join us in a united effort to fight this aggression.

There are those who complain of our allies because of their meager help in Korea. I understand that complaint, and I join in it. That is just one of the reasons I am so bitterly opposed to MacArthur's effort to expand the war into China. It wouldn't be meager help we would then be complaining of if we did that. In that bigger, harder struggle we would have no help at all.

We would have to send more and more troops into Asia. Red China, however, would be fighting Russia's battles, while Russia, our number one enemy, would be free to pounce on Europe which is the real strategic prize. In defense of this threat, our European allies would have to save their own manpower. So, if we get bogged down in Asia, we could not help our own allies and they could not help us. By default, we would have lost on both fronts to the common enemy.

If we are forced into a bigger war we should never permit the men in the Kremlin to forget that our fighting power will be hurled against them and not at their stooges.

Our allies can never make themselves very effective in Korea or China, nor is there interest primarily in either. Russia's strongest ally is China. However, that ally is only partially committed in Korea. What MacArthur proposes would unite the Chinese, now divided and becoming more divided all the time. Vast numbers of the Chinese people hate their Communist masters and even now seek to throw off their yoke of tyranny. But what MacArthur proposes would drive all of China into Russia's corner and crystallize her opposition to us. Thus, we would be committing more and more of our strength against Russia's ally and fighting where we would have the least possible help from our own allies.

In Europe it would be just the opposite. If war comes there, Russia would have to commit her own manpower and military strength. If war comes there our allies would have the primary interest. They must be prepared to fight if war comes in Europe. They now conserve their manpower for just such an eventuality. But if and when Russia uses her manpower then they will use theirs.

In Europe our allies will fight with all their power and all their men. Our contribution would then be more in naval power, air power, and equipment rather than in men. In China we would have to furnish the munitions of war and the manpower.

We do not want war anywhere. We will do all within our power to prevent it occurring at any place at any time. But if it must come, we would have our greatest advantage over Russia fighting in Europe. Russia would have her greatest advantage over us if the war were in China.

What folly to contemplate such a tragedy if it could be avoided. There is no other war that would or could gain as much for Russia or cost her as little as an all-out war between the United States of America and Red China. There is no other war that would or could cost us so much and gain us so little.

Therefore, we would be stupid to permit such a war if we could avoid it; we would be insane to provoke it. I repeat what General Bradley said: "This strategy would involve us in the wrong war, at the wrong place, at the wrong time, and with the wrong enemy."

Russia is still the No. 1 enemy and threat to peace, and we need time—time during which we must limit the conflict to the smallest possible area. If we are given this time, we and our allies will build a united strength that will constitute our best insurance against another world war, and provide us with that which will enable us to win, if we are forced into it.

It was with these plain and simple facts before me that I sounded my unalterable opposition to the policies advocated by General MacArthur. I did not oppose him because of any personal resentment. I appreciate his many years of service to his country. I did not oppose him at the request of anyone. I opposed him because I thought he was wrong.

When he refused to accept the policies of his Government; when he declined to follow the orders of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Commander in Chief; when he told, not only his own superiors but, in violation of orders, told the whole world that he could not and would not play as a member of the team, he just simply had to be removed from that team.

The general made a great speech before the Members of Congress. He said, "there is no substitute for victory," and I do not contest that statement. But we must ask ourselves: What constitutes victory? The general's objective and concept of this is a military victory over China.

But, as General Marshall and General Bradley pointed out, the aggressive moves advocated by General MacArthur, would not be decisive in Korea. They would just make peace and victory and peace a lot further off, and would greatly multiply our casualties over what our forces are now suffering in the limited engagement.

I say to you that we did not go to Korea to become engaged in that kind of a conflict, and I say further that the greatest defeat we could suffer in Korea would come if we permitted ourselves, through any fault of ours, to become engaged in an all-out military struggle with Red China.

Oh, you say, but aren't we at war with China? We are engaged with only a small part of the forces of Red China. Red China doesn't have 10 percent of her military power in Korea. If we were to open up that second front, which General MacArthur says is so necessary for victory over China, we would be taking on a fight 10 times more terrible than the one we now have in Korea. Our casualties would be 10 times what they now are.

And I ask you, "Who would win?" We wouldn't. Red China wouldn't. But you and I know who would, and it doesn't take a military strategist to figure that out. Red Russia would win.

If Russia could entice us, or seduce us, or compel us to become engaged in an all-out war with China it would give the men in the Kremlin the greatest satisfaction on earth, for Russia would be the ultimate winner—the only winner.

Therefore, I submit to you that victory in Korea can be won only if we avoid an all-out war with Red China. Of course, they may force it upon us, and in that event we would have no choice. But I say to you that at this time we do have a choice, and it is the purpose of our Government, our Chiefs of Staff—our Commander in Chief, and of our allies, to do these things: Stop the aggression in Korea and punish the aggressor until he seeks an honorable peace; limit the conflict to the smallest possible area; and in the meantime continue the mobilization of our manpower, mobilization of our resources, development of our cooperative effort with other nations, and thus, through collective effort and strength, achieve that impregnable security that will enable us to win and keep the peace.

I am not one of those who believe that another world war is inevitable. I would be unfair to my trust as one of your representatives if I did not join others of like purpose and do all within my power to avoid world war III. We must make the greatest effort of which we are capable to prevent it. If, in spite of this, Russia should provoke that war and force it upon us, then the blood we spill in that greater conflict, as well as in Korea, would be on her hands. She would have to answer for it before God and before the bar of world opinion.

But—and carefully note and long remember these words—if we permit that war to develop when we might have prevented it, or if—and God forbid—we should provoke it, then that blood would be on our hands and we would stand convicted before the world.

I am convinced that we yet have a chance, a clear chance, to avoid another world war. It may be the last clear chance, but we must develop it to the greatest extent of which we are capable. We must succeed in this effort if it is humanly possible.

I am convinced that under God we can succeed. I believe that with Divine guidance we can achieve that strength and unity at home and with our allies abroad whereby we may avoid that awful war or, with God's help, win it if it is forced upon us.

The Fruits of Fascism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, May 10, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the appended profound editorial from the New York Times of May 17 deserves the attention of every Member. Totalitarianism, red, brown, or black, is equally a mortal danger to us. It is for this reason that so many of us have been urging that the struggle will be long and our efforts must be heroic, that military means alone will not conquer totalitarianism, but that it will take economic, ideological, and, beyond all, spiritual means as well.

THE FRUITS OF FASCISM

It would be a lack of proportion to take the International Fascist Congress at Malmoe, Sweden, too seriously, but it would be even greater folly to ignore it. The delegates who met there were few and unimportant but they called attention to something we must never forget—that fascism is still very much alive although we fought the bloodiest war in history to kill it. We killed Mussolini and Hitler and a lot of Italian, German, and Japanese Fascists and we devastated their countries, but we did not destroy fascism.

The first and most obvious conclusion to draw is that we could today destroy Stalin, Mao, Ho Chi Minh, their politburos, and every Communist leader everywhere and we could virtually destroy their countries with atom bombs—but we could not destroy communism. One could go further and say that if in some miraculous way we could wipe out every Communist Party and every individual Communist on the face of the earth, something like communism would rise instantaneously from the ashes. The totalitarians are a response to a situation, a dusty answer to the problems of our times. So long as the conditions remain that gave birth to fascism and communism, so long will those or similar doctrines last.

We must never fool ourselves that the ideas of the totalitarians can be killed by anything but better ideas that win universal acceptance. We must never indulge in the foolish hope that fascism and communism can destroy each other. The conflict between the two is nothing but a struggle for power. It is not an ideological conflict; both use almost similar methods and—most important of all—both have a common enemy in democracy. The classic proof of this thesis will forever lie in the Hitler-Stalin pact of August 1939.

Therefore, this is not an academic proposition, but one closely tied to reality. Just as it warns us to be cautious in our links to Tito, so it warns us to be careful in dealing with rulers like Franco, Peron, and Malan. The men who founded a neo-Nazi international movement in Malmoe on Monday may have come from the lunatic fringe of European politics, but their roots go down deeply, roots that have never been eradicated and that can bear evil fruits in the months to come.

Kyle Palmer Discusses MacArthur Stand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. PATRICK J. HILLINGS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 26, 1951

Mr. HILLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to call to the attention of the Congress a recent article by Mr. Kyle Palmer which appeared in the Los Angeles Times on May 13, 1951. Mr. Palmer is the distinguished political editor of the Los Angeles Times.

This article discusses clearly and concisely the great issue of our far eastern foreign policy which was so graphically brought home to the American people by the President's tragic dismissal of Gen. Douglas MacArthur last month.

I feel that Mr. Palmer's discussion of this issue is worthy of serious consideration. The article follows:

EXPLANATIONS NOT IMPRESSIVE

(By Kyle Palmer, political editor)

The Truman administration's case against General MacArthur can be likened to that of a man who, having done another a great injury, sets out to justify the offense by further outrage and abuse.

For the record, the general now is portrayed as a rash and reckless swashbuckler who wanted to play so rough with the enemy that he not only succeeded in knocking his foes around, but scared his friends!

President Truman's decision—without consulting MacArthur—to launch a war in Korea against Red China and its Soviet boss is described as a peaceful move; whereas MacArthur's determination to win the war the President started is set forth in all seriousness as an out-and-out invitation to the Reds to start a rain of atom bombs on American cities.

According to the Truman administration's formula for war with communism, you can fight a little bit, kill and get killed on a sort of retail basis, but you really must not tempt the enemy beyond all forbearance.

If we have the bad luck or the ill grace to make the Russians really mad they may try to get tough. Instead of sending guns, tanks, bombs, rifles, ammunition, airplanes, military advisers and all other appurtenances to warring on us in Korea, why, if MacArthur were allowed to have his way, the Russians might start something somewhere else.

The Truman administration spokesmen are not sure the Russians won't grow tired of being beaten in Korea even with General MacArthur out of their hair.

But the administration indulges the prayerful and pious hope that our Red enemies will continue to be patient while, right under their noses, we build a war potential adequate to keep them peacefully in their place.

The picture, as painted by Secretary of Defense George Marshall—who told his Senatorial inquisitors last week that he "reacts more quickly" when called "general"—is dreary and grim.

One gains an impression from the general's testimony that MacArthur was snatched away just in time; had he won a few more battles and carried the war more rapidly to a victorious conclusion almost anything might have happened.

President Truman in his radio address to the country last Monday went even further in what seemed to me a most shoddy effort to scare the country to a point of hysteria—and all under the plain implication that his wise, impersonal, and courageous removal of MacArthur had saved us from the terrible consequences of all-out war.

General MacArthur himself told the inquiring Senators that he believes Russia will attack us where and when the Reds decide it is to their advantage to do so. He does not believe they are any more prepared to attack us than we are disposed to attack them.

But he still insists that the attack, if and when it comes, will be a matter of decision by the Communists.

According to the Truman-Marshall-Acheson theory, the free world is not strong enough to prevent a third world war at this time and, hence, faces a foe whose strength is at its peak.

Nevertheless, say Messrs. Truman, Marshall, and Acheson, by watching our diplomatic step in Korea, by keeping one hand tied behind us at the Manchurian border, by looking in another direction as the Russian-supplied and Russian-advised Chinese Reds organize their armies and accumulate their supplies in the Manchurian sanctuary, the Soviet will sit quietly at home until we have the weapons to knock them silly.

It does not make sense, even to those who know very little of the art of war and next to nothing of the ways of diplomacy.

And the attempt to picture Douglas MacArthur as a military commander willing to precipitate a world conflict by ill-considered and impulsive action in a limited theater of war, can have little damaging effect upon the people's confidence in their old soldier.

It seems quite doubtful that current or future discussion of the Truman-MacArthur controversy will materially modify the opinions and conclusions which most of us have developed, but all of us, regardless of opinion, should keep steadfastly in mind the fact that the country's security is involved.

General Marshall in his defense of the Truman removal order is merely carrying out a hard and, in all probability, a most distasteful chore. He has not done a very good job because he hasn't a very good case, but he has done his best.

Admirers of Marshall who know of his great services during World War II have had renewed evidence of the fact that his return to public responsibility after retiring as the Army's Chief of Staff has not added to his stature nor greatly advanced the announced objectives of the national administration.

Marshall is the administration's more important witness and he commands more respect in the Congress and in the country itself than any administration spokesman.

But in no important instance has he been able to shake the over-all position taken by General MarArthur.

The President, his Secretary of Defense, his Secretary of State and, it must be presumed, his Chiefs of Staff have challenged or will in one way or another dispute with MacArthur.

The collective assumptions and conclusions of the MacArthur critics, however, remain more in the category of a weak defense than of a convincing counterattack.

Meanwhile, the outside world composed of our apprehensive and critical friends and of our derisive and watchful foes is witnessing the rare spectacle of a nation caught in the meshes of confusion, indecision and rancorous debate.

Let us concede that much of the confusion and some of the indecision may be eliminated if the debate is kept within reasonable bounds and does not become a mere vehicle for personal and partisan bickering, but one basic fact continues to stand:

That is to say, the colossal folly of the manner in which the President dismissed the General. Secretary Marshall's lame explanation was, under the kindest of interpretations, unfortunate. And nothing Mr. Truman has said mitigates in any way the raw and reckless procedure he followed.

Alone and, so we're told, virtually single-handed, the President made an almost unprecedented contribution to national disunity and international uncertainty.

Had his victim been a lesser man or one less devoted to the welfare of the Nation, Mr. Truman might have plunged the country into a political debacle. Fortunately, General MacArthur set aside his natural feelings of resentment and pride and adhered strictly to an objective appraisal of the entire matter.

When the passions and prejudices of this generation have been forgotten by a posterity that will have its own emotional stresses and strains to resolve, the undeserved slights put upon a great man by a small one will remain fresh in the Nation's memory.

And what justification the future may hold for the act of removal itself is not only a subject for current conjecture, but may be one of interminable argument.

For those living in the contemporary world the all-important question is which side in the Truman-MacArthur episode is fundamentally right; which side fundamentally sound in its approach to ways and means for meeting and subduing communism's march.

In all probability, we shall discover in the hard way whether MacArthur's formula of strength or the Truman administration's program of pussyfooting offers, or eventually will offer, the best course to pursue.

Rest assured, if General MacArthur is correct in his view we face a long period of harassment and humiliation, to be followed inescapably by a formidable challenge to our very existence. And even under the Truman-Marshall-Acheson procedure we shall suffer the harassment and the humiliation with no assurance that the final challenge, after all, won't be there waiting for us.

My money remains on MacArthur.
